Sexual Intercourse Without Consent — "Easy to Charge but Difficult to Defend" Instruction Improper: The cautionary jury instruction providing that sexual intercourse without consent is an easy charge to make but is difficult to defend is an improper instruction. The Supreme Court, in holding that the instruction is an unwarranted and improper comment on the evidence which is not required by law or public policy, specifically overruled St. v. Smith, 187 M 245, 609 P2d 696, 37 St. Rep. 583 (1980). St. v. Liddell, 211 M 180, 685 P2d 918, 41 St. Rep. 1293 (1984).

Planted Evidence Instruction Not Warranted: There was insufficient evidence to support a logical inference that evidence was planted and therefore insufficient evidence to support an instruction on that theory where defendant in an assault case claimed at trial that certain evidence was planted, victim testified she had not planted it, police had not been able to find the evidence at first because victim gave them the wrong location of where she claimed it was, and victim had later found it herself a block away and notified the police. St. v. Howard, 195 M 400, 637 P2d 15, 38 St. Rep. 1980 (1981).

Refusal of Instruction That Sexual Assault Is Easy to Charge and Difficult to Defend:

The defendant, convicted of sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault, alleged error on appeal in the refusal of the trial court to give some of his offered jury instructions. One refused instruction was that the charge against the defendant was one easily made and difficult to defend against. The Supreme Court indicated that the instruction was incorrect as offered because, as to two of the witnesses against the defendant, there was no evidence showing any personal enmity toward the defendant. As to a third witness, there was sufficient basis in the evidence for this type of instruction under the Smith case, but the defendant failed to limit the instruction to advising the jury to look with caution only at the testimony of the third witness, whose enmity toward the defendant was in evidence. Accordingly, the instruction was correctly refused in its offered form. St. v. Camitsch, 192 M 124, 626 P2d 1250, 38 St. Rep. 563 (1981), following St. v. Smith, 187 M 245, 609 P2d 696, 37 St. Rep. 583 (1980). St. v. Smith was overruled as to the propriety of the easy to charge-difficult to defend instruction. See St. v. Liddell casenote above.

When the defendant was charged with sexual intercourse without consent and offered the defense of consent of the victim, the trial court did not err in refusing to give the jury instruction approved in St. v. Smith, 187 M 245, 609 P2d 696 (1980), that "the accusation of rape . . . is easy to make, but hard to defend against". The Supreme Court held in St. v. Pecora, 190 M 115, 619 P2d 173 (1980), that such an instruction is applicable only if the evidence presented at trial shows personal enmity between the defendant and the victim and that corroborating evidence supporting the victim does not exist. The record in this case does not satisfy these requirements. St. v. Mackie, 191 M 138, 622 P2d 673, 38 St. Rep. 86 (1981). St. v. Smith was overruled as to the propriety of the easy to charge-difficult to defend instruction. See St. v. Liddell casenote above.

Instruction to Distrust Weaker Evidence — No Adverse Effect on Presumption of Innocence: It was not reversible error for the trial court to instruct the jury to view weaker evidence with distrust when it appeared stronger evidence was available. It did not adversely affect the presumption of innocence and did not allow the jury to draw an inference from defendant's failure to take the stand. St. v. Pendergrass, 189 M 127, 615 P2d 201 (1980).

Instruction on Effect of Possession of Stolen Property: The District Court did not err in giving the instruction that "one who is found in the possession of property that was stolen from burglarized premises is bound to explain such possession in order to remove the effect of that fact as a circumstance to be considered with all other evidence pointing to his guilt". St. v. Rose, 187 M 74, 608 P2d 1074 (1980).

Instruction as to Date Crime Was Committed: When an instruction is given that when the crime charged is alleged to have been committed on or about a certain date, it is not necessary to prove the precise date but is sufficient that the proof shows commission of the crime prior to the filing of the information. The jury should be apprised of the date the information was filed; however, in the absence of prejudice, failure to do so is not reversible error. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Instructions as to Evidence of Other Crimes Not Charged: It was not improper for the court to instruct the jury as to the purposes for which the jury could consider evidence of other crimes not charged. The instruction benefited the defendant, not the State, by narrowly restricting the consideration which may be given such evidence. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Presumption of Innocence: In a criminal prosecution for theft of an automobile in which the defendant timely requested and was twice denied an instruction on the presumption of innocence, an instruction on the State's burden of proof could not supplant an instruction on the presumption of innocence. The standard for prejudicial effect of the lack of the instruction was established in St. v. Harrison, 23 M 79, 57 P 647 (1899), and is stricter than that used by the U.S. Supreme Court. It is per se reversible error to deny the instruction. St. v. Williams, 184 M 111, 601 P2d 1194 (1979).

Instruction on Uncorroborated Testimony Properly Refused: In a trial of the defendant for sexual intercourse without consent, it was not error for the trial court to refuse cautionary instruction on the uncorroborated nature of the prosecutrix's testimony as the law does not require corroboration, some corroborating evidence was presented, and there was nothing in the record to suggest malice by the prosecutrix. St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979).

Possession as Prima Facie Evidence: A jury instruction taken verbatim from 45-6-304 (now repealed) that stated that possession of recently stolen livestock is prima facie evidence of guilt of larceny did not constitute reversible error since, even though the State has the burden of proof in criminal cases, the burden of evidence may shift to the defendant. St. v. Gloyne, 156 M 94, 476 P2d 511 (1970).

Instruction Placing Burden to Explain on Defendant:

An instruction that mere unexplained possession of stolen property was not sufficient to justify conviction but that one found in possession of property that may have been stolen must explain such possession in order to remove the effect of that fact as a circumstance to be considered with other evidence pointing to guilt did not deprive the defendant of the presumption of innocence. St. v. Gray, 152 M 145, 447 P2d 475 (1968).

In a prosecution for grand larceny, an instruction that had the effect of placing a burden on the defendant to explain his possession of stolen property was erroneous. Such a burden deprives the defendant of his cloak of innocence and forces him to testify. St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959).

Cautionary Instruction — Victim's Testimony in Rape Case: In a rape trial, when there was no inconsistency, contradictory evidence, or proof of falsity shown in the prosecutrix's testimony and no showing of malice or desire for revenge against the accused, it was not error for the court to refuse to give a cautionary instruction. St. v. Lagge, 143 M 289, 388 P2d 792 (1964).

Instruction Defining “Reasonable Doubt”:

An instruction on “reasonable doubt” not strictly adhering to the one given by Chief Justice Shaw in Commonwealth v. Webster, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 295, 52 Am. Dec. 711 (1850), and generally followed by courts, but adding inter alia that the jury is “not at liberty to disbelieve as jurors if you believe as men; your oath imposes upon you no obligation to doubt where no doubt would exist if no oath had been administered”, was held not erroneous, the court being of the opinion that the decision holding that the term “reasonable doubt” defines itself is the most logical of a large number of authorities reviewed. St. v. Curtiss, 114 M 232, 135 P2d 361 (1943); St. v. Wong Sun, 114 M 185, 133 P2d 761 (1943).

The trial court, in giving the definition of “reasonable doubt” in an instruction on the subject repeatedly approved by the Supreme Court, did not commit reversible error by prefacing it thus: “You are instructed that a doubt which a juror is allowed to retain in his mind and under the influence of which he should form a verdict of not guilty, must always be a reasonable one”, and the contention of the appellant that the phrase in effect did away with the presumption of innocence declared by a former section was not sustained. St. v. Zorn, 99 M 63, 41 P2d 513 (1935).

While the court has frequently approved as correct and sufficient to meet all requirements the instruction taken from Commonwealth v. Webster, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 295, 52 Am. Dec. 711 (1850) (Territory v. McAndrews, 3 M 158 (1878); St. v. Martin, 29 M 273, 74 P 725 (1903); St. v. DeLea, 36 M 531, 93 P 814 (1907)), error was not committed in submitting the following instruction: “The term reasonable doubt best defines itself. In a legal sense, however, a reasonable doubt is a doubt which has some reason for its basis; a doubt for which there exists in the minds of the jurors a reason, and not a doubt arising from mere caprice or groundless conjecture.” (Chief Justice Brantly). St. v. Lewis, 52 M 495, 159 P 415 (1916).

Technical Error in Instruction: On an appeal from a judgment of conviction for forgery, while it was error to advise the jury, in an instruction as to the purpose for which testimony of other like acts had been admitted, that testimony had been admitted relating to certain “forgeries”, since whether or not a forgery had been committed was the fact to be determined by the jury, in view of other portions of the charge carefully safeguarding the rights of the defendant, the inadvertent use of the term “forgeries” could not have worked to his prejudice. St. v. Daems, 97 M 486, 37 P2d 322 (1934).

46-16-402. When order may be departed from.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute establishes a general provision intended to provide the same practices as 1987 MCA 46-16-402. The statute, however, does not expressly recognize that the “state of the pleading” may require a departure from the stated order. The statute generally recognizes that the court may depart from the stated order when good cause is shown.

Source: R.C.M. 1947, section 94-7202.

No change.

1991 Amendment: At beginning substituted “For good cause shown” for “When the state of the pleading requires it or in any other case for good reasons”.

Case Notes

District Court Properly Complied With Instructions on Remand — Only Illegal Sentence Provision Relating to Parole Struck From Sentence — District Court Properly Denied State-Funded Expert. St. v. Keefe, 2022 MT 121, 409 Mont. 86, 512 P.3d 741. See also St. v. Keefe, 2021 MT 8, 403 Mont. 1, 478 P.3d 830.

Change of Trial Order — No Good Cause — No Prejudice: The defendant was charged with distribution of marijuana. Prior to opening statements, and over the defendant’s objection, the District Court read a jury instruction on the elements of the crime. Subsequently, a jury convicted the defendant and he appealed, arguing that the District Court did not have good cause to read the jury instruction prior to the opening arguments and that doing so unfairly prejudiced him. The Supreme Court agreed that the District Court lacked good cause to change the trial order given the simplicity of the case; however, it affirmed the lower court, concluding that the change in the order of the trial did not unfairly prejudice the defendant. St. v. Otto, 2014 MT 20, 373 Mont. 385, 317 P.3d 810.

Discretion of Court to Reopen Case in Chief — Admissibility of Surprise Defense Testimony: The District Court allowed the state to reopen its case in chief after defense testimony at trial revealed that a defense witness had fabricated evidence and that a previously unknown witness, who had also fabricated physical evidence, was involved. These facts constituted good cause sufficient to allow the court to exercise its discretion to depart from the usual order of trial and allow examination of the witnesses and the relevance of the fabricated evidence. Further, introduction of the surprise testimony was relevant, and its probative value far outweighed any danger of unfair prejudice to the defendant. St. v. Snaric, 262 M 62, 862 P2d 1175, 50 St. Rep. 1443 (1993).

Introduction of Evidence of Other Crimes Prior to Case in Chief — Court Discretion to Allow Chronological Presentation of Evidence: Defendant claimed the District Court improperly allowed introduction of evidence of other crimes, wrongs, and acts before the prosecution presented evidence of the crime charged. The state gave sufficient notice that it intended to introduce evidence of five burglaries or attempted burglaries, in chronological order, attributed to defendant. To cure any defect, the state filed a sealed affidavit with the court 1 week before trial, setting out what this evidence would prove. The court carefully apprised the jury of what crime was charged and admonished the jury as to the limited purposes of the prior crimes and acts evidence. The Just rules for admissibility having been met and an offer of proof having been received by the court for the chronological presentation of evidence, it was within the court's discretion to allow the sequence and order of presentation. St. v. Keefe, 232 M 258, 759 P2d 128, 45 St. Rep. 1034 (1988). See also St. v. Keefe, 2021 MT 8, 403 Mont. 1, 478 P.3d 830, and St. v. Keefe, 2022 MT 121, 409 Mont. 86, 512 P.3d 741.

Preliminary Instructions:

Presentation of preliminary jury instructions before the evidence, especially when some of the offenses charged were complex and difficult to understand, was for good reason. It allowed the jury to have some understanding of the complex circumstantial evidence to be presented. A less complex case not based only on circumstantial evidence might not require such preliminary instructions, and in such a case there might not be good reasons for varying the usual trial order. St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428 (1980).

The defendant's contention that extensive preliminary instructions given by the trial court were erroneous was rejected by the Supreme Court when it concluded that the language was not inflammatory but as neutral as language detailing the charges involved could be, even though the instructions were given prior to the introduction of evidence. St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 581 P2d 1205 (1978).

Requiring Out-of-Order Presentation by Defendant:

Opinion testimony was allowed as to evidence the witnesses had examined but which had not yet been admitted into evidence because a portion of the chain of possession had not been established in testimony. The missing links in the chain of possession were later supplied by testimony. It was within the discretion of the trial court to allow opinion to be given, conditioned on the subsequent production and admission of the evidence which formed the basis of the opinion. St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428 (1980).

The trial court did not err in requiring the defendant to make an out-of-order presentation of his case in chief during the state's case in chief because certain prosecution witnesses were under time constraints that the defendant failed to overcome with "good reasons" why they should be required to stay several days to testify during the defendant's case in chief. St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 581 P2d 1205 (1978).

The judge's reading a cautionary instruction in substantially standard language prior to the introduction of evidence was not error. St. v. Armstrong, 172 M 296, 562 P2d 1129 (1977).

Difficulty in Locating Witness as Grounds for Reopening Case: Where the State had difficulty in locating an eyewitness, kept the trial court and the defendant informed of its difficulty, and the defendant was given full opportunity to rebut the witness's testimony, it was not error to allow the State to reopen its case in chief to receive the eyewitness testimony. St. v. White, 185 M 213, 605 P2d 191 (1980), followed in St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000).

Amendment of Witness List During Trial:

The trial court did not err in permitting the endorsement of an x-ray by a radiologist as a witness added in midtrial by the prosecution when the defense counsel knew of the existence of the x-ray prior to trial and nothing indicated an intentional or deliberate withholding of evidence by the State or lack of good cause. St. v. Gafford, 172 M 380, 563 P2d 1129 (1977).

Allowing the amendment of the witness list requested because of evidentiary matters developed during presentation of the State's case was not an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial judge when the court offered the accused a continuance and there was no objection to the witnesses based on surprise by the defendant. St. v. Klein, 169 M 350, 547 P2d 75 (1976).

Good Cause for Continuance: If a defendant wishes to protect himself from alleged prejudice incurred by the use of an approximate date in charging an offense and the proof offered at trial, he can move for a continuance under this section. St. v. Hall, 171 M 33, 554 P2d 755 (1976).

Defendant Wrongfully Denied Opening Statement: The denial to the defendant of opportunity to make an opening statement concerning insanity defense until after the presentation of the prosecution's case was an improper interference with the defendant's right to have the jury consider his defense. St. v. Olson, 156 M 339, 480 P2d 822 (1971).

46-16-403. Evidence insufficient to go to jury.

Case Notes

Felony Strangulation — Sufficient Corroborating Evidence — Defendant's Own Actions Followed by Admission — Sufficient Evidence for Jury's Verdict: The trial evidence supported the defendant's conviction of felony strangulation by a jury's verdict. Every witness gave considerable additional evidence corroborating the victim's assault when she initially described it. Moreover, the defendant's own actions and statements afterward offered additional corroboration, including about 100 phone calls, numerous text messages, and an admission to the police officer that he was tired of listening to the victim yell and he covered her mouth for 10 to 15 seconds. St. v. Dineen, 2020 MT 193, 400 Mont. 461, 469 P.3d 122.

Denial of Directed Verdict on First Trial Proper — Sufficient Evidence to Convict — No Double Jeopardy on New Trial: The District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion for directed verdict during his first jury trial. There was sufficient evidence for the District Court to submit the case to the jury to determine if the elements of criminal possession of dangerous drugs with the intent to distribute were met. The state presented more than sufficient evidence from which a rational trier of fact could have found beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant knew about the methamphetamine under his passenger seat, was in possession of the methamphetamine, and had intended to distribute the methamphetamine. Additionally, since the Supreme Court agreed with the state's argument that the District Court did not err by denying the defendant's motion for directed verdict in the first trial, the Supreme Court declined to address the substance of the defendant's double jeopardy argument. St. v. Ellerbee, 2019 MT 37, 394 Mont. 289, 434 P.3d 910.

Midtrial Dismissal of Claim Reconsidered — Violation of Double Jeopardy — Sentence Vacated: The midtrial ruling dismissing one count in a multicount trial is a judgment of acquittal and must be treated as final unless availability of reconsideration has been plainly established. Because the District Court later reconsidered a midtrial ruling dismissing a drug possession charge, the District Court violated the defendant's right to avoid double jeopardy, and the issue was reversed by the Supreme Court. St. v. Barrows, 2018 MT 204, 392 Mont. 358, 424 P.3d 612.

Insufficient Evidence that Substance Was Dangerous Drug — Motion to Dismiss Improperly Denied: The defendant was charged with distribution of dangerous drugs after allegedly giving marijuana to a woman in exchange for babysitting. Except for the woman's testimony that the substance was green with orange hairs and that she knew it was marijuana because she had smoked it before, the state offered no evidence that the substance was, in fact, a dangerous drug. The witness never testified that the drug had made her high. At the end of the trial, the defendant moved to dismiss the charge on the grounds that the evidence presented by the state was insufficient to support a guilty verdict, which the District Court denied. Following his conviction, the defendant appealed, arguing that the state had not proved that the substance was a dangerous drug. The Supreme Court agreed that the evidence was insufficient to allow a rational trier of fact to conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that the substance was a dangerous drug and reversed. St. v. Burwell, 2013 MT 332, 372 Mont. 401, 313 P.3d 119.

Officers' Apprehension of Injury From Unseen Weapon Reasonable — Assault on Peace Officer Affirmed: When police arrived at the defendant's apartment in response to a noise complaint, the defendant answered the door and admitted them, although he appeared to the officers to be distinctly agitated and belligerent. After pushing one officer and being repeatedly warned not to touch the officers, the defendant stated they would “see about” that and stepped into another room. On returning, he faced the officers in a stance that obscured his right hand. When the officers drew their weapons and ordered him to drop they gun they believed he had retrieved and was concealing, the defendant dropped a loaded shotgun from his right hand; he was subsequently charged with assault on a police officer. At the end of the prosecution’s case, the defendant moved to dismiss for insufficient evidence, arguing that the police could not have had a reasonable apprehension of serious bodily injury because they had not seen the shotgun he had been holding until after he dropped it. The District Court denied the motion, and the defendant was convicted. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the District Court’s denial of the motion to dismiss, noting that an officer need not see a weapon to feel threatened by it. St. v. Kirn, 2012 MT 69, 364 Mont. 356, 274 P.3d 746.

Sufficient Evidence of Deliberate Homicide — Directed Verdict Properly Denied: Schmidt moved for dismissal after the state presented its evidence in a deliberate homicide case, but the trial court denied the motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that although the precise sequence of events on the night in question remained elusive, it was undisputed that Schmidt stabbed the victim causing the victim’s death, then fled the scene, threw away a knife and a cell phone, went home and burned his clothes, and lied to police about the clothing he was wearing and the knife he had used. The trial court properly allowed the jury to decide whether the state presented sufficient evidence to convict Schmidt and thus did not err in denying Schmidt’s motion for a directed verdict. The trial court was affirmed. St. v. Schmidt, 2009 MT 450, 354 M 280, 224 P3d 618 (2009).

Criminal Endangerment — Sufficient Proof of Mental State and Jurisdiction: Cybulski contended that the state failed to prove criminal endangerment because there was insufficient proof that Cybulski acted knowingly or that the alleged offense occurred in Custer County. The Supreme Court disagreed with both arguments. Under 45-2-103, the existence of a mental state may be inferred from the acts of the accused and the facts and circumstances connected with the offense. Here, Cybulski drove at a high rate of speed for nearly 50 miles on the wrong side of the interstate while intoxicated. A rational trier of fact could conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that Cybulski either was aware of her conduct and the risk it was creating or was unaware solely because of her intoxicated condition, so the element of knowingly was proven. Under 46-3-112, if two or more acts are requisite to the commission of an offense, the charge may be filed in any county in which any of the acts occurred. Cybulski admitted that she drove on the wrong side of the interstate in Custer County and made no objection to charges being filed in Custer County, so venue in Custer County was proper. St. v. Cybulski, 2009 MT 70, 349 M 429, 204 P3d 7 (2009).

Failure to Prove Unconstitutionality of Municipal Ordinance Prohibiting Storage of Salvage: Albert was charged in City Court with two counts of unlawful storage of salvage pursuant to a Billings municipal ordinance. Albert moved to dismiss, asserting that the ordinance was unconstitutionally vague because substantive terms in the ordinance were not defined, so the ordinance failed to provide actual notice of what conduct was proscribed and minimal guidelines sufficient to govern city code enforcement officers. Albert’s motion was denied and Albert appealed. The Supreme Court applied the test for vagueness from St. v. Dixon, 2000 MT 82, 299 M 165, 998 P2d 544 (2000), which requires that actual notice be given to citizens and that the statute contain minimal guidelines sufficient to govern law enforcement. The first element was met because Albert received multiple warnings before being cited, was told specifically what items had to be removed from his yard, and was even offered assistance in removal efforts; thus Albert was clearly on notice of a potential violation. The second element was also met inasmuch as the enforcement process did not encourage arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement because enforcement was generated only by citizen complaints, and officers were entitled to exercise a certain degree of subjective judgment in enforcement efforts. Therefore, Albert failed to show that the ordinance was vague and the dismissal motion was properly denied. There was sufficient evidence to show that Albert failed to move the salvage within 5 days as required by the ordinance, so Albert’s conviction was affirmed. Billings v. Albert, 2009 MT 63, 349 M 400, 203 P3d 828 (2009). See also Kolender v. Lawson, 461 US 352 (1983).

Sufficient Evidence of Common-Law Marriage to Allow Conviction for Incest With Stepchild: Following conviction for incest with his stepdaughter, Bullman asserted that the state failed to prove sufficient evidence that Bullman was married to the victim’s mother, so the victim was not Bullman’s stepdaughter and Bullman could not be convicted of incest. However, the jury concluded that a common-law marriage existed based on facts that: (1) Bullman and the victim’s mother lived together as husband and wife for many years and had children together; (2) Bullman supported the mother and her children, including the victim; (3) Bullman purchased a house and the mother was “on the deed”; (4) the mother filed joint tax returns while Bullman was incarcerated; (5) the mother testified that Bullman sometimes referred to her as his wife in front of others; (6) the victim testified that Bullman assumed a father-daughter relationship and asked her to call him “Dad”; and (7) the mother had obtained a divorce decree that was filed over Bullman’s objection. The evidence of a common-law marriage, although circumstantial, was sufficient for the jury to conclude that Bullman and the victim’s mother were married at the time the sexual contact occurred. St. v. Bullman, 2009 MT 37, 349 M 228, 203 P3d 768 (2009).

No Error in Denying Motion to Dismiss Felony Indecent Exposure Charge for Insufficient Evidence: Defendant’s actions coupled with facts and circumstances constituted sufficient evidence for the jury to find the essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Ommundson, 2008 MT 340, 346 M 263, 194 P3d 672, (2008).

Waiver of Right to Raise Issue of Unreasonable Delay — Failure to Move Court for Ruling at or Before Omnibus Hearing: Approximately 4 hours after Kummerfeldt was involved in a single-vehicle accident, his blood was drawn for a BAC test, which produced a 0.14% result. At trial, he moved for a judgment of acquittal on the DUI per se charge, based on the state’s failure to prove his BAC result was 0.08 or greater at the time he was driving and because under St. v. McGowan, 2006 MT 163, 332 M 490, 139 P3d 841 (2006), 4 hours was an unreasonable delay between the driving and the drawing of blood. However, not only did Kummerfeldt fail to raise this objection at the omnibus hearing, he also entered into a pretrial stipulation as to the admissibility of the BAC report. Therefore, Kummerfeldt waived his arguments. St. v. Kummerfeldt, 2008 MT 333, 346 M 187, 194 P3d 662, (2008).

Conviction Based on Victim’s Uncorroborated Testimony — Evidence Sufficient to Go to Jury: At Swenson’s trial for sexual assault, Swenson asserted that the evidence was insufficient to go to the jury because the victim testified that she did not hear or see anything during the alleged incident, and her minor cousin who was present at the time testified that he saw Swenson simply wake the victim and then leave the room. However, the victim testified at trial that she kept her eyes closed and pretended to sleep during the touching, then pretended to wake up and saw Swenson standing over her. A conviction for a sex offense may be based entirely on the uncorroborated testimony of the victim, and the victim’s testimony, combined with both circumstantial and direct evidence, was sufficient to submit the issue to the jury and to support a conviction. St. v. Swenson, 2008 MT 308, 346 M 34, 194 P3d 625 (2008). See also St. v. Maetche, 2008 MT 184, 343 M 464, 185 P3d 980 (2008).

No Error on Lower Court’s Part for Not Dismissing Drug Case on Argument of Insufficient Evidence to Prove Defendant Knew Vial Contained Drugs: Wood argued that the lower court erred in not dismissing his case on the basis that insufficient evidence existed to show that he knew that the vial in his possession contained drugs. The Supreme Court stated that the trial transcript showed that the police officers testifying for the state gave credible testimony that the behavior of the defendant was consistent with that of a person under the influence of drugs. Based on the testimony of the officers, the Supreme Court ruled that the trial court had properly submitted the case to the jury to determine the credibility and weight of conflicting testimony and that there was sufficient evidence for the jury to conclude that Wood knowingly possessed the drugs. St. v. Wood, 2008 MT 298, 345 M 487, 191 P3d 463 (2008).

Sufficient Evidence of Felony Criminal Mischief by Accountability — Denial of Directed Verdict Proper: Maetche had a rental contract for a mobile home and gave the owner 2 weeks’ notice of the intent to move out. During that 2-week period, the home sustained over $11,000 in damages. Maetche’s husband confessed to causing the damage, but Maetche was charged with felony criminal mischief by accountability. At the close of the state’s case, Maetche moved for a directed verdict, asserting that the state failed to present any evidence that, either before or during the damage, Maetche had “solicited, aided, abetted, agreed, or attempted to aid” in committing the damage and thus could not be held legally accountable. The District Court denied the motion and found Maetche guilty, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Circumstantial evidence placed Maetche at the crime scene while the damage was occurring, and an eyewitness observed Maetche removing a washer and dryer from the home, thereby contributing to the damage. This evidence, combined with direct evidence of the purposeful nature of the destruction, was sufficient to permit a rational trier of fact to conclude that Maetche was criminally accountable for other destruction to the home and thus guilty of criminal mischief beyond a reasonable doubt and provided a circumstantial basis for a determination that Maetche was also involved in destruction of other parts of the home as well. St. v. Maetche, 2008 MT 184, 343 M 464, 185 P3d 980 (2008), distinguishing St. v. Johnston, 267 M 474, 885 P2d 402 (1994), and St. v. Cochran, 1998 MT 138, 290 M 1, 964 P2d 707 (1998).

Sufficient Evidence of Sexual Assault to Submit Case to Jury: Bomar was charged with sexual intercourse without consent or alternatively with sexual assault. Following presentation of the state's case, Bomar contended that there was insufficient evidence to send the case to the jury. The trial court disagreed, and the jury found Bomar guilty of sexual assault. On appeal, Bomar reasserted his claim of insufficient evidence, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Despite some inconsistencies in the testimony of the child victim regarding whether penetration occurred, the evidence was sufficient to show that Bomar had sexual contact with the child and to send the case to the jury on the sexual assault charge. St. v. Bomar, 2008 MT 91, 342 M 281, 182 P3d 47 (2008), following St. v. York, 2003 MT 349, 318 M 511, 81 P3d 1277 (2003).

Sufficient Circumstantial Evidence to Show Essential Elements of Deliberate Homicide, Burglary, and Evidence Tampering to Warrant Jury Consideration: At the close of the state's case, Rosling moved for dismissal of deliberate homicide, burglary, and evidence tampering charges on grounds that the evidence was insufficient to send the case to the jury. The motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Rosling was with the victim the night of her death and was apparently the last person to see the victim alive. The victim was murdered at home, and a neighbor saw Rosling's car and a person matching Rosling's description at the home around the time of the murder. Footprints found at the home matched Rosling's shoes. The victim's father found the victim and discovered burning magazines beneath the victim, apparently left in an attempt to cover up the crime. A spot of the victim's blood was found on Rosling's coat, and other blood stains on the coat could not be ruled out as belonging to the victim. Rosling was unable to account for his whereabouts at the time of the murder and gave police inconsistent statements concerning his actions the night before and day of the murder. Although the evidence was circumstantial, it was sufficient to send the case to the jury, and the trial court did not err in denying Rosling's motion to dismiss on grounds of insufficient evidence. St. v. Rosling, 2008 MT 62, 342 M 1, 180 P3d 1102 (2008). See also St. v. Daniels, 2019 MT 214, 397 Mont. 204, 448 P.3d 511.

Sufficient Evidence of Issuing Bad Checks to Warrant Submission to Jury: At the close of the state's evidence in McWilliams' trial for issuing bad checks, McWilliams moved to dismiss for lack of sufficient evidence. The trial court denied the motion, and McWilliams appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Evidence showed that McWilliams issued checks upon a real depository but that the checks were not honored either because of insufficient funds or because McWilliams stopped payment. Viewed in the light most favorable to the prosecution, there was sufficient evidence that McWilliams issued bad checks to warrant submitting the issue to the jury, and the trial court did not err in denying the motion to dismiss. St. v. McWilliams, 2008 MT 59, 341 M 517, 178 P3d 121 (2008).

De Novo Standard of Review of Denial of Motion for Directed Verdict Not Abuse of Discretion: Prior to the present case, case law incorrectly assumed that use of the word "may" in this section left the determination of whether there was sufficient evidence to send the matter to the jury within the sound discretion of the trial court. However, when "may" is used in statute to confer power upon a court and the public has an interest in the exercise of power, then the exercise of the power becomes imperative. A trial court's conclusion as to whether sufficient evidence exists to convict is ultimately an analysis and application of the law to the facts. There either is, or is not, sufficient evidence to convict, and that determination is not a matter of discretion. Thus, the proper standard of review of denial of a motion for a directed verdict is de novo. St. v. Swann, 2007 MT 126, 337 M 326, 160 P3d 511 (2007), following St. v. Peplow, 2001 MT 253, 307 M 172, 36 P3d 922 (2001), overruling any prior cases to the extent that they stood for a different standard of review, and followed in St. v. Rosling, 2008 MT 62, 342 M 1, 180 P3d 1102 (2008).

Sufficient Evidence of Criminal Accountability — Motion for Directed Verdict on Grounds of Insufficient Evidence to Go to Jury Properly Denied: High Elk contended that there was insufficient evidence of accountability for assault with a weapon to send the case to the jury and moved for a directed verdict. The District Court denied the motion, and on appeal, the Supreme Court considered the record and affirmed. Evidence showed that High Elk was angry with the victim and argued with and punched the victim, preventing the victim's exit from a vehicle, at which time a friend of High Elk undisputedly stabbed the victim several times from the back seat of the vehicle, after which High Elk asked, "Did you get him?" A rational trier of fact could have found High Elk guilty of the elements of accountability, and the District Court did not err in allowing the case to go to the jury. St. v. High Elk, 2006 MT 6, 330 M 259, 127 P3d 432 (2006).

Sufficient Evidence to Submit Homicide Case to Jury — Directed Verdict Properly Denied: In a deliberate homicide trial, Smith asserted that the state failed to prove that he purposely and knowingly caused the death of another and that although the evidence may have established negligent homicide, there was an absence of proof that it was Smith's conscious object to cause the death, so Smith's motion for a directed verdict should have been granted. The evidence was conflicting, and some evidence was circumstantial but substantiated. However, without a complete absence of evidence to justify not sending the case to the jury, the trial court correctly declined to invade the province of the jury by directing the verdict. St. v. Smith, 2005 MT 325, 329 M 526, 127 P3d 353 (2005), followed in Adams v. St., 2007 MT 35, 336 M 63, 153 P3d 601 (2007).

Motion for Directed Verdict Following State's Case in Chief — Preservation of Issue for Appeal: Following the state's case in chief in McGarvey's deliberate homicide trial, McGarvey moved for a directed verdict based on insufficiency of the evidence because the two witnesses who testified regarding McGarvey's extrajudicial confession were patently unreliable, so corroboration should have been required to uphold their testimony. On appeal, the state contended that McGarvey failed to preserve the issue for appeal because he never raised the claim that the witnesses ought to be held unworthy of credit as a matter of law. The Supreme Court disagreed. By moving for a directed verdict on insufficiency of the evidence after the state concluded its case in chief, McGarvey preserved the issue for appeal. St. v. McGarvey, 2005 MT 308, 329 M 439, 124 P3d 1131 (2005).

Sufficient Evidence to Support Assault Convictions — Motion to Dismiss for Insufficient Evidence Properly Denied: Following the close of the state's case against McCaslin for aggravated assault and assault with a weapon, McCaslin moved to dismiss both counts on grounds of insufficient evidence, asserting that the state failed to prove that he purposely or knowingly caused bodily harm to another and that because he was not the aggressor, a self-defense argument was justified. The motion was denied, and the jury subsequently convicted McCaslin on both counts. On appeal, the Supreme Court reviewed the record and concluded that, with deference to the jury and in a light most favorable to the prosecution, a reasonable trier of fact could have found the essential elements of both crimes beyond a reasonable doubt. McCaslin's convictions were affirmed. St. v. McCaslin, 2004 MT 212, 322 M 350, 96 P3d 722 (2004).

Conflicting Evidence Regarding Falsification of Prison Payroll Records — Denial of Directed Verdict Proper: Struble was charged with falsifying payroll records at the state prison where he was employed. After the state presented its case, Struble moved for a directed verdict on grounds that: (1) no evidence was presented to show that he was not entitled to the payroll and benefits that he received; (2) there was no direct evidence linking him to the offense; (3) no witnesses testified that he was not working or engaged in employment at the times reported on his time cards; and (4) the logbooks on which the state relied were inaccurate, untrustworthy, and unreliable. The District Court denied the motion, and the Supreme Court affirmed. A directed verdict is proper only if reasonable persons could not conclude from the evidence taken in a light most favorable to the prosecution that guilt has been proved beyond a reasonable doubt. Here, the jury had considerable evidence that was susceptible to differing interpretations, and it was within the province of the jury to decide which interpretation would prevail, so the standard for granting a directed verdict was not satisfied. St. v. Struble, 2004 MT 107, 321 M 89, 90 P3d 971 (2004).

Circumstantial Evidence Supporting Conclusion That Victim Sustained Reasonable Apprehension of Bodily Injury: Defendant contended that a directed verdict motion should have been granted requesting dismissal of a partner or family member assault charge because no evidence was presented that the victim had sustained reasonable apprehension of bodily injury, which the state had to prove in order to meet its burden of proof. The standard for determining whether a person sustained reasonable apprehension of bodily injury is that of a reasonable person under similar circumstances. Direct evidence is not necessary to establish the elements of the offense. A conviction may be based entirely on circumstantial evidence, and direct proof of other facts may give rise to an inference that a victim sustained reasonable apprehension of bodily injury. In this case, the victim: (1) fled from her apartment with her dog over concern about defendant's past behavior; (2) locked herself in a neighbor's bathroom; (3) heard defendant scream that he was going to kill her; (4) observed knife holes that defendant was making in her apartment door; and (5) ultimately fled the building. From these facts a jury could find that the victim sustained reasonable apprehension of bodily injury, and denial of defendant's directed verdict motion was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Vukasin, 2003 MT 230, 317 M 204, 75 P3d 1284 (2003).

Substantial Evidence of Proof of Speeding in Construction Zone — Directed Verdict Properly Denied: Mathis was charged with speeding in a construction zone and, following submission of the state's case, moved for a directed verdict on grounds that the state failed to provide sufficient proof of the crime. The motion was denied, and Mathis appealed. The Supreme Court found sufficient proof that the elements of the crime had been proved. Administrative authority was properly granted to appropriate entities to set the applicable speed limit, and the proper requisite action was taken by the entities to establish a speed limit in accordance with state uniform traffic control guidelines and to adequately post the construction zone. A reasonable person could conclude that the state proved the elements of the offense; thus, Mathis's motion for a directed verdict was properly denied. St. v. Mathis, 2003 MT 112, 315 M 378, 68 P3d 756 (2003).

Criminal Cases — Directed Verdict Proper Only When No Evidence Supports Guilty Verdict — Sufficient Evidence of Mitigation Element of Mitigated Deliberate Homicide to Preclude Directed Verdict: After the state presented its evidence in Lamere's mitigated deliberate homicide trial, Lamere moved for a directed verdict, asserting that the state failed to prove the mitigation element of the crime. The District Court denied the motion on grounds that the state cannot be required to prove a mitigating factor and that sufficient evidence of mitigation had been presented to defeat the motion for directed verdict. Lamere appealed. On the first issue, the Supreme Court decided that the District Court erred, because when the state charges the offense of mitigated deliberate homicide, the state must prove every element of the crime, including the mitigation element, beyond a reasonable doubt. In contrast, when a defendant asserts mitigating circumstances as an affirmative defense, the defendant must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that mitigating factors exist. On the second issue, the Supreme Court noted that a District Court should grant a directed verdict of acquittal only when there is no evidence whatsoever to support a guilty verdict and if a reasonable person could not conclude from the evidence that, taken in a light most favorable to the prosecution, guilt has not been proved beyond a reasonable doubt. Whether the trial court or a reviewing court would have viewed the evidence or found the facts differently from the jury is not the appropriate inquiry; rather, what is dispositive is the existence of evidence from which the jury could have found the mitigation element proved beyond a reasonable doubt, and if the evidence is properly before the jury, then resolving conflicts in the evidence, judging the credibility of witnesses, and finding the facts are acts uniquely within the province of the jury and the verdict will not be disturbed on appeal unless there is no evidence whatsoever to support the verdict. In Lamere's case, a reasonable trier of fact could have found that a person engaged in a fight and subjected to a threat from another person who is wielding a gun or knife may experience and act under extreme mental or emotional stress for which there is a reasonable explanation or excuse. Thus, the mitigation element was proved and the denial of the directed verdict motion on grounds of insufficient evidence of mitigation was affirmed. The Supreme Court applied the same standard as in civil cases to this criminal case—that unless there is an absence of any credible evidence in support of a verdict, a motion for a directed verdict is inappropriate. St. v. Lamere, 2003 MT 49, 314 M 326, 67 P3d 192 (2003).

Denial of Motion for Directed Verdict on Grounds of Insufficient Evidence — Standard of Review: A denial of a motion for a directed verdict is within the sound discretion of the trial court. Denial of a motion to dismiss based on insufficient evidence is reviewed for an abuse of discretion. In reviewing the sufficiency of evidence, the court determines whether, upon viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the prosecution, any rational trier of fact could have found the essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Lamere, 2003 MT 49, 314 M 326, 67 P3d 192 (2003), followed in St. v. Hausauer, 2006 MT 336, 335 M 137, 149 P3d 895 (2006). The abuse of discretion standard of review of a motion for a directed verdict was replaced by the de novo standard of review in St. v. Swann, 2007 MT 126, 337 M 326, 160 P3d 511 (2007). See also St. v. Miller, 1998 MT 177, 290 M 97, 966 P2d 721 (1998).

Possibility That Statements Made During Custodial Interrogation, After Lawyer Requested, Contributed to Conviction — New Trial Warranted: Spang was charged in connection with a double homicide. He made statements to police after being read his rights at arrest and again 2 days later after requesting a lawyer. Spang moved to suppress the statements, but the motion was denied on grounds that Spang waived the right to counsel after voluntarily answering interrogators' questions on both occasions. Transcripts of the interrogations were made available to the jury, and Spang was subsequently convicted on two counts of intimidation by accountability, but appealed based on insufficiency of evidence. The Supreme Court reviewed the denial of the suppression motion to determine whether the trial court's findings of fact were clearly erroneous and whether they were correctly applied as a matter of law. Here, Spang's request for counsel was neither ambiguous nor equivocal, so cessation of questioning was required until Spang either reinitiated conversation with the officers or was provided an attorney. Because neither event occurred, the trial court erred when it denied Spang's motion to suppress the statements. To determine whether the error was prejudicial, the Supreme Court applied the test in St. v.

Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), determining in this case that the error was trial error, because it occurred during presentation of the case to the jury and was amenable to qualitative assessment for prejudicial impact relative to other evidence introduced at trial. Under the cumulative evidence test, the state was required to show admissible evidence that proved the same facts as the tainted evidence. Although there was other sufficient evidence tending to prove that Spang committed intimidation by accountability, qualitatively there existed a reasonable possibility that the statements that Spang made during the second interrogation contributed to his conviction because of the strong emphasis placed on those statements during trial. Therefore, the District Court committed reversible error when it admitted the statements during the state's case in chief. The case was remanded for a new trial, and the District Court was directed not to admit the statements made during the second interrogation. Statements from the first interrogation were admissible, however, because Spang had waived the right to counsel. Spang's argument that the first interrogation statements also be suppressed on unnecessary delay grounds failed, absent evidence that the delay between arrest and initial appearance influenced the voluntariness of those statements. St. v. Spang, 2002 MT 120, 310 M 52, 48 P3d 727 (2002), distinguishing St. v. Brubaker, 184 M 294, 602 P2d 974 (1979), and overruled, to the extent that the right to counsel for self-incrimination purposes may be invoked in custodial interrogation, in St. v. Buck, 2006 MT 81, 331 M 517, 134 P3d 53 (2006).

Proper Denial of Directed Verdict on Charges of Intimidation by Accountability: Spang moved for a directed verdict on charges of intimidation by accountability, contending that there was insufficient evidence to establish his accountability because there was no evidence to show that he aided in communicating any threat to the crime victims. The state asserted that the evidence was sufficient because it showed that Spang was not only present at the crime scene, but also took actions prior to and during the intimidation that aided in the commission of the crimes. The District Court denied a directed verdict, Spang appealed, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Although mere presence at a crime scene is not enough to establish accountability, an accused need not take an active part in any overt criminal acts to be adjudged criminally liable for the acts. Further, although mere presence and the failure to disapprove or oppose another's commission of an offense are insufficient to sustain an accountability charge, those factors may be considered along with other circumstances that might indicate that the accused in some way aided or abetted the principal in the commission of the crime. Here, Spang was not only associated with the principal prior to commission of a double homicide and present at the scene of the crime, but he also unloaded and reloaded a rifle used to intimidate the victims, helped collect items from the victim's garage, pulled telephone wires from the victim's wall, and failed to oppose or disapprove commission of the crimes—sufficient evidence upon which a rational trier of fact could find beyond a reasonable doubt the Spang committed two offenses of intimidation by accountability. St. v. Spang, 2002 MT 120, 310 M 52, 48 P3d 727 (2002). See also St. v. Hart, 191 M 375, 625 P2d 21 (1981), and St. v. Miller, 231 M 497, 757 P2d 1275 (1988).

Evidence of Flight Unacceptable as Sole Corroboration of Inconsistent Statement: After Giant's conviction of aggravated assault for attacking his wife in her home, he moved for dismissal on grounds that the evidence was insufficient to convict him as a matter of law because evidence of flight was the only corroboration of the prior inconsistent statements of the victim identifying him as the assailant. The victim initially identified Giant as the assailant in pretrial statements, but at trial, she identified her son as the attacker. No forensic testing was performed on evidence seized from the home, and there was no other testimony to corroborate either statement. The state argued, and the trial court agreed, that undisputed testimony of Giant's flight behavior was sufficient to corroborate the victim's prior inconsistent statements and that evidence seized from the home matched her statements. When considering a motion for a directed verdict to determine whether any rational trier of fact could find the elements of a crime satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, the Supreme Court will consider trial testimony and the evidence properly admitted and before the jury according to the criminal rules of evidence, but will not consider potential unintroduced evidence or other evidence outside the trial setting. A criminal conviction cannot be sustained when the only evidence of some essential element of a crime is a prior inconsistent statement. In Montana, all prior inconsistent statements are admissible as substantive evidence under Rule 801(d)(1)(A), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10); however, prior inconsistent statements admitted as substantive evidence of guilt must be corroborated in order to sustain a conviction. Evidence of flight is not sufficient in itself to prove guilt or to support a conviction as a matter of law because evidence of flight by itself is as consistent with innocence as it is with guilt. Therefore, evidence of flight cannot be the sole corroboration of a prior inconsistent statement admitted as substantive evidence of guilt. Here, the physical evidence recovered from the home and photographs of the victim's injury, which would normally be sufficient corroborating evidence, were insufficient because they did not corroborate the essential element of identity because the victim identified another possible assailant. Further, the victim's prior inconsistent statements alone were insufficient as a matter of law to support Giant's conviction, in light of evidence that the victim stopped cooperating with the County Attorney's office when Giant was released on bail and asked that the case be dismissed after her divorce proceedings against Giant were voluntarily dismissed—actions that affected the reliability of the prior inconsistent statements but did not independently corroborate the statements. Giant's conviction was reversed. St. v. Giant, 2001 MT 245, 307 M 74, 37 P3d 49 (2001). See also St. v. White Water, 194 M 85, 634 P2d 636 (1981).

Sufficient Circumstantial Evidence of Deliberate Homicide — Motion for Directed Verdict Properly Denied: At the end of the state's case in chief in Clausell's deliberate homicide trial, Clausell moved for a directed verdict on grounds that the state failed to introduce evidence upon which the jury could conclude that Clausell knowingly or purposely caused his girlfriend's death. The District Court denied the motion, which Clausell contended on appeal was an abuse of discretion because gunshot residue tests failed to establish who was holding the gun when it discharged, there was no other evidence that Clausell was the shooter, there was no well-established motive to prove intent, and there was no evidence of flight. The Supreme Court agreed with the state that there was sufficient circumstantial evidence from which any rational trier of fact could infer that Clausell was holding the gun and that he acted knowingly or purposely. The court also noted that neither motive nor flight is an element of deliberate homicide. Clausell recounted at least eight different versions of the facts that were inconsistent with each other and with the physical evidence. When viewed in the light most favorable to the state, the record showed ample circumstantial evidence that Clausell committed the crime, and denial of the motion for a directed verdict was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Clausell, 2001 MT 62, 305 M 1, 22 P3d 111 (2001). The abuse of discretion standard of review of a motion for a directed verdict was replaced by the de novo standard of review in St. v. Swann, 2007 MT 126, 337 M 326, 160 P3d 511 (2007). See also St. v. Lancione, 1998 MT 84, 288 M 228, 956 P2d 1358 (1998).

No Abuse of Discretion in Failure to Dismiss Case on Court's Own Motion for Insufficient Evidence: Brady was charged with DUI, fourth or subsequent offense, arising from circumstances surrounding a single-vehicle accident in which Brady swerved off the highway, hit a rock wall, and rolled the vehicle. After the state's case in chief, Brady moved for a directed verdict of acquittal, but the motion was denied. Brady was subsequently convicted and contended on appeal that the trial court erred when it did not dismiss the case on its own motion because the evidence was far from overwhelming, arguing that taken as a whole, the evidence was insufficient to submit to the jury because there was no direct or even circumstantial evidence that he had anything to drink, much less was intoxicated, at the time of the accident. However, there was circumstantial evidence of conduct before and after the accident that could have led the jury to believe Brady had been drinking. When circumstantial evidence is susceptible to differing interpretations, it is within the province of the jury to decide which will prevail. The jury apparently did not believe that the wreck happened because Brady's car malfunctioned, that his injuries accounted for his drunken behavior, or that his apparent intoxication when officers tracked him down at home after the accident was the consequence of a single beer that he drank after the accident. Taken in a light most favorable to the state, a reasonable juror could have found Brady guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, and it was not error for the trial court to allow the evidence to go to the jury. St. v. Brady, 2000 MT 282, 302 M 174, 13 P3d 941, 57 St. Rep. 1178 (2000). The abuse of discretion standard of review of a motion for a directed verdict was replaced by the de novo standard of review in St. v. Swann, 2007 MT 126, 337 M 326, 160 P3d 511 (2007).

Motion to Dismiss Based on Insufficient Evidence of Negligent Homicide Properly Denied — Deviation From Reasonableness Standard Sufficient to Support Finding of Negligent Conduct: After consuming at least five shots of brandy and four beers at a tavern, Davis hit and killed a pedestrian on the way home, then left the accident scene. Upon arriving home, he told his girlfriend that he had hit a deer. He then ate dinner and went to bed. Davis was later charged with negligent homicide and failure to remain at the scene of an accident that resulted in death or personal injuries. Following presentation of the state's case, Davis moved for dismissal based on insufficient evidence, which was denied. Davis was convicted and appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that a rational trier of fact could have found the essential elements of negligent homicide beyond a reasonable doubt based on evidence that Davis consciously disregarded the risk posed by his driving under the influence of alcohol (even though blood alcohol content could not be tested because he left the scene) and that Davis's conduct immediately before, during, and after the accident revealed a gross deviation from the standard of conduct that a reasonable person not under the influence of alcohol would have observed. St. v. Davis, 2000 MT 199, 300 M 458, 5 P3d 547, 57 St. Rep. 773 (2000), followed in St. v. English, 2006 MT 177, 333 M 23, 140 P3d 454 (2006).

Motion to Dismiss on Grounds of Insufficient Evidence Properly Denied: When it was clear from the record that a reasonable juror could have concluded from the evidence taken in a light most favorable to the prosecution that guilt on several counts was proved beyond a reasonable doubt, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's motion for a directed verdict of acquittal, and further prosecution was not barred on double jeopardy grounds. St. v. Hovevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000). The abuse of discretion standard of review of a motion for a directed verdict was replaced by the de novo standard of review in St. v. Swann, 2007 MT 126, 337 M 326, 160 P3d 511 (2007). See also St. v. Bromgard, 261 M 291, 862 P2d 1140 (1993), and St. v. Campbell, 278 M 236, 924 P2d 1304 (1996).

Sufficient Circumstantial Evidence to Justify Aggravated Assault Charge — Directed Verdict Properly Denied: At the conclusion of the state's evidence on Hall's aggravated assault charge, Hall moved for a directed verdict of acquittal based on the contention that because only circumstantial evidence had been offered, under this section, the action should have been dismissed. Under this section, dismissal of an action based on insufficient evidence is within the discretion of the court. After examining the trial transcript, the Supreme Court found that the evidence, although circumstantial, when viewed in the light most favorable to the prosecution, was sufficient for any rational trier of fact to find that Hall committed the essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt. The trial court did not err in denying Hall's motion for directed verdict. St. v. Hall, 1999 MT 297, 297 M 111, 991 P2d 929, 56 St. Rep. 1190 (1999), following St. v. Arthun, 274 M 82, 906 P2d 216, 52 St. Rep. 1133 (1995). The abuse of discretion standard of review of a motion for a directed verdict was replaced by the de novo standard of review in St. v. Swann, 2007 MT 126, 337 M 326, 160 P3d 511 (2007).

Identity of Perpetrator — Hearsay Testimony of Child Held Sufficient: Heen became suspicious that his 33-month-old granddaughter, Cassie, had been sexually abused by her stepfather, Osborne, Heen's son-in-law. Heen and his daughter, Jamie, Cassie's mother, talked to Cassie, who said or indicated to either or both Heen and Jamie that she had played with "daddy's rubber duck" and that the rubber duck was Osborne's genitalia. Cassie also gave information tending to implicate Heen, whom she called "Papa", as opposed to Osborne, whom she called "Daddy". Cassie's hearsay testimony was also that "Daddy is yucky" and to the effect that Cassie was afraid of Osborne. A medical examination showed that Cassie had physical injuries consistent with sexual abuse. The District Court interviewed Cassie and found her unable to testify because she was extremely shy and was intimidated by the courtroom. The state relied upon the hearsay testimony by Heen and Jamie, and based upon that hearsay evidence, Osborne was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent. The Supreme Court held that when the evidence is viewed in a light most favorable to the state, there was sufficient evidence from which a rational jury could have found beyond a reasonable doubt that Osborne was the perpetrator of the offense, even though there was no direct physical evidence connecting Osborne with the crime. Concerning Osborne's objection that the evidence did not conclusively show that Osborne had penetrated Cassie with his penis, the Supreme Court held that under the language of the statute, penetration by a different object made no difference. St. v. Osborne, 1999 MT 149, 295 M 54, 982 P2d 1045, 56 St. Rep. 589 (1999), followed in St. v. McAlister, 2016 MT 14, 382 Mont. 129, 365 P.3d 1062, in which the Supreme Court held that the lack of physical evidence did not negate the sufficiency of the victim's oral testimony.

"Repeatedly" Means "More Than Once" in Stalking Statute: McCarthy was convicted of stalking and, while incarcerated, twice tried to contact the victim by letter, but the victim did not read the letters. He was charged with stalking, second offense. At trial, he moved to dismiss on grounds that two instances of attempted contact by letter were insufficient to support a stalking conviction. Legislative intent and the common definition of "repeatedly" persuaded the Supreme Court that the state need demonstrate only more than one instance of harassment, intimidation, or threat. The motion to dismiss was properly denied. St. v. McCarthy, 1999 MT 99, 294 M 270, 980 P2d 629, 56 St. Rep. 418 (1999).

Circumstantial Evidence of Assault Insufficient — Motion for Directed Verdict Granted: The victim denied that his girlfriend, Cochran, had stabbed him with a pair of scissors. The state offered circumstantial evidence showing a likelihood that Cochran had been the perpetrator and that the victim's story was not supported by any physical evidence. The Supreme Court held that the trial court had erred in not granting the defendant's motion for dismissal because the state's evidence was not conclusive in showing that no one but the defendant could have committed the crime. St. v. Cochran, 1998 MT 138, 290 M 1, 964 P2d 707, 55 St. Rep. 551 (1998).

Mere Proximity Insufficient to Establish Connection Between Common Items and Illegal Drug Activity — Burden of Proof Required in Criminal Forfeiture Proceedings: Before the state may criminally convict a citizen and deprive that citizen of property by forfeiture under 45-9-206, the state must establish, by direct or circumstantial evidence, a more substantial connection between common household items and illegal drug activity than merely their proximity to one another in a residence. The state must prove not only that the property has the required statutory connection to illegal drug activity, but also that each specific item seized is subject to forfeiture. Criminal forfeiture based on nothing more than a justifiable suspicion cannot be affirmed, nor is a suggestion of guilt by association sufficient to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that a statutory connection exists between the property and the drug activity. The kind and amount of circumstantial evidence offered in the present case were insufficient as a matter of law to warrant the jury's finding of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Therefore, defendant's motion to dismiss, on grounds of insufficient evidence that the property was subject to forfeiture, should have been granted. St. v. Hegg, 1998 MT 100, 288 M 254, 956 P2d 754, 55 St. Rep. 391 (1998).

Driver Asleep at Wheel of Pickup Not Running — Sufficiency of Evidence: Testimony of a peace officer that when he shook awake a driver slumped over the wheel of a parked pickup that was not running, the driver started the engine and of the driver's wife that when she left the truck after an argument, she threw him keys belonging to her son and that they contained a worn key that could fit defendant's pickup (she had parked the pickup and took the keys with her when she started to leave) was sufficient for the jury to find that defendant was in actual physical control of the pickup and to convict him of DUI. St. v. Hagen, 283 M 156, 939 P2d 994, 54 St. Rep. 542 (1997).

DNA and Other Evidence Held Sufficient to Convict on Sexual Intercourse Without Consent: Weeks was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with his stepdaughter. The conviction was based upon DNA evidence and testimony of the stepdaughter. That evidence showed that Weeks had intercourse with the stepdaughter, the stepdaughter did not have intercourse with anyone else, the stepdaughter had a baby, and Weeks was up to 1.9 million times more likely to be the baby's father than any other randomly chosen male. The District Court was therefore correct in refusing to grant a directed verdict of acquittal. St. v. Weeks, 270 M 63, 891 P2d 477, 52 St. Rep. 78 (1995).

Circumstantial Evidence of Child Abuse — Motion for Directed Verdict Properly Denied: Mergenthaler was charged with negligent homicide of Ashley, a 13-month-old female. The state's evidence showed that Ashley suffered injuries to her skull and brain that were attributed by all of the state's medical experts to "whiplash shaken infant syndrome" and not to a fall from a couch, as claimed by Mergenthaler. Citing St. v. Haskins, 255 M 202, 841 P2d 542 (1992), the Supreme Court held that a directed verdict was appropriate only when there was no evidence to support a guilty verdict and that in this case, there was strong circumstantial evidence that Mergenthaler's conduct was the cause of Ashley's death. St. v. Mergenthaler, 263 M 198, 868 P2d 560, 51 St. Rep. 13 (1994).

Evidence of Possession and Circumstances Sufficient to Support Burglary Conviction: The defendant moved for a directed verdict at the close of the state's case against him on burglary charges. The Supreme Court held that although evidence of possession alone was not sufficient to support a burglary conviction, there was sufficiently strong circumstantial evidence of guilt to justify submitting the case to the jury. St. v. Floyd, 243 M 269, 790 P2d 475, 47 St. Rep. 720 (1990).

Sufficient Evidence of Speeding and Reckless Driving — Motion for Acquittal Denied: Defendant contended his motion for acquittal on charges of speeding and reckless driving should have been granted because the officer in pursuit did not use his siren and because defendant never saw the officer's flashing lights. The motion was properly denied on evidence that another officer saw the flashing lights from 2 miles away, occupants in defendant's car were aware of the pursuit and of defendant's speeding, and use of the siren was not mandatory. St. v. Keil, 231 M 187, 751 P2d 680, 45 St. Rep. 532 (1988).

Use of Weapon in Aggravated Assault Case as Sufficient Evidence to Preclude Dismissal: In a case of aggravated assault, evidence that a weapon was used in conjunction with threats was sufficient to preclude dismissal at the close of the state's case. St. v. Matson, 227 M 36, 736 P2d 971, 44 St. Rep. 874 (1987), distinguished in St. v. Clemo, 1999 MT 323, 297 M 316, 992 P2d 1263, 56 St. Rep. 1292 (1999).

Prima Facie Showing of Knowledge of Insufficient Funds in Checking Account: Sufficient evidence was presented in the prosecution's case in chief to indicate that defendant was aware that it was highly probable that his checks would not be paid by the banks upon which they were written. This evidence included bank statements showing significant negative balances, numerous overdraft notices mailed to the defendant, numerous certified letters sent to defendant notifying him of the overdrafts and requesting payment, and the fact that numerous checks remained unpaid at the time of the trial. St. v. McHugh, 215 M 296, 697 P2d 466, 42 St. Rep. 371 (1985).

Oral Statement by Judge Not a Finding of Fact: At the close of evidence in a misdemeanor assault nonjury trial, the court made an oral statement that the defendant could have and did hit the victim. The court then requested briefs on the issue of justification. A month later the court vacated its factual finding and dismissed the charge. Because the court was still in the process of its judicial determination of facts and law when it made the oral statement, it could properly vacate its statement. St. v. Nicholls, 200 M 144, 649 P2d 1346, 39 St. Rep. 1635 (1982).

Dismissal Discretionary: Defendant moved for a dismissal of a rape charge due to insufficient evidence. The general rule in Montana is that a directed verdict of acquittal is appropriate in criminal cases only where the State fails to prove its case and there is no evidence upon which a jury could base its verdict. The decision whether to dismiss the charge or direct a verdict of acquittal lies within the sound discretion of the trial court and will be disturbed on appeal only when abuse is shown. St. v. Goltz, 197 M 361, 642 P2d 1079, 39 St. Rep. 613 (1982), and St. v. Smith, 187 M 245, 609 P2d 696 (1980), following St. v. Yoss, 146 M 508, 409 P2d 452 (1965), and St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979), and followed in St. v. Graves, 241 M 533, 788 P2d 311, 47 St. Rep. 483 (1990). The abuse of discretion standard of review of a motion for a directed verdict was replaced by the de novo standard of review in St. v. Swann, 2007 MT 126, 337 M 326, 160 P3d 511 (2007). See also St. v. Romannose, 281 M 84, 931 P2d 1304, 54 St. Rep. 72 (1997), and St. v. Miller, 1998 MT 177, 290 M 97, 966 P2d 721, 55 St. Rep. 719 (1998).

Guilt Based Solely on Unreliable Prior Inconsistent Statement: An unreliable prior inconsistent statement of a witness should not be the sole substantive evidence upon which a jury is allowed to base guilt, and a conviction supported only by a prior inconsistent statement should not be allowed to stand. St. v. White Water, 194 M 85, 634 P2d 636, 38 St. Rep. 1664 (1981), clarified in St. v. Giant, 2001 MT 245, 307 M 74, 37 P3d 49 (2001), which required that prior inconsistent statements admitted as substantive evidence of guilt be corroborated in order to sustain a conviction. See also St. v. Oliver, 2022 MT 104, 408 Mont. 519, 510 P.3d 1218.

Standards for Deciding Directed Verdict Motion: A directed verdict for defendant should be granted only where there is no evidence upon which a jury could base a verdict; that is, the defendant is entitled to an acquittal if reasonable men could not conclude from the evidence taken in a light most favorable to the prosecution that guilt has been proved beyond a reasonable doubt. The ruling on the motion will be disturbed on appeal only when abuse of trial court's sound discretion to decide the motion is shown. St. v. White Water, 194 M 85, 634 P2d 636, 38 St. Rep. 1664 (1981), followed in St. v. Howie, 228 M 497, 744 P2d 156, 44 St. Rep. 1711 (1987), and St. v. Salois, 235 M 276, 766 P2d 1306, 45 St. Rep. 2382 (1988). The abuse of discretion standard of review of a motion for a directed verdict was replaced by the de novo standard of review in St. v. Swann, 2007 MT 126, 337 M 326, 160 P3d 511 (2007).

Statutory Rape Not Proven Solely by Unreliable Prior Inconsistent Statement: Charge of sexual intercourse without consent was properly dismissed at the end of the State's presentation of its case where the only evidence upon which conviction could be based was an unreliable prior statement of the alleged victim that was inconsistent with her testimony at trial in which she repudiated the statement. St. v. White Water, 194 M 85, 634 P2d 636, 38 St. Rep. 1664 (1981).

Substantial Circumstantial Evidence to Infer Burglary: Even though the evidence concerning a burglary by the defendant was circumstantial, the evidence was substantial enough to support the crime of burglary. Further, the quality of the state's evidence was sufficient to meet its burden of proof. The question, following Jackson v. Va., 443 US 307, 61 L Ed 2d 560, 99 S Ct 2781 (1979), is whether after viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the prosecution, any rational trier of fact could have found the essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Roberts, 194 M 189, 633 P2d 1214, 38 St. Rep. 1551 (1981), cited in St. v. Miller, 231 M 497, 757 P2d 1275, 45 St. Rep. 790 (1988).

Sexual Assault Erroneously Dismissed — "Sexual Contact" Construed: The Supreme Court reversed the District Court's decision to grant defendant's motion for dismissal under this section of a sexual assault charge and held that the sexual contact proscribed by 45-5-502 is not limited to a touching of the anal or genital area of a male or female or the breast of a female. Looking to the purpose of the statute, the court found that the definition of “sexual contact” encompasses the rubbing of the belly and chest of a prepubescent female child because of the societal concern for such impositions and their resultant outrage, disgust, or shame in the victim. St. v. Weese, 189 M 464, 616 P2d 371, 37 St. Rep. 1620 (1980).

Sufficient Evidence of Rape: It was not reversible error for the lower court to deny the defendant's motion for a directed verdict on the grounds that there was not sufficient evidence to support the charge of sexual intercourse without consent. There was no question that a rape occurred, and numerous items of evidence adduced at trial tended to prove that the defendant committed the crime. St. v. Pendergrass, 189 M 127, 615 P2d 201 (1980).

Circumstantial Evidence: Circumstantial evidence is not always inferior in quality nor is it necessarily relegated to a second-class status in the consideration to be given it. The fact that it is circumstantial is not a sufficient allegation to justify a reversal of the judgment, for such evidence may be and frequently is most convincing and satisfactory. In determining the sufficiency of circumstantial evidence to make a case for the jury and to sustain a conviction, all of the facts and circumstances must be taken into consideration collectively. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980).

Sufficient Evidence of Theft: In a theft proceeding, if the evidence shows that defendant was in possession of recently stolen property, either singly or jointly with others, an inference of guilt is warranted. Evidence of exclusiveness of possession by the defendant is not rebutted merely by showing another's presence. Where this evidence is presented, there is sufficient evidence to send the case to the jury, and the trial court may properly reject a motion to dismiss for failure to establish a prima facie case and the verdict, supported by substantial evidence, will be upheld on appeal. St. v. White, 185 M 213, 605 P2d 191 (1980).

Motion to Dismiss — Province of Jury and Court: It is within the province of the jury, not the court, to weigh the evidence. The decision upon a motion to dismiss is within the discretion of the court. St. v. Buckley, 171 M 238, 557 P2d 283 (1976). The abuse of discretion standard of review of a motion for a directed verdict was replaced by the de novo standard of review in St. v. Swann, 2007 MT 126, 337 M 326, 160 P3d 511 (2007).

Corroborated Admission of Guilt: The court properly denied the defendant's motion for an acquittal for the failure of the State to present sufficient evidence because the defendant admitted shooting the victim and witnesses testified that the defendant, after quarreling with the victim, had driven home to get a gun in order to accomplish the slaying. St. v. French, 166 M 196, 531 P2d 373 (1975).

Utter Lack of Proof by State: When there is an utter failure or lack of evidence to establish the state's case, the court may direct the jury to return a verdict for the defendant. St. v. Widdicombe, 130 M 325, 301 P2d 1116 (1956).

46-16-410. Settlement of jury instructions.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute consolidates several provisions into one statute concerning the settlement of instructions. The statute contains elements from both the 1987 code and the federal rule. Compare 1987 MCA 46-16-401, Rule 30, Fed. R. Crim. P., and this statute. While some changes in established procedure may be anticipated, the prevailing practice is adopted by this statute.

Case Notes

Defendant Not Entitled to Jury Instruction on Testimony of Jailhouse Informants — Proposed Instruction Named Informants and Directed Jury to Scrutinize Their Testimony in Particular — District Court Did Not Err by Giving Several Pattern Instructions on Witness Credibility Instead. St. v. Hardy, 2023 MT 110, 412 Mont. 383, 530 P.3d 814.

Refusal to Issue Jury Instructions Instructing Jury to Consider Youth Characteristics in Determining Youth's Culpability — No Abuse of Discretion: The Youth Court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to instruct the jury to consider youth characteristics in determining the defendant's guilt. The Supreme Court declined to extend jurisprudence regarding consideration of youth characteristics during sentencing to a Youth Court jury's determination of guilt or innocence. In re J.W., 2021 MT 291, 406 Mont. 224, 498 P.3d 211.

Getaway Driver Accountable for Robbery — Specificity of Charging Documents — Jury Instructions: The defendant was convicted of accountability for robbery after serving as the getaway driver. On appeal, the defendant argued that he was never specifically charged with and convicted of a subelement of accountability for robbery, that the jury instruction was improper because it did not require the jury to reach unanimity with regard to a specific element of robbery, and that the jury instruction regarding a getaway driver was inaccurate. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that the charging documents and jury instruction provided accountability for any of the subelements of the crime and there was ample evidence that each subelement was satisfied, that the defendant failed to object to the robbery instruction's lack of a unanimity requirement and a plain error review was not warranted, and that the getaway driver jury instruction gave a full and fair explanation of the law. St. v. Hanna, 2014 MT 346, 377 Mont. 418, 341 P.3d 629.

Criminal Endangerment and Failure to Act — Parent-Child Duty Applicable to Children in Cohabiting Households: A jury convicted the defendant of criminal endangerment for swinging her boyfriend's 6-month-old child headfirst against the child's crib, causing serious bodily injury to the child. On appeal, the defendant argued that the District Court erred in instructing the jury on criminal endangerment predicated on the defendant's failure or omission to act because the defendant had no legal duty to aid the child. Following the rationale of St. ex rel. Kuntz v. District Court, 2000 MT 22, 298 Mont. 146, 995 P.2d 951, which recognized a mutual reliance duty owed between two people who were not closely related but lived together, the Supreme Court held that the parent-child duty applies to children present in households of cohabiting adults. Because the defendant established a personal relationship similar to that of a parent with the victim, a common-law duty to protect the victim from harm existed, and the defendant's breach of that duty constituted an appropriate basis for her conviction of criminal endangerment. St. v. Hocter, 2011 MT 251, 362 Mont. 215, 262 P.3d 1089.

No Duty to Instruct Jury of Lesser Included Offense Absent Request by Parties: The defendant appealed a jury conviction of criminal endangerment. On appeal the defendant alleged that the District Court should have on its own initiative instructed the jury as to the lesser offense of negligent endangerment. During the trial, the defendant did not raise an objection. Pursuant to 46-16-410(3), absent request by the parties, the trial court has no duty to instruct the jury on a lesser included offense. St. v. Parrish, 2010 MT 212, 357 Mont. 477, 241 P.3d 1041.

District Court Justified in Refusing to Give Defendant's Proposed Jury Instruction on Missing Evidence: The defendant, charged with attempted sexual intercourse without consent, argued that the District Court erred in refusing to give a jury instruction on the police's failure to conduct a rape examination or to collect the victim's bedding. The Supreme Court held that the defendant was not prejudiced by the refusal because the defendant's DNA was found under the victim's fingernails where she scratched him and the defendant did not deny entering her apartment. State v. Gunderson, 2010 MT 166, 357 Mont. 142, 237 P.3d 74.

Defendant's Presence Not Required During Settling of Jury Instructions: This section specifically allows for a defendant's absence during the settling of jury instructions without the need for the trial court to obtain the defendant's voluntary, intelligent, and knowing waiver of the right to be present during this critical stage of the proceedings. St. v. Roedel, 2007 MT 291, 339 M 489, 171 P3d 694 (2007).

Sufficient Evidence to Submit Homicide Case to Jury — Directed Verdict Properly Denied: In a deliberate homicide trial, Smith asserted that the state failed to prove that he purposely and knowingly caused the death of another and that although the evidence may have established negligent homicide, there was an absence of proof that it was Smith's conscious object to cause the death, so Smith's motion for a directed verdict should have been granted. The evidence was conflicting, and some evidence was circumstantial but substantiated. However, without a complete absence of evidence to justify not sending the case to the jury, the trial court correctly declined to invade the province of the jury by directing the verdict. St. v. Smith, 2005 MT 325, 329 M 526, 127 P3d 353 (2005), followed in Adams v. St., 2007 MT 35, 336 M 63, 153 P3d 601 (2007).

Failure to Raise Double Jeopardy Objection at Settling of Jury Instructions or to Object to Verdict Form in Which Offenses Listed as Separate Counts — Appeal Precluded: Minez was convicted of both criminal possession and criminal production of dangerous drugs. On appeal, Minez argued that conviction of both offenses, which arose out of the same transaction, constituted double jeopardy. However, at trial, Minez abandoned a request for jury instructions on double jeopardy and never returned to the issue, failed to raise a double jeopardy objection at the settling of jury instructions, and did not object to the verdict form in which both offenses were listed as independent counts. Having abandoned the constitutional double jeopardy objections at trial, Minez was precluded from raising the issue on appeal, and the convictions were affirmed. St. v. Minez, 2004 MT 115, 321 M 148, 89 P3d 966 (2004), followed in St. v. Johnson, 2010 MT 288, 359 Mont. 15, 245 P.3d 1113.

Failure to Give Defendant's Instruction on Testimony of Informants Not Erroneous: At a homicide trial, DuBray offered a jury instruction that would have required the jury to determine whether the testimony of each of several informants had been affected by the witness's self-interest, by any agreement with the state, by the witness's own interest in the outcome of the case, or by prejudice against DuBray, citing St. v. Grimes, 1999 MT 145, 295 M 22, 982 P2d 1037 (1999). The trial court refused that cautionary instruction and gave one offered by the state instead, consistent with St. v. Long, 274 M 228, 907 P2d 945 (1995), which adequately addressed the credibility of informants, "witness motive, bias or prejudice, and bad character for truthfulness". On appeal, DuBray contended that without his proposed instruction, the jury instructions were incomplete. The Supreme Court noted that Grimes and Long were not inconsistent and that the jury instruction that was given fully and fairly instructed the jury. St. v. DuBray, 2003 MT 255, 317 M 377, 77 P3d 247 (2003). See also St. v. Hardy, 2023 MT 110, 412 Mont. 383, 530 P.3d 814, refusing the defendant's proposed instruction on jailhouse informant testimony.

Failure by State to Articulate Permissible Purpose for Introduction of Evidence of Other Crimes — Lack of Proof of Defendant's Knowledge of Fact of Consequence: During pretrial proceedings for Dobson's trial for sexual intercourse without consent, the state indicated its intent to introduce evidence that Dobson had been previously charged with sexual intercourse without consent with a minor. The purported purpose was for proof of knowledge or the absence of mistake or accident, establishing that Dobson knew that someone under 16 years of age could not legally consent to sexual intercourse. Instead of objecting, defense counsel offered to stipulate that Dobson did have knowledge of that fact. The state objected that Dobson should not be able to stipulate away its case, and urged that the jury instructions contain details of the prior charge. The trial court declined the specific instructions offered by both Dobson and the state and fashioned and gave its own instruction, advising the jury that Dobson was previously charged with sexual intercourse without consent with a minor and thus had knowledge of the law, but instructing that the evidence was not to be construed by the jury as evidence of Dobson's character, but only as evidence of Dobson's prior knowledge that such conduct was criminal. On appeal, Dobson contended that the instruction was erroneous. The Supreme Court agreed that the trial court abused its discretion in giving the instruction because it did not meet the third criteria of the modified Just rule (see St. v. Matt, 249 M 136, 814 P2d 52 (1991)). Although it appeared at first blush that the state asserted permissible purposes of knowledge or the absence of mistake or accident for the admission of other crimes evidence, merely reciting an allowable purpose is not sufficient if the evidence does not further that purpose or if that purpose is not an issue in dispute (see St. v. Weldy, 273 M 68, 902 P2d 1 (1995)). Rather, as set out in U.S. v. Mehrmanesh, 689 F2d 822 (9th Cir. 1982), the state must articulate precisely the evidential hypothesis by which a fact of consequence may be inferred from the other acts evidence, which in this case, the state did not do. Dobson's knowledge of the law that it is a felony offense to have sexual intercourse with someone under 16 years of age was not a fact of consequence to the action. Thus, admission of the evidence via the jury instruction was reversible error, and the case was remanded for a new trial. St. v. Dobson, 2001 MT 167, 306 M 145, 30 P3d 1077 (2001). See also St. v. Anderson, 275 M 344, 912 P2d 801 (1996).

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel in Failure to Offer "Failure to Agree" Instruction — Prejudice Warranting Remand for New Trial: At Rogers' trial for attempted sexual intercourse without consent and felony assault, the District Court provided jury instructions with misdemeanor sexual assault and misdemeanor assault as lesser included offenses. Rogers' attorney requested the "acquittal first" instruction, which provided that the jury was not to consider the lesser included offenses unless they first acquitted on the greater offenses. Rogers contended that the failure of the attorney to request the "failure to agree" instruction allowed under 46-16-607, which provides that the jury may consider a lesser included offense if it is unable to reach a verdict on the greater offense, constituted ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court agreed. The "failure to agree" instruction was drafted to protect against the serious risk identified in U.S. v. Jackson, 726 F2d 1466 (9th Cir. 1984), which arises when jurors harboring a doubt as to defendant's guilt of the greater offense, but at the same time convinced that defendant had committed some offense, might wrongly yield to the majority and convict of the greater offense rather than not convict at all. The failure to offer this potentially beneficial instruction, when that failure is not part of counsel's trial strategy, is an error so serious that it falls outside the range of competence required of attorneys in criminal cases. Thus, when sufficient facts exist to support a conviction for a lesser included offense, defense counsel must offer the "failure to agree" instruction unless there is a tactical reason for not doing so, and failure to offer the instruction in such cases is prejudicial error. St. v. Rogers, 2001 MT 165, 306 M 130, 32 P3d 724 (2001).

Jury Instruction Disallowing Evidence of Intoxication in Determining State of Mind Not Error — Full and Fair Instructions on Law: Following Raugust's criminal trial, the court instructed the jury that it could not consider evidence of intoxication for any purpose, pursuant to 45-2-203. Raugust maintained on appeal that the instruction was in error because depriving him of the ability to admit intoxication evidence lessened the state's burden of proof and confused the jury, in violation of his due process rights. However, the error urged on appeal was not contained in the objection made to the instruction during the final settling of jury instructions, constituting waiver of the argument on appeal. Moreover, the plain error doctrine did not apply because review under that doctrine was requested for the first time on appeal. Here, the jury was instructed regarding: (1) the elements of each offense charged and the state's burden of proving each element beyond a reasonable doubt; (2) the definition of the applicable mental states—purposely and knowingly; (3) the fact that the existence of a mental state may be inferred from the acts of the accused and from the facts and circumstances connected with the offense; (4) the difference between direct and circumstantial evidence; (5) witness credibility; and (6) the need for a unanimous verdict. Read as a whole, these instructions fairly and fully instructed the jury on the law applicable to the case, and giving the instruction disallowing the defense of intoxication was not erroneous. St. v. Raugust, 2000 MT 146, 300 M 54, 3 P3d 115, 57 St. Rep. 570 (2000). See also St. v. Hagen, 283 M 156, 939 P2d 994 (1997).

Jury Instruction Proposed but Rejected — No Further Objection Required: Objections to jury instructions proposed by the opposing party serve the same function as evidentiary objections. When a party proposes a jury instruction and the trial court refuses to give the instruction, the court knows that an issue of law has been raised by the party seeking the instruction and, from the nature of the proposed instruction, knows the nature of the party's contentions. Thus, that party has made a sufficient objection for purposes of this section and has no duty to make a further objection for the record. St. v. Grimes, 1999 MT 145, 295 M 22, 982 P2d 1037, 56 St. Rep. 571 (1999), followed in St. v. Dobson, 2001 MT 167, 306 M 145, 30 P3d 1077 (2001).

Refusal of Proposed Cautionary Instruction — Standard of Prejudice: When a trial court refuses a proposed cautionary instruction, the standard of prejudice is whether the testimony is crucial to the state's case in light of other evidence. In the present case, an informant with apparent personal motivation offered testimony about Grimes's crimes, but no cautionary instruction was given, which Grimes contended constituted reversible error. However, in light of other overwhelming evidence linking Grimes to the crime, the informant's testimony was not crucial to the state's case, so failure to give a cautionary instruction was harmless and not prejudicial to Grimes. St. v. Grimes, 1999 MT 145, 295 M 22, 982 P2d 1037, 56 St. Rep. 571 (1999), following Guam v. Dela Rosa, 644 F2d 1257 (9th Cir. 1981).

Testimony by Government Agent Motivated by Personal Gain — Cautionary Instruction Prudent: When a government agent motivated by personal gain rather than an independent law enforcement purpose provides testimony, a cautionary instruction is prudent. St. v. Grimes, 1999 MT 145, 295 M 22, 982 P2d 1037, 56 St. Rep. 571 (1999), following Guam v. Dela Rosa, 644 F2d 1257 (9th Cir. 1981).

"Failure to Agree" Instruction — When Corrective Instruction Required: Generally, when a claimed error concerns jury instructions that were not objected to at the time that the instructions were settled, the alleged error may not be raised for the first time on appeal; however, the Supreme Court will review jury instructions in certain circumstances even in the absence of an objection to determine whether the jury was properly instructed. In the present case, there was significant confusion among the court, the prosecutor, and the defense counsel concerning the correct procedural sequence for the jury to consider greater and lesser offenses during deliberations, given a timely request by defendant. If a judge is of the opinion that instructions already given fully advise the jury on the procedures that it is to follow in deliberations, the judge's refusal to answer a jury's question already answered in the instruction is not error. However, when the instruction fails to fully advise, the judge should provide a corrective instruction. The withdrawal of defendant's timely request for an instruction at settlement was due to the mistaken representation of the court and the prosecutor that the law did not allow an instruction that the jury may consider a lesser offense if it fails to agree on a verdict for the greater offense, so the Supreme Court chose to review defendant's claim of error in a jury instruction. Under 46-16-607(3), as long as a criminal defendant requests a "failure to agree" instruction at the settling of jury instructions, a District Court must instruct the jury that it may consider the lesser offense without first reaching a unanimous verdict on the greater offense. St. v. Robbins, 1998 MT 297, 292 M 23, 971 P2d 359, 55 St. Rep. 1213 (1998), following U.S. v. Jackson, 726 F2d 1466 (9th Cir. 1984).

Failure to Record Jury Question and Court Response — No Prejudice: Defendant contended that the trial court's failure to respond in writing or to create a record regarding a question asked by the jury after being retired for deliberation constituted prejudicial error requiring a new trial. Although this section requires a record to be made at the settlement of instructions, a jury's question asked during deliberations does not constitute the period of trial relating to settlement of instructions; thus, this section does not apply. Given the court's response to rely on the instructions already given, there was no prejudice to defendant, and any error in failing to make a record was harmless and not reversible. St. v. Brogan, 272 M 156, 900 P2d 284, 52 St. Rep. 636 (1995).

Use of Information and Surplus Language in Instructions Not Error: Mummey was found not guilty on the first count against him of aggravated assault against Miller. He was found guilty of the second count of felony assault (now assault with a weapon) against Darling. Mummey argued that he could not be found guilty of the second charge because it was inconsistent in its language in that it described the assault as having been perpetrated by the use of the same footwear worn in the assault of which he had been found innocent. The Supreme Court held that there was no error in incorporating the information into the jury instructions when they did not redefine the elements of the crime and that in view of all the instructions, the surplus language in the second count did not invalidate the verdict. St. v. Mummey, 264 M 272, 871 P2d 868, 51 St. Rep. 198 (1994).

Error to Refuse Instruction That One Cannot Conspire Solely With Government Agent: It is legally impossible for a person to conspire with an undercover government agent to commit a crime. There must be at least two nonagents conspiring between themselves and involved with the agent. It was error to refuse defendant's instruction to that effect. St. v. Shaw, 255 M 298, 843 P2d 316, 49 St. Rep. 1012 (1992).

Case Notes

Alleged Extraneous Juror Information — Alleged Juror Statement to Bailiff — New Trial Not Warranted: The District Court did not abuse its discretion when it determined that juror misconduct did not warrant a new trial. Although a juror's exposure to extraneous information creates a rebuttable presumption of prejudice, this presumption is not absolute, and arises only when the information shows a natural tendency to prejudice. Even if a juror was exposed to extraneous information, the District Court was uniquely qualified to appraise whether the extraneous information resulted in prejudice. As to another juror's alleged statement to a bailiff, the defendant presented no evidence that the bailiff expressed his agreement with the comment. Moreover, the bailiff submitted an affidavit disavowing any knowledge of the juror's alleged comment. St. v. Strang, 2017 MT 217, 388 Mont. 428, 401 P.3d 690.

Absence of Defendant From Critical Trial Proceeding Violative of Fundamental Right to Appear and Defend in Person — No Error Given Curative Action of Trial Court: During Kennedy's criminal trial, a juror communicated with one of the state's witnesses. The trial judge then met with the juror in chambers without Kennedy or any counsel present, and the juror admitted the conversation, but denied mentioning anything about it to the jury. The court then met with counsel in chambers, replaced the juror with an alternate, excluded the witness from testifying, and went on with the trial. Defense counsel moved for mistrial and dismissal with prejudice, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that excluding Kennedy from the conversation with the juror violated Kennedy's fundamental right to be present at all critical stages of trial to defend in person. Further, any waiver by defense counsel by failing to object was ineffective because Kennedy was never told that he had a right to be present or that the juror questioning was about to occur. However, Kennedy was not prejudiced or deprived of a fair trial by the error in light of the District Court's corrective actions. Thus, denial of a mistrial was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Kennedy, 2004 MT 53, 320 M 161, 85 P3d 1279 (2004), followed in St. v. Godfrey, 2009 MT 60, 349 M 335, 203 P3d 834 (2009).

Juror Outburst — Court's Removal of Child Witness From Stand — No Prejudice to Defendant: A juror's request to be dismissed when defense counsel persisted in questioning a 9-year-old witness who repeatedly broke down in tears at a certain point in questioning and the court's removal of the witness from the stand did not warrant a mistrial. There was no showing that the juror's outburst resulted in prejudice to defendant, and removal of the witness did not deprive defendant of the right to confront and cross-examine witnesses when the court gave defense counsel the option to resume questioning at a later time. St. v. McNatt, 257 M 468, 849 P2d 1050, 50 St. Rep. 365 (1993), followed in St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 293, 864 P2d 1257, 50 St. Rep. 1564 (1993), and cited in St. v. Brandon, 264 M 231, 870 P2d 734, 51 St. Rep. 244 (1994), and St. v. Oliver, 2022 MT 104, 408 Mont. 519, 510 P.3d 1218.

Distinction Between Brief Encounter and Intimate Association: In a case in which the defendant claimed that two jurors spoke briefly to one another about the defendant and his witnesses, there was no initial showing of prejudice against the defendant. No juror affidavits were presented to the court to support defendant's claim. The statements, if made, were brief and do not support the claim they injured the defense because they do not reflect on intimate association but are merely indicative of a brief encounter. There is a distinction between a brief encounter and an intimate association as it pertains to either the relationship among jurors or between jurors and witnesses. St. v. Salois, 235 M 276, 766 P2d 1306, 45 St. Rep. 2382 (1988).

Attempt by Jury Foreman to Convey Information on Defendant's Criminal Record to Jury — Remand for New Trial: The jury foreman heard in a third-party conversation that "defendant had a criminal record as long as your arm" and attempted to convey the information to the rest of the jury. Although the jury declined to hear the offered information, the injury to defendant had already occurred when the foreman heard the prejudicial comments and informed the remaining jurors that he had reliable information from the Sheriff's office. The District Court denied a motion for mistrial after examining three jurors, but the Supreme Court would not assume that the entire panel was safeguarded from contamination. In remanding for a new trial, the Supreme Court held that the presumption of prejudice that was created when uncontroverted evidence established that prejudicial statements reached one or more jurors was not rebutted when no evidence existed to rebut the presumption other than testimony of three of the jurors. St. v. DeGraw, 235 M 53, 764 P2d 1290, 45 St. Rep. 2154 (1988), distinguishing St. v. Murray, 228 M 125, 741 P2d 759, 44 St. Rep. 1394 (1987), St. v. Counts, 209 M 242, 679 P2d 1245 (1984), and St. v. Gillham, 206 M 169, 670 P2d 544 (1983).

Mistrial Denied Despite Juror Misconduct — No Error: A juror disregarded trial court instructions by talking with a County Attorney, who assisted in the prosecution, about the propriety of allowing evidence of child abuse in open court. Another juror was seen entering Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) offices after evidence was allowed showing the agency was peripherally involved in the case, and there was evidence the juror discussed the defendant and her children during a conversation at a restaurant. Arguably, the jury misconduct tended to injure the defendant, and therefore prejudice should be presumed; however, the trial judge could determine that there was sufficient evidence to rebut the presumption. Since there was not clear and convincing evidence of error in denying a motion for mistrial, the ruling was affirmed. St. v. Murray, 228 M 125, 741 P2d 759, 44 St. Rep. 1394 (1987), followed in St. v. Salois, 235 M 276, 766 P2d 1306, 45 St. Rep. 2382 (1988).

Mistrial Following Hung Jury — Bailiff Misconduct — Original Jeopardy Not Terminated: Following mistrial because of a jury deadlock, defendant petitioned for a Writ of Supervisory Control, claiming double jeopardy. He contended that misconduct on the part of the bailiff was chargeable to the State in the same manner as misconduct committed by a prosecutor or judge. The Supreme Court refused the petition, but proceeded to declare that in Montana a mistrial following a hung jury does not terminate the original jeopardy. If governmental conduct giving rise to a motion for mistrial was intended to provoke defendant into moving for mistrial, then retrial might properly be prohibited. However, the court held that comments by the bailiff were not intended to provoke defendant into moving for mistrial. State ex rel. Forsyth v. District Court, 216 M 480, 701 P2d 1346, 42 St. Rep. 965 (1985), overruled in Keating v. Sherlock, 278 M 218, 924 P2d 1297, 53 St. Rep. 855 (1996).

Defendant to Show Prejudice From Media Reports: Defendant was tried and convicted of attempted deliberate homicide. After the verdict, defense counsel polled the jury and discovered that a juror had read an entire newspaper article summarizing the case. The juror stated that this had not affected her opinions or deliberations. The District Court denied a motion for a mistrial. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the burden is on the defendant to show that: (1) the juror was specifically exposed to media reports; and (2) the reports were prejudicial to the defendant. Mere proof that a juror was exposed to a factual account of the trial did not meet this burden of proof. St. v. Gillham, 206 M 169, 670 P2d 544, 40 St. Rep. 1576 (1983).

Jury Misconduct Not Grounds for New Trial Unless Material: A new trial will be ordered because of alleged jury misconduct only if the alleged misconduct affects a material matter in dispute and prejudices the complaining party. St. v. Maxwell, 198 M 498, 647 P2d 348, 39 St. Rep. 1149 (1982), followed in St. v. Sor-Lokken, 247 M 343, 805 P2d 1367, 48 St. Rep. 142 (1991).

Bailiff Telling Jury of Problem in Arranging Sleeping Quarters: During the evening, while the jurors were deliberating, the bailiff told them that he was having difficulty finding a place for them to stay overnight. However, shortly afterward, the bailiff told them that he had found a place. Additionally, the jurors had told him that despite the lateness of the hour, they wished to continue their deliberations. The Supreme Court held that the defendant had not been prejudiced by the bailiff's conduct. St. v. Dickens, 198 M 482, 647 P2d 338, 39 St. Rep. 1137 (1982).

Juror Facing Witness and Moving Mouth: Allegation that members of the jury were seen facing prosecution witnesses and moving their mouths was not proof that communication sufficient to warrant a new trial had taken place. St. v. Dickens, 198 M 482, 647 P2d 338, 39 St. Rep. 1137 (1982), followed in St. v. Hedrick, 229 M 145, 745 P2d 355, 44 St. Rep. 1849 (1987); St. v. Counts, 209 M 242, 679 P2d 1245, 41 St. Rep. 681 (1984).

Nonprejudicial News Story During Trial: Defendant was tried and convicted of felony theft. Prior to trial several continuances were granted to avoid prejudice from articles about the defendant that were appearing in the local press. On the second day of trial, an article concerning the trial appeared in the local newspaper and defendant moved for a mistrial. The judge denied the motion and admonished the jury to refrain from reading the paper and listening to news broadcasts. Defendant appealed the denial of his motion, contending that the judge should have at least interrogated the jurors. The Supreme Court held that absent any indication on the record of prejudice to appellant so grave as to deny him a fair trial, the District Court properly exercised its discretion in denying the motion. The admonition to the jury was sufficient to correct any damaging influence from the news article. St. v. Weaver, 195 M 481, 637 P2d 23, 38 St. Rep. 2050 (1981).

Juror Misconduct — Presumption of Prejudice: The District Court failed to remove any prejudicial effect occasioned by statements by a juror in a public place which disqualified him as a juror. The court did not inquire into an alleged statement by the juror that "half of the jury is Hanson's friends" nor did it act properly in allowing the juror to sit until the end of the day on which the court determined his misconduct before substituting an alternate. The presumption of prejudice remained because the members of the jury were not interrogated to determine if they had been contaminated. St. v. Eagen, 178 M 67, 582 P2d 1195 (1978). See also St. v. Oliver, 2022 MT 104, 408 Mont. 519, 510 P.3d 1218.

Invitation to Juror to Participate in Experiment: The prosecuting attorney's invitation to a juror to participate in an experiment not supported by the evidence was harmless error because the juror did not participate and the court immediately sustained the defendant's objection. St. v. Thompson, 164 M 415, 524 P2d 1115 (1974).

Admonition to Jury: When a jury was completed on the afternoon of the sixth of the month and an adjournment was then taken until the seventh and at noon on the seventh a recess was taken until 1:30 p.m. of that day, a new trial was not granted because of the failure of the court to give to the jury the full statutory admonition since the jury was properly admonished, as required by the former section, at each adjournment taken after the noon recess on the seventh. St. v. Hall, 55 M 182, 175 P 267 (1918).

Showing of Compliance With Statute: The record on appeal in a criminal case which disclosed that when an adjournment was taken “the jury was admonished by the court and placed in charge of the sheriff” was sufficient to disclose compliance with a former statute, imported verity, and could not be impeached by affidavit. St. v. Hall, 55 M 182, 175 P 267 (1918).

General	793

GENERAL

Jurors' Unauthorized View of Crime Scene — No Prejudice to Defendant: The defendant was not prejudiced by the improper view taken by two jurors of the crime scene. The state successfully rebutted the presumption that defendant was prejudiced by the unauthorized view. St. v. Bell, 225 M 83, 731 P2d 336, 44 St. Rep. 56 (1987).

Visits to Scene — Purpose: In considering a motion to suppress evidence discovered during a search of the defendant's motel room, the trial judge visited the room under circumstances allegedly similar to those on the night of the search. In expressing its disapproval of the trial court's participation in the recreation of the scene, the Supreme Court stated that visits to the scene should be designed for the trier of fact to view the scene, not for the trier of fact to place himself in the shoes of one of the parties. St. v. Wilson, 218 M 359, 708 P2d 270, 42 St. Rep. 1647 (1985).

Experimenting With Exhibit: The jury may have the privilege of examining a dangerous instrument provided that the jury does not use it in any different manner than that involved in the testimony and that no new fact is discovered from its experiment which is hurtful to the defendant. St. v. Thompson, 164 M 415, 524 P2d 1115 (1974).

Failure to Object to Jury View: By failing to object to an order of the trial court, made in its discretion and at the close of the testimony in a prosecution for murder, permitting the jury to view an automobile in which the shooting occurred, the defendant waived his right to secure a review of the propriety of the order. St. v. Cates, 97 M 173, 33 P2d 578 (1934).

DISCRETION OF COURT

Jury View of Crime Scene Denied — Other Evidence:

The defendant's testimony as to how the gun fired was, with or without corroboration, sufficient credible evidence for the jury to find guilt of negligent homicide. Hence, the court's denial of a jury view was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Bier, 181 M 27, 591 P2d 1115 (1979).

The trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying a jury view of the crime scene since there was extensive testimony describing the scene of the shooting, a 45-mile trip one way under zero-degree weather conditions would have diminished the jurors' ability to perceive and appreciate the subtleties the defendant suggests inhered in the scene, and there was a significant danger that the jury might be misled by the view. St. v. Gone, 179 M 271, 587 P2d 1291 (1978).

Condition of Premises: The facts that the premises to be viewed had accumulated dirt which had been hastily swept away, doors had been replaced, and the view was bleak and morbid furnished no ground for interfering with an order permitting a view of the premises. St. v. Allison, 122 M 120, 199 P2d 279 (1948).

Permitting Jury to View Premises: Permitting the jury to view the premises rests entirely in the discretion of the trial court, which will not be interfered with except in cases of manifest abuse. St. v. Allison, 122 M 120, 199 P2d 279 (1948).

Permitting Jury to View Cattle: Permitting the jury to view cattle charged to have been stolen by the defendant and recaptured was within the discretion of the trial court. St. v. Arnold, 84 M 348, 275 P 757 (1929).

DEFENDANT'S RIGHT TO BE PRESENT

Defendant's Right to Be Present at Jury View: A defendant's constitutional right to be present at all stages of the trial and to meet the witnesses against him face to face includes the right to be present at a jury view. St. v. Musgrove, 178 M 162, 582 P2d 1246 (1978).

Limitation on Waiver by Defendant: A waiver by the defendant through his counsel of his right to be present during the view by the jury did not include such a waiver as to a proceeding occurring at the jury view which amounted to a taking of testimony, unsworn testimony at that, in the absence of the defendant. St. v. Musgrove, 178 M 162, 582 P2d 1246 (1978).

Waiver of Defendant's Right to Be Present: Since the only purpose of a view by the jury of the place where a homicide was committed is to enable the jurors better to understand the evidence heard by them at the trial and testimony may not be taken there for any purpose, the defendant may waive his right to be present at the viewing, and when he did not make a request for permission to be present at the view of an automobile in and near which the shooting occurred, he will be held to have waived his right in that behalf. St. v. Cates, 97 M 173, 33 P2d 578 (1934).

46-16-503. Conduct of jury after retirement — advice from court.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute retains the substance of 1987 MCA 46-16-503. Subsection (2) has been rewritten for clarity and to reflect established procedure. The court has discretion to offer such information after consultation with the parties. The 1987 code appeared to require any additional information requested by the jury to be given to them in open court. The statute does not retain that requirement and is intended to reflect the prevailing practice.

Source: See commission comments to 46-16-501.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: In (2), at end of first sentence, substituted "shall notify the officer appointed to keep them together, who shall then notify the court" for "must require the officer to conduct them into court", at beginning of second sentence deleted "When the jurors are brought into court" and at end inserted "after consultation with the parties", and deleted former last sentence that read: "If such information is given, it must be given in the presence of the county attorney and the defendant and his counsel".

Case Notes

Defendant's Absence When Court Answered Jury Questions About Definition of "Arrest" and When Defendant Was First "Under Arrest" Was Reversible Error — Jury Deliberations Are Critical Stage of Trial Subject to Potential for Substantial Prejudice — No Clear Waiver by Defendant — Error Not Harmless. St. v. Zitnik, 2023 MT 131, 413 Mont. 11, 532 P.3d 477.

Hearsay Evidence Improperly Admitted — Hearsay Statements Repeated Prior Admissible In-Court Testimony — Right to Fair Trial by Impartial Jury Not Violated by Court's Refusal to Interview Juror Who Talked to Witness — Repeated Playing of Recorded Jail Phone Calls to Jury Encouraged by Defendant — Record Insufficient for Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — Cumulative Error Doctrine. St. v. Oliver, 2022 MT 104, 408 Mont. 519, 510 P.3d 1218.

Discretion Regarding Supplemental Instructions: A jury indicated that it was deadlocked and could not move forward without answers to unspecified questions regarding its instructions. The District Court declined to give supplemental instructions, declared a mistrial, and ruled that retrial was not barred by the double jeopardy clause. The defense moved for supervisory control. The Supreme Court denied supervisory control and reviewed for abuse of discretion, finding based on review of the transcript that the District Court acted within its discretion when it declined to give supplemental instructions. Lamb v. 11th Judicial District Court, 2019 MT 274, 397 Mont. 541, 452 P.3d 917.

Replay of Testimony as Prejudicial Reversible Error: A deliberating jury in an incest case requested to rewatch recorded testimony. The District Court allowed this without further inquiry or narrowing of the request to isolate the testimony necessary to resolve the jury's issue, and the jury convicted the defendant. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded, citing St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551, for the idea that 46-16-503 does not completely replace the common-law rule against jury review of testimony, and citing St. v. Harris, 247 Mont. 405, 808 P.2d 453 (1991), for the procedure the District Court should have used to narrow the jury's request. St. v. Hayes, 2019 MT 231, 397 Mont. 304, 449 P.3d 826.

Entry of Trial Court Judge Into Jury Room Without Defendant — No Infringement on Defendant's Right to Public Trial: The defendant moved for a new trial after a jury conviction. One issue asserted by the defendant was that he was deprived of his right to a public trial when the District Court Judge approached the jury room outside his presence while the jury was deliberating, briefly addressed the jury regarding whether it would finish that night, and then left. The District Court held a hearing regarding the interaction with the jury outside the defendant's presence and denied the motion for a new trial. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, reasoning that in order to determine whether a closure to the public violates the right to a public trial or is merely trivial, courts generally look toward how the closure relates to the interests a public trial is designed to protect, as well as to the scope and duration of the closure and whether the trial court intentionally effectuated the closure. As applied in this case, the scope, duration, and context of the closure did not impair the fairness of the defendant's trial. The interaction between the judge and the jury occurred after evidence and argument concluded, the interaction was only for a few moments regarding an administrative matter, and the appearance of fairness was preserved when the interaction with the jury was placed on the record after allowing both parties to present evidence on the matter. St. v. Northcutt, 2015 MT 267, 381 Mont. 81, 358 P.3d 179. See also St. v. Tapson, 2001 MT 292, 307 Mont. 428, 41 P.3d 305.

Entry of Trial Court Judge Into Jury Room Without Defendant — No Reversible Error Based Defendant's Right to Be Present — Brief Interaction Not Structural — Harmless Error Analysis Applied: The defendant moved for a new trial after a jury convicted him of three counts of assault on a police officer. One issue asserted by the defendant was that he was deprived of his right to right to be present when the District Court Judge approached the jury room while the jury was deliberating, briefly addressed the jury regarding whether it would finish that night, and then left. The District Court held a hearing regarding the interaction with the jury outside the defendant's presence and denied the defendant's motion for a new trial. On appeal, the Supreme Court determined that although the defendant's right to be present was violated when the judge spoke to the jury outside his presence during a critical stage of the proceedings, the brief interaction between the judge and the jury was not structural in nature. As such, the court considered the issue under the harmless error standard, which required the state to demonstrate that there was no reasonable possibility that the violation prejudiced the defendant. Under this standard, the testimony of the witnesses showed that the interaction was very brief, and the evidence failed to show that the judge instructed the jury to finish early or consider other issues. Consequently, the violation of the defendant's right to presence was not reversible error, and the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Northcutt, 2015 MT 267, 381 Mont. 81, 358 P.3d 179. See also St. v. Tapson, 2001 MT 292, 307 Mont. 428, 41 P.3d 305.

District Court Supplying Partial Transcript to Jury Not Prejudicial: The defendant was convicted of failure to give notice of a change of address by a sexual offender. During deliberations, the jury asked the District Court a question. Over the defendant's objection, the District Court provided a partial transcript of testimony to the jury relative to the question. On appeal, the defendant argued that providing a transcript of testimony placed an undue emphasis on the testimony. The Supreme Court disagreed with the defendant, holding that the District Court properly discovered the nature of the jury's difficulty and isolated the particular testimony to solve the question. Thus, the danger of undue emphasis was outweighed by the probative value of the testimony. St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

Award of Restitution When Causation Not Element of Offense — No Constitutional Violation: The defendant was involved in a collision between her vehicle and the victim's bicycle, but because she apparently was unaware of the collision, she drove away from the scene of the accident. After the jury found the defendant guilty of failure to remain at the scene of an accident in violation of 61-7-103 and failure to notify authorities of an accident in violation of 61-7-108, the defendant's sentence included an order to pay the victim $4,148.60 in restitution. The defendant argued that her constitutional rights to procedural and substantive due process were violated because the jury did not determine causation as an element of either offense and the restitution was not adjusted to account for the victim's comparative negligence. The Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed, concluding that the jury was not required to determine causation or comparative negligence, but only to decide whether the victim's losses resulted from the defendant's commission of the offenses. Additionally, the court found that the defendant had failed to properly preserve a comparative negligence defense because she raised it for the first time on appeal. Billings v. Edward, 2012 MT 186, 366 Mont. 107, 285 P.3d 523.

Video Equipment Supplied by Bailiff in Jury Room Without Court Approval — Harmless Error: After the jury retired for deliberations and while the presiding judge was unavailable, the jury asked the bailiff for video equipment to watch a patrol car DVD that had been entered into evidence. Rather than following protocol and obtaining permission of the judge, the bailiff took the requested equipment into the jury room and cued up one of the DVDs. Within minutes, the judge ordered the DVD and equipment removed. Hart moved for a mistrial on grounds that the jury's access to the evidence placed an undue emphasis on it in violation of due process. The motion was denied, and Hart appealed. Applying the analysis in St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), the Supreme Court concluded that the state established that any error was harmless. The DVDs could not have contributed to Hart's conviction because other evidence was introduced to establish the same facts, and the DVDs actually supported both the state's and Hart's case theories and were used by both sides at trial. Thus, although the bailiff erred in supplying the video equipment without court approval, the error did not contribute to Hart's conviction and was harmless. Denial of the mistrial motion was affirmed. St. v. Hart, 2009 MT 268, 352 M 92, 214 P3d 1273 (2009).

No Abuse of Discretion in Denying Mistrial for Ordering Continued Jury Deliberations: Doyle moved for a mistrial after the trial court ordered the jury to continue deliberating after the jurors notified the court that they were at an impasse. Doyle contended that the trial court improperly pressured the jury to reach a decision and created the impression that the jury could return only a unanimous verdict rather than a hung jury and that the court failed to explain to the jurors that they should never give up their honest opinion concerning Doyle's guilt or innocence. The motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The transcript showed that the jury was in fact instructed that it should not surrender an honest opinion as to the weight or effect of the evidence or the guilt or innocence of the defendant. The court sent the jury home the first day after 10 hours of deliberations when the jury informed the court that it could not reach a decision. At the end of the second day, the jury sent a note to the court informing the judge that the jury was at an impasse. The court asked the jury if it wished to go home or continue deliberations, and the jury opted to go home. The third day, the jury returned a unanimous guilty verdict. Based on the transcript, the trial court never forced deliberations, and the court did not abuse its discretion in denying Doyle's mistrial motion. St. v. Doyle, 2007 MT 125, 337 M 308, 160 P3d 516 (2007).

Bailiff's Instructions to Split Jury to Continue Deliberations Not Reversible Error: Steele was charged with eight offenses and conceded guilt on all but one charge. During deliberations on the remaining charge, the jury became deadlocked and notified the bailiff. Outside the presence of the parties and without the court's approval, the bailiff told the jury that they needed to keep working on it and needed to find common ground. Steele contended that the bailiff's action denied the parties and counsel the opportunity to consult with the court in violation of this section and moved for mistrial. The motion was denied, and Steele appealed. It is not the prerogative of any court officer except the trial judge to give instructions to the jury regarding deliberations. However, without condoning the bailiff's actions, the Supreme Court held that the bailiff's instructions did not misadvise the jury but merely asked the jury to continue deliberating, the same instruction that the District Court would have offered, so a mistrial was not warranted on those grounds. Further, the jury did not disagree as to any testimony received or desire any information regarding the law, so this section was not triggered. Although not given or condoned by the trial judge, the bailiff's instructions did not attempt to pressure the jurors into reaching a verdict or assert to the minority jurors that their positions should change, as was the case in St. v. Randall, 137 M 534, 353 P2d 1054 (1960), so denial of the mistrial motion was proper. St. v. Steele, 2004 MT 275, 323 M 204, 99 P3d 210 (2004), distinguishing St. v. Herron, 169 M 193, 545 P2d 678 (1976). See also St. v. George, 219 M 377, 711 P2d 1379 (1986).

Original Jury Instruction Constituting Law of Case Absent Objection — Erroneous Supplemental Jury Instruction Allowing Finding of Guilt When Only Portion of Property Subject to Forfeiture Composed of Drug Sale Proceeds — Abuse of Discretion in Allowing Conviction Based on Lesser Amount Than Charged: The state charged and prosecuted Crawford for possession of $1,025 in proceeds from an illegal drug sale, thus assuming the burden of proving that Crawford possessed approximately that amount and that it came from drug sales and refuting Crawford's alleged legitimate sources for any portion of that amount. At no time did the state offer evidence that only a portion of the amount came from drug sales or accept that possibility in its closing remarks. In jury instructions, the District Court informed the jury that the state had to prove the elements charged, that Crawford possessed $1,025 derived from drug sales, and that Crawford acted knowingly. During deliberations, the jury became confused as to how the instruction should be applied and sought clarification as to whether Crawford could still be convicted if the jury found that only a portion of the money came from drug sales. The District Court provided a supplemental instruction stating that Crawford could still be convicted on a lesser amount and supplied the jury with a special interrogatory allowing the jury to state the portion of the amount that was considered to be drug proceeds. The jury found that $225 of the $1,025 derived from drug sales, and Crawford was convicted. On appeal, Crawford argued that once given, the initial instruction became the law of the case absent objection and that giving the supplemental instruction was therefore an abuse of discretion. Crawford further contended that allowing the jury to find that only a portion of the amount charged was considered to be drug proceeds constituted an amendment to the information, which prejudiced Crawford by disallowing an adjustment to his defense strategy to rebut the state's reduced burden of proof. The Supreme Court agreed. When the state fails to object to a jury instruction, the instruction becomes the law of the case, whether it includes an unnecessary element or not, and the jury is accordingly bound by it. A supplemental instruction that allowed deviation from the original instruction requiring a finding that Crawford possessed $1,025 in drug sale proceeds was therefore an abuse of discretion. Further, because the jury found that only $225 was attributable to drug sales, the state failed to prove the monetary element of the offense as defined by the original jury instruction, so Crawford's conviction on the count of possession of property subject to forfeiture was reversed. St. v. Crawford, 2002 MT 117, 310 M 18, 48 P3d 706 (2002). See also St. v. Cline, 170 M 520, 555 P2d 724 (1976), and St. v. Hickman, 954 P2d 900 (Wash. 1998).

34 Entry of Trial Court Judge Into Jury Room Without Counsel, Defendant, and Court Reporter — Automatic Reversible Error Absent Recorded Waiver by Defendant of Constitutional Rights: On the second full day of jury deliberations in Tapson's trial on charges of sexual intercourse without consent, aggravated kidnapping, and attempted deliberate homicide, the trial judge met with counsel, on the record, to notify them that the jury had a verdict on one of the three counts, but was unable to reach a verdict on the other two counts. With Tapson present, the state suggested substituting the existing verdict form, which listed all three charges, with six verdict forms—one "guilty" form and one "not guilty" form for each of the three charges—to avoid the problem of the jury switching its current verdict on one charge for some sort of last minute compromise. The state also suggested that the judge take the forms into the jury room, rather than moving the jury and handling the matter in open court. Tapson's counsel stated that the defense did not have any objection to the proposition, so the judge took the forms into the jury room, without counsel or Tapson present, and returned 11 minutes later. There was no record of whether the judge spent the entire time with the jury, what the judge told the jury, whether the jury had any questions, or whether the judge gave any responses. Tapson was subsequently convicted of attempted deliberate homicide, although the jury could not reach a verdict on the other charges. Tapson was sentenced to life imprisonment, but appealed the conviction and sentence. The Supreme Court noted Tapson's fundamental constitutional right to be present and defend in person and by counsel, and the fundamental right to a public trial, which extends to the entire trial, including the judge's instructions to the jury. The state contended that defense counsel waived Tapson's right to be present, but the Supreme Court declined to engage in presumptions of waiver, holding that if a defendant chooses to waive these constitutional rights, the trial court must obtain an on-the-record personal waiver, by the defendant, acknowledging that the defendant voluntarily, intelligently, and knowingly waives the rights. Thus, when there is some circumstance arguably making it necessary for a trial judge to enter the jury room while the jury is present, the court must contemporaneously explain to the defendant, on the record, the constitutional right to be present at all critical stages of the trial and the right to a public trial. The defendant may then choose to waive those rights. However, absent a contemporaneous, personal, knowing, voluntary, intelligent, on-the-record waiver by the defendant, if a judge enters a jury room while the jury is present and without counsel, the defendant, and the court reporter, reversal will be automatic. Tapson's constitutional rights were violated, so the case was reversed and remanded for further proceedings. St. v. Tapson, 2001 MT 292, 307 M 428, 41 P3d 305 (2001), following St. v. Reed, 65 M 51, 210 P 756 (1922), St. v. Allison, 116 M 352, 153 P2d 141 (1944), U.S. v. U.S. Gypsum Co., 438 US 422 (1978), and Commonwealth v. Patry, 722 NE 2d 979 (Mass. App. Ct. 2000), and distinguishing St. v. Harris, 1999 MT 115, 294 M 397, 983 P2d 881 (1999), and St. v. LaDue, 2001 MT 47, 304 M 288, 20 P3d 775 (2001).

35 Discretion of Trial Court to Allow Testimony to Be Read to Jury After Deliberations Begun — No Error: During deliberations in Thompson's trial on charges of sexually assaulting his child, the jury requested a copy of the child's testimony. The trial judge denied the request, explaining that the court could not repeat the testimony after deliberations had begun because it would place undue emphasis on the testimony. The jury explained that the child had spoken so softly during the hearing that several jury members were unable to hear the testimony. The judge reconsidered, determining that the child's testimony was both exculpatory and inculpatory, and discussed the jury's request with counsel for both parties. No objections were made, and after cautioning the jury not to give more weight to the child's testimony than any other testimony, the court allowed the child's testimony to be read to the jury. Thompson was convicted and appealed on grounds that allowing the testimony after jury deliberations had begun violated this section. The Supreme Court noted that it is within the discretion of the trial court whether to allow a jury to rehear testimony. In this case, the jury could not hear the child in the courtroom, and the child's testimony was an essential part of the case and included evidence favorable to both parties, so the trial court did not err in allowing the jury to hear the testimony during deliberations. St. v. Thompson, 2001 MT 119, 305 M 342, 28 P3d 1068 (2001). See also St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453 (1991), and St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

Testimonial Tape-Recorded Interview Improperly Submitted to Jury — Error Harmless Because of Cumulative Nature of Evidence: Following an automobile accident in which his girlfriend was killed, Bales was interviewed by a highway patrol officer who taped the interview, during which Bales failed the HGN test and made allegedly prejudicial statements. Over Bales' objection, the District Court admitted the tape as an exhibit that the jury could listen to during deliberations. The Supreme Court noted that because the jury had not requested the playing of the tape, 46-16-504 applied, rather than this section. The Supreme Court found that the tape had a testimonial character and, citing St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453 (1991), for the common-law rule against submitting testimonial materials to the jury for unsupervised and unrestricted review during deliberations, held that the District Court abused its discretion in allowing the tape to go to the jury. However, allowing the jury to hear the tape did not unduly emphasize that testimony to the exclusion of other witnesses, nor were statements on the tape inconsistent with statements given by the witnesses at trial. Rather, the tape was merely cumulative of other evidence and did not prejudice Bales, so the error was harmless. St. v. Bales, 1999 MT 334, 297 M 402, 994 P2d 17, 56 St. Rep. 1334 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Morse, 229 M 222, 746 P2d 108, 44 St. Rep. 1919 (1987), and overruling it to the extent that it is inconsistent with St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453, 48 St. Rep. 62 (1991), regarding the submission of testimonial materials to a deliberating jury. See also St. v. Mayes, 251 M 358, 825 P2d 1196, 49 St. Rep. 75 (1992), St. v. Evans, 261 M 508, 862 P2d 417, 50 St. Rep. 1431 (1993), and St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

Court's Refusal to Replay Testimony to Jury — Not Error: The District Court did not err in denying the jury's request to review testimony when the court recognized the danger of emphasizing the testimony of one witness over another as well as the danger of repeating portions of testimony out of context. St. v. Graves, 272 M 451, 901 P2d 549, 52 St. Rep. 755 (1995).

Jury Request for Replay of Partial Testimony — Failure to Give Harris Instruction Not Prejudicial to Defendant: Henrich was charged with various crimes resulting from sexual assault upon his daughters. The jury requested that it be allowed to hear a recording of certain testimony, whereupon the District Court determined the relevant portion of the testimony and allowed part of a victim's testimony to be played to the jury during its deliberations. The Supreme Court noted that it was error for the District Court not to give the instruction required by St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453 (1991). However, the Supreme Court held that because the only testimony as to the issues concerned in the recording was given by the witness and the defendant, the jury's need to balance the statements in the recording against the defendant's denial of committing the offense was obvious and therefore the need for the Harris instruction was minimal. The Supreme Court therefore held that the defendant was not prejudiced by the playing of the recording. St. v. Henrich, 268 M 258, 886 P2d 402, 51 St. Rep. 1275 (1994). See also St. v. Bales, 1999 MT 334, 297 M 402, 994 P2d 17, 56 St. Rep. 1334 (1999), and St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

Replay of Testimony as Prejudicial Reversible Error: In a case decided prior to the decision in St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453 (1991), the District Court committed reversible error when it allowed the jury to rehear the entire testimony of two witnesses who interviewed the child victim of alleged sexual abuse. Relying on the Harris standard, the Supreme Court remanded this case for a new trial on the issue because the playing of the recorded testimony unduly emphasized the testimony of the alleged victims to the exclusion of the testimony of other witnesses. St. v. Mayes, 251 M 358, 825 P2d 1196, 49 St. Rep. 75 (1992). See also St. v. Bales, 1999 MT 334, 297 M 402, 994 P2d 17, 56 St. Rep. 1334 (1999).

Reading Entire Testimony at Jury's Request Improper:

Acting on the jury's written request to review a child abuse victim's testimony, the District Court overruled defendant's objection, escorted jury into the courtroom, and read victim's testimony in its entirety. In ruling that the District Court abused its discretion, the Supreme Court held that the reading of the testimony prejudiced the defendant by placing undue emphasis on the statement of the alleged victim to the exclusion of the testimony of other witnesses. St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453, 48 St. Rep. 62 (1991), followed in St. v. Evans, 261 M 508, 862 P2d 417, 50 St. Rep. 1431 (1993). See also St. v. Bales, 1999 MT 334, 297 M 402, 994 P2d 17, 56 St. Rep. 1334 (1999), and St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

Shortly after the jury retired for deliberations, a request was made to the court regarding verification of conflicting testimony. Defense counsel requested that certain testimony be read back to the jury. The court refused, noting that: (1) it was unclear exactly which information the jury wanted; (2) counsel would not be allowed to decide which testimony to read back; and (3) the jury had heard the evidence and would have to resolve it. The refusal by the trial court was a proper exercise of its discretion in providing the jury with trial testimony. St. v. Ulstad, 246 M 102, 802 P2d 1260, 47 St. Rep. 2278 (1990).

Court Delay in Responding to Jury Question — No Error: Although the jury was not brought into court after a note from the jury was delivered to the judge by the bailiff inquiring whether a hung jury was possible in the case, there was no error in the manner in which the court responded to the inquiry during deliberations. A response was prepared by the court and approved by defendant and all counsel, but by the time the response was delivered to the jury, it had reached a verdict. St. v. Pambrun, 240 M 62, 783 P2d 374, 46 St. Rep. 1944 (1989).

Test Whether New Trial Warranted on Grounds of Newly Discovered Evidence: In determining whether a new trial was warranted based on newly discovered evidence, the District Court properly applied the test set out in St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959), that: (1) the evidence must have come to the knowledge of the applicant since the trial; (2) it is not through want of diligence that it was not discovered earlier; and (3) it is so material that it would probably produce a different result upon retrial. St. v. DeMers, 234 M 273, 762 P2d 866, 45 St. Rep. 1901 (1988), followed in St. v. Haskins, 255 M 202, 841 P2d 542, 49 St. Rep. 922 (1992).

Alternate Juror — Conversation After Jury Retires: A jury alternate returned to the jury room with the jury after the case had been submitted for decision, which defendant contended was reversible error, since 46-16-503 requires an officer of the court to prevent conversations between the jurors and others after the jury retires. The Supreme Court held that an alternate, although excluded from deliberating and voting, is in every other respect a juror; therefore, an alternate does not fall within the statutory ban against conversations with others. St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986).

Verdict Not Invalid Per Se Because of Jurors' Drinking: An insurer maintained that the jury verdict was invalid per se because of "drinking by a jury after deliberations have begun". The Supreme Court, noting its decision in Wibaux Realty Co. v. N. Pac. Ry. Co., 101 M 126, 54 P2d 1175 (1935), held that unless a party litigant is culpable, the consumption of alcoholic beverages by a juror during deliberations, which consumption is not excessive and which is not shown to have led to a miscarriage of justice, is not grounds for reversal of a jury verdict. While cautioning judges and bailiffs that no persons serving on a jury should be allowed alcoholic beverages during deliberations, particularly at county expense, the court declined to adopt a per se rule invalidating jury verdicts on the record presented here. Britton v. Farmers Ins. Group, 221 M 67, 721 P2d 303, 43 St. Rep. 641 (1986).

Amendment of Instruction: The trial court's action constituted a material amendment of the information that substantially prejudiced the rights of the defendants when it amended a jury instruction in response to a question from the jury but did so in the absence of counsel. St. v. Bretz, 180 M 307, 590 P2d 614 (1979).

Court's Answer Proper: There was no abuse of discretion when the trial court answered a jury request after the matter was submitted to the jury. St. v. Stewart, 175 M 284, 573 P2d 1138 (1977).

Jury Misconduct — Police Report Not in Evidence: When jury deliberations were tainted by reading a police report that had not been admitted, to the material prejudice of the defendant's right to an impartial jury, to confront witnesses, and to assistance of counsel at every critical stage of the trial, a new trial was required. St. v. Davison, 173 M 510, 568 P2d 159 (1977).

Withdrawal of Instruction — Effect: A court may withdraw an instruction after submission to the jury if the instruction is not a required instruction. St. v. Buckley, 171 M 238, 557 P2d 283 (1976).

Oral Instructions by Bailiff: When the jury was confused as to whether or not to sign three of the charges the jury had voted unanimously to acquit defendant of and requested the bailiff to convey a question to the judge for clarification, the oral instructions to the jury by the bailiff to sign only one of the charges not only violated the proscription against oral jury instructions but was patently prejudicial error as the defendant's attorney was not notified or present and had no way to protect his client from the jury's confusion. St. v. Herron, 169 M 193, 545 P2d 678 (1976).

Use of Juror Affidavits to Show Misconduct: When the jury failed to reach a verdict and juror affidavits showed that, because of outside influences on the jury during its deliberations, a verdict of acquittal on three of the charges was actually rendered by the jury but not returned to the court due to confusion over jury instructions, justice compelled the use of the juror affidavits to prove what actually occurred and the rule that juror affidavits cannot be used to impeach jury verdicts did not apply as the jury did not return a verdict of any kind. St. v. Herron, 169 M 193, 545 P2d 678 (1976).

Refusal of Further Instructions: When the attorneys objected to the answering of written questions submitted by the jury after retirement, the court properly informed the jury that the answers to the questions were contained in the instructions previously given and that the court could make no further instructions. St. v. Hawkins, 165 M 456, 529 P2d 1377 (1974), followed in St. v. Brogan, 272 M 156, 900 P2d 284, 52 St. Rep. 636 (1995), and St. v. Dunfee, 2005 MT 147, 327 M 335, 114 P3d 217 (2005).

Rereading Testimony at Jury's Request: It is within the trial court's discretionary power to grant a jury's request to reread parts of the testimony, and such procedure was authorized by the former statute. St. v. Armstrong, 149 M 470, 428 P2d 611 (1967).

Improper Oral Instructions: After retiring to the jury room to deliberate, the jury returned, asking the court whether two instructions given were conflicting. The court, in the absence of the defendant though in the presence of his attorney, orally instructed the jury to disregard one of them and withdrew it. The Supreme Court held that withdrawing the instruction and directing the jury to disregard it was instructing the jury orally, constituting reversible error. St. v. Jackson, 88 M 420, 293 P 309 (1930), distinguished in St. v. Brogan, 272 M 156, 900 P2d 284, 52 St. Rep. 636 (1995).

Oral Advice Not Improper: When the jury was returned into court for information which had been excluded from the evidence and an affidavit which was admitted and the court orally advised them that the information had been excluded and that as to the affidavit they would have to determine for themselves, its action in not going further and instructing them orally as to what weight should be given the affidavit was proper since instructions, in the absence of a waiver by the parties, must be delivered in writing. St. v. Duncan, 82 M 170, 266 P 400 (1928).

1991 Amendment: Substituted present language concerning taking written instructions, notes, and exhibits for deliberations for former text that read: "Upon retiring for deliberation, the jury may take with them all papers which have been received as evidence in the cause, except depositions or copies of such papers as ought not, in the opinion of the court, to be taken from the person having them in his possession. The jury may also take with them any exhibits which the court may deem proper and notes of the proceedings taken by themselves".

Case Notes

Silent Surveillance Video That Was Indistinguishable From Crime Scene Photos Admitted During Trial — Not Testimonial Evidence and Did Not Carry Risk of Undue Emphasis — No Abuse of Discretion. St. v. Green, 2022 MT 218, 410 Mont. 415, 519 P.3d 811.

Record Silent as to Whether Testimonial Materials Provided to Jury — Defendant Unable to Establish Prejudice — No Abuse of Discretion: Despite claiming the District Court sent testimonial materials into the jury room during deliberation, the defendant could not establish, based on the record, that the redacted interviews were in fact sent to the jury room. Because based on the conversations in the record it was just as reasonable to assume that the prosecutor agreed that the recordings should not go back to the jury, the defendant did not establish that the District Court abused its discretion and that he suffered prejudice as a result. St. v. Ward, 2020 MT 36, 399 Mont. 16, 457 P.3d 955.

Error to Give Jurors Testimonial Videos Entered Into Evidence: In a partner or family member assault case, body camera footage of police interviews with the defendant, witnesses, and victim that had been entered into evidence was given to the jury. The defendant appealed that the jury should not have unrestricted access to testimonial videos during deliberation. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded for a new trial because of the common-law rule against submission of testimonial evidence to juries during deliberation. St. v. Nordholm, 2019 MT 165, 396 Mont.

384, 445 P.3d 799. See also St. v. Hoover, 2021 MT 276, 406 Mont. 132, 497 P.3d 598, and St. v. Oliver, 2022 MT 104, 408 Mont. 519, 510 P.3d 1218.

Failure to Object to Video of Victim's Forensic Interview Being Sent to Jury Room — No Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: In a sexual assault proceeding, the District Court allowed the jury to have unrestricted access during deliberation to the victim's forensic interview video, which contained testimonial evidence. The victim's statements in the video regarding inappropriate touching differed from the statements she made during testimony at trial. The Supreme Court reviewed to determine whether the failure of the defendant's counsel to object to the video being sent to the jury room constituted ineffective assistance of counsel. Because the record did not suggest that the jury gave undue consideration to the contents of the video, the Supreme Court found that there was not a reasonable probability that the result of the proceeding would have been different but for counsel's failure to object. St. v. Clemans, 2018 MT 187, 392 Mont. 214, 422 P.3d 1210.

Reports of Experts of Nontestimonial Nature: Reports by experts that are not testimonial evidence or materials that the District Court determines may be necessary for deliberation may be taken by a jury to use during deliberations. St. v. Stout, 2010 MT 137, 356 Mont. 468, 237 P.3d 37.

Videotape of Interview With Defendant Allowed Into Jury Room — No Error: The day after a murder, police interviewed Giddings twice. At trial, the District Court allowed an edited version of the tape into evidence, and the jury watched the tape aided by a corresponding transcript during the state's case. The court advised the jury that they would not have the transcript in the jury room, but the court did allow the tape to accompany the jury during deliberations after determining that the tape was not testimonial in nature and simply constituted Giddings' voluntary statements the day after the homicide. Following conviction, Giddings appealed on grounds that allowing the tape into the jury room violated due process by unduly emphasizing his demeanor and statements to the exclusion of other witness testimony. The Supreme Court disagreed. The tape had limited evidentiary value due to its poor quality, and any evidentiary value that the jury derived from the tape came from watching the tape with the aid of the transcript during trial. Giddings was not prejudiced because his statements and demeanor on the tape did not conflict with testimony given by other witnesses at trial, nor was the tape critical to the state's case. Under the totality of the circumstances, the tape was at worst cumulative of other evidence, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the tape into the jury room. St. v. Giddings, 2009 MT 61, 349 M 347, 208 P3d 363 (2009). See also St. v. Bales, 1999 MT 334, 297 M 402, 994 P2d 17 (1999).

Improper Extrinsic Evidence Delivered to Jury — Evidentiary Error Violative of Right to Confront Witnesses Warranting New Trial: At Parker's trial for assault with a weapon, the state introduced a tape of interviews with Parker's children containing the children's observations of the events in question. Unbeknownst to Parker, the tape also contained an interview with another party that implicated Parker. The tape was submitted to the jury during deliberations. Following conviction, Parker contended on appeal that the jury's exposure to the extrinsic evidence, which was never entered into evidence, violated Parker's right to confrontation. The Supreme Court agreed. The interview was of sufficient quality to prejudice Parker's defense and contribute to the conviction, so Parker's right to confront the witness against him was violated when the tape was delivered to the jury. The court remanded for a new trial. St. v. Parker, 2006 MT 258, 334 M 129, 144 P3d 831 (2006).

Taped Evidence Not Admitted at Trial Submitted to Jury — No Burden on Defendant to Object to Unknown Evidence: At Parker's trial for assault with a weapon, the state introduced a tape of interviews with Parker's children containing the children's observations of the events in question. Unbeknownst to Parker, the tape also contained an interview with another party that implicated Parker. The tape was submitted to the jury during deliberations. Following conviction, Parker contended on appeal that the jury's exposure to the extrinsic evidence, which was never entered into evidence, violated Parker's right to confrontation. The state asserted that Parker failed to preserve the issue for direct appeal because Parker did not object to delivery of the tape to the jury, that Parker could not establish that the jury actually heard the unintroduced interview and should pursue the claim through postconviction proceedings, and that delivery of the interview to the jury was harmless error, cumulative to other admissible evidence, and did not contribute to Parker's conviction. The Supreme Court disagreed. Parker could not object to evidence that he did not know existed, and it was illogical to saddle Parker with the burden of proving prejudice. Rather, when extrinsic evidence reaches a jury, the burden of disproving prejudice rests with the state. Parker's appeal was properly before the Supreme Court, and the state's invitation to dismiss the claim was declined. St. v. Parker, 2006 MT 258, 334 M 129, 144 P3d 831 (2006), distinguished in St. v. Wing, 2008 MT 218, 344 M 243, 188 P3d 999 (2008).

Discretion of Trial Court to Determine Whether Items May Be Taken Into Jury Room: It is within the sound discretion of the District Court to determine whether particular items of physical evidence that have been properly admitted and that are not proscribed by statute may be taken into the jury room during deliberations. In the present case, the District Court did not err in allowing into the jury room an exhibit containing three bindles, only one of which had been tested as containing dangerous drugs, in light of the fact that the jury was instructed not to speculate that the untested bindles also contained dangerous drugs. St. v. Long, 2005 MT 130, 327 M 238, 113 P3d 290 (2005). See also St. v. Christenson, 250 M 351, 820 P2d 1303 (1991).

Testimonial Tape-Recorded Interview Improperly Submitted to Jury—Error Harmless Because of Cumulative Nature of Evidence: Following an automobile accident in which his girlfriend was killed, Bales was interviewed by a highway patrol officer who taped the interview, during which Bales failed the HGN test and made allegedly prejudicial statements. Over Bales' objection, the District Court admitted the tape as an exhibit that the jury could listen to during deliberations. The Supreme Court noted that because the jury had not requested the playing of the tape, this section applied, rather than 46-16-503. The Supreme Court found that the tape had a testimonial character and, citing St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453 (1991), for the common-law rule against submitting testimonial materials to the jury for unsupervised and unrestricted review during deliberations, held that the District Court abused its discretion in allowing the tape to go to the jury. However, allowing the jury to hear the tape did not unduly emphasize that testimony to the exclusion of other witnesses, nor were statements on the tape inconsistent with statements given by the witnesses at trial. Rather, the tape was merely cumulative of other evidence and did not prejudice Bales, so the error was harmless. St. v. Bales, 1999 MT 334, 297 M 402, 994 P2d 17, 56 St. Rep. 1334 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Morse, 229 M 222, 746 P2d 108, 44 St. Rep. 1919 (1987), and overruling it to the extent that it is inconsistent with St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453, 48 St. Rep. 62 (1991), regarding the submission of testimonial materials to a deliberating jury. See also St. v. Mayes, 251 M 358, 825 P2d 1196, 49 St. Rep. 75 (1992), St. v. Evans, 261 M 508, 862 P2d 417, 50 St. Rep. 1431 (1993), and St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

Discretion of Court to Prohibit Jury From Taking Notes During Trial—Instruction Outside Presence of Counsel Not Error: Hage was convicted of deliberate homicide. During Hage's trial, the District Court Judge informed the jury members outside the presence of defendant and counsel that the jury would not be allowed to take notes during the trial. The Supreme Court held this section inapplicable because it concerns only the issue of whether notes that are taken by jury members may be taken with them for deliberations. Whether the taking of notes may be prohibited by the court in the first place is a matter left to the discretion of the court. The Supreme Court also held that it was not error for the District Court to give the instruction outside the presence of counsel because the subject of the judge's remarks was a matter within the discretion of the judge and no remark was made about any facts in evidence. St. v. Hage, 258 M 498, 853 P2d 1251, 50 St. Rep. 631 (1993).

Jury Allowed to Take Tape Recordings Into Deliberations: It was within the discretion of the District Court to allow the jury to take tape recordings into the jury room during deliberations. The tapes had been admitted into evidence, and the jury was properly instructed as to the weight to be given the tapes. St. v. Morse, 229 M 222, 746 P2d 108, 44 St. Rep. 1919 (1987), followed in St. v. Christenson, 250 M 351, 820 P2d 1303, 48 St. Rep. 1034 (1991), and distinguished, and overruled to the extent that it is inconsistent with St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453, 48 St. Rep. 62 (1991), regarding the submission of testimonial materials to a deliberating jury, in St. v. Bales, 1999 MT 334, 297 M 402, 994 P2d 17, 56 St. Rep. 1334 (1999).

Jury Misconduct—Police Report Not in Evidence: When jury deliberations were tainted by reading a police report that had not been admitted, to the material prejudice of the defendant's right to an impartial jury, to confront witnesses, and to assistance of counsel at every critical stage of the trial, a new trial was required. St. v. Davison, 173 M 510, 568 P2d 159 (1977).

Experimenting With Exhibit: The jury may have the privilege of examining a dangerous instrument provided that the jury does not use it in any different manner than that involved in the testimony and that no new fact is discovered from its experiment which is hurtful to the defendant. St. v. Thompson, 164 M 415, 524 P2d 1115 (1974).

Taking Photographs to Jury Room: In a criminal prosecution for involuntary manslaughter, photographs of the scene of the accident are "all papers" within the meaning of that phrase as it appears in the statute. Thus, the trial court properly sent the photographs along with the jury when they retired to the jury room for deliberations. St. v. Medicine Bull, 152 M 34, 445 P2d 916 (1968).

Taking Depositions to Jury Room: It was error for the trial court to send to the jury room as an exhibit an alleged confession headed "Affidavit", which to all intents and purposes was a deposition, in view of a former section which expressly prohibited the jury from taking depositions to the jury room for consideration during its deliberations. St. v. Crighton, 97 M 387, 34 P2d 511 (1934).

No Presumption of Prejudice: When exhibits consisting of photographs that had been admitted in evidence without objection by the defendant were taken to the jury room at the close of the trial, apparently without the affirmative consent of the defendant and without an order of the court permitting it to be done, but there was no showing that by the procedure the jury was given any other information than that obtained at the trial, it may not be presumed that the procedure resulted in prejudice to the defendant. St. v. Cates, 97 M 173, 33 P2d 578 (1934).

Consent to Taking Exhibits to Jury Room:

After the jury members had retired to the jury room for deliberation of their verdict, they requested certain exhibits be sent to them. While the defendant was not present in the courtroom, his counsel gave his consent. The Supreme Court held that the proceeding did not constitute a part of the trial and therefore the defendant's presence was not required. St. v. Olson, 87 M 389, 287 P 938 (1930).

Exhibits introduced in evidence in a prosecution for murder which are sent to the jury during its retirement will not be considered as having been received out of court when it is found on a motion for a new trial that counsel for the defendant consented to their being taken to the jury room during the jury's retirement. St. v. Allen, 23 M 118, 57 P 725 (1899).

Waiver of Objection: When on a motion for a new trial it is found that the counsel for the defendant consented to the taking of certain exhibits to the jury room previously admitted in evidence on a prosecution for murder, such consent constitutes a waiver of any objection to the sending of the exhibits to the jury during retirement. St. v. Allen, 23 M 118, 57 P 725 (1899).

Taking Newspapers to Jury Room:

Under a former statute providing that a new trial shall be granted "when the jury has received any evidence, papers, or documents, not authorized by the court", the word "papers" referred to such written instruments as might be competent testimony when inspected by the court and found to be competent under the Rules of Evidence and does not include newspapers; and the reception by the jury of newspapers containing comments on the case does not in itself vitiate the verdict. St. v. Jackson, 9 M 508, 24 P 213 (1890).

Under a former statute providing that a new trial shall be granted "when the jury has been separated without leave of court, or been guilty of any misconduct, tending to prevent a fair and due consideration of the case", the reception by the jury of newspapers containing comments on the trial adverse to the defendant is misconduct tending to show injury to the defendant. St. v. Jackson, 9 M 508, 24 P 213 (1890). See also St. v. Pepo, 23 M 473, 59 P 721 (1900).

46-16-505. Activity of court during jury's absence.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute preserves the procedure established under 1987 MCA 46-16-505. The statute, although amended, still allows the court to conduct other business during deliberations, provided it remains open for matters related to the case being deliberated.

1991 Amendment: After adjourn substituted "or conduct" for "from time to time as to"; and made minor change in style.

Part 6

Verdict — Disposition of Defendant

Part Commission Comments

1991 Part Comments: This part retains the 1987 code provisions for the delivery of a verdict and the disposition of the defendant. See 1987 MCA 46-16-603 through 46-16-605. These statutes amend the 1987 code, but no change in established procedure is anticipated.

Part Case Notes

Findings and Conclusions — Incapacity to Consent: A District Court in a criminal bench trial is under no statutory duty, except in death penalty cases, to make findings. Absent findings, the conclusions of law reached by the court could be construed to mean that the court found lack of the victim's consent (to sexual contact) from his incapacity as a 10-year-old to consent or that in any event the boy did not consent. In that the conclusions of law reached by a trial court do not enjoy the level of inviolability that findings of fact are accorded on appeal, in that the State concedes the inapplicability of the incapacity statutes, and in that there was found sufficient evidence to support a conclusion that the boy did not in fact consent, the conviction on the sexual assault counts is sustained on the basis of the boy not having consented. St. v. Price, 191 M 1, 622 P2d 160, 37 St. Rep. 1926 (1980).

46-16-603. Form of verdict.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute preserves the substance of 1987 MCA 46-16-603. The 1987 code required the jury to return a general verdict for each charge; that statute was amended to direct the jury to return a verdict as instructed by the court. The statute permits flexibility in the type of verdict and the manner in which it is delivered. The amendment should not cause a significant change in practice.

Although a less-than-unanimous verdict is tolerated by the federal constitution, the state constitution requires a unanimous verdict. Compare Apodaca v. Oreg., 406 US 404, 410-12 (1972), and Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const.

Commission Comment Not Divided: This section is a recodification of part of section 95-1915, R.C.M. 1947. Section 46-16-604 is also derived from section 95-1915. The commission comments to section 95-1915 are printed in their entirety under 46-16-603.

[Section 46-16-603(1)] requires that the verdict be unanimous in felony cases as does the present Montana law, (R.C.M. 1947, section 94-7403 [repealed], Article III, section 23 [1889 Mont. Const., revised by Art. II, sec. 26, 1972 Mont. Const.].)

[Section 46-16-603(2)] is self-explanatory and is in harmony with the present law. It makes it unnecessary to retry the case as to all defendants even though the jury may have been able to decide the guilt or innocence of some of them.

[Section 46-16-603(3)] makes no change in the present law.

[Section 46-16-604] raises the question whether a poll of the jury might be had after the return of a sealed verdict. If so, then it may be possible for the jury to be directed to return for further deliberations, even if they have been separated over a weekend or some other period of time.

[Section 46-16-604] provides for the polling of the jury by any party or upon motion of the court. The present law provides only that the jury may be polled at the request of either party.

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

1991 Amendment: In (1) substituted "verdict as instructed by the court" for "general verdict to each offense charged"; deleted (3) that read: "(3) The defendant may be found guilty of an offense necessarily included in the offense charged or of an attempt to commit either the offense charged or an offense necessarily included therein if the attempt is an offense"; and made minor change in style.

Applicability of Commission Comments: The applicability of commission comments should be evaluated with reference to subsequent amendments.

Case Notes

Norquay Instruction Given to Jury — No Coercion: After deliberating for 2½ hours, the jury in a DUI case submitted a note stating that it could not reach a unanimous decision as to the verdict. The District Court gave a Norquay instruction based on St. v. Norquay, 2011 MT 34, 359 Mont. 257, 248 P.3d 817. After an additional hour of deliberation, the jury returned a unanimous guilty verdict. The Supreme Court found that neither the substance nor the timing of the Norquay instruction constituted abuse of discretion. St. v. Sweet, 2018 MT 263, 393 Mont. 202, 429 P.3d 912.

Allen Instruction Given to Potentially Hung Jury — Insufficient Evidence to Trigger Plain Error Review: The Supreme Court declined to review under the plain error doctrine the defendant's mere assertions that the Municipal Court's supplemental Allen instruction dynamited the jury and resulted in a conviction when there would otherwise have been a hung jury, holding that the record lacked sufficient evidence to support the assertions. Billings v. Edward, 2012 MT 186, 366 Mont. 107, 285 P.3d 523.

Failure of Counsel to Request Unanimity Instructions on Two Counts of Criminal Endangerment Not Considered Ineffective Assistance: Gallagher was convicted of two counts of criminal endangerment and asserted on appeal that failure of defense counsel to request specific unanimity instructions on the two charges constituted ineffective assistance and denied Gallagher the right to a fair trial. Based on the record, the Supreme Court disagreed. Both defense and prosecution counsel argued each count to the jury in closing arguments, linking appropriate facts and specific victims to each count, so juror confusion was extremely unlikely, nor could the court conclude that the trial outcome was prejudiced by the lack of a specific unanimity instruction on the endangerment charges that denied Gallagher a fair trial. Gallagher's convictions were affirmed. St. v. Gallagher, 2005 MT 336, 330 M 65, 125 P3d 1141 (2005).

Entry of Trial Court Judge Into Jury Room Without Counsel, Defendant, and Court Reporter — Automatic Reversible Error Absent Recorded Waiver by Defendant of Constitutional Rights: On the second full day of jury deliberations in Tapson's trial on charges of sexual intercourse without consent, aggravated kidnapping, and attempted deliberate homicide, the trial judge met with counsel, on the record, to notify them that the jury had a verdict on one of the three counts, but was unable to reach a verdict on the other two counts. With Tapson present, the state suggested substituting the existing verdict form, which listed all three charges, with six verdict forms—one "guilty" form and one "not guilty" form for each of the three charges—to avoid the problem of the jury switching its current verdict on one charge for some sort of last minute compromise. The state also suggested that the judge take the forms into the jury room, rather than moving the jury and handling the matter in open court. Tapson's counsel stated that the defense did not have any objection to the proposition, so the judge took the forms into the jury room, without counsel or Tapson present, and returned 11 minutes later. There was no record of whether the judge spent the entire time with the jury, what the judge told the jury, whether the jury had any questions, or whether the judge gave any responses. Tapson was subsequently convicted of attempted deliberate homicide, although the jury could not reach a verdict on the other charges. Tapson was sentenced to life imprisonment, but appealed the conviction and sentence. The Supreme Court noted Tapson's fundamental constitutional right to be present and defend in person and by counsel, and the fundamental right to a public trial, which extends to the entire trial, including the judge's instructions to the jury. The state contended that defense counsel waived Tapson's right to be present, but the Supreme Court declined to engage in presumptions of waiver, holding that if a defendant chooses to waive these constitutional rights, the trial court must obtain an on-the-record personal waiver, by the defendant, acknowledging that the defendant voluntarily, intelligently, and knowingly waives the rights. Thus, when there is some circumstance arguably making it necessary for a trial judge to enter the jury room while the jury is present, the court must contemporaneously explain to the defendant, on the record, the constitutional right to be present at all critical stages of the trial and the right to a public trial. The defendant may then choose to waive those rights. However, absent a contemporaneous, personal, knowing, voluntary, intelligent, on-the-record waiver by the defendant, if a judge enters a jury room while the jury is present and without counsel, the defendant, and the court reporter, reversal will be automatic. Tapson's constitutional rights were violated, so the case was reversed and remanded for further proceedings. St. v. Tapson, 2001 MT 292, 307 M 428, 41 P3d 305 (2001), following St. v. Reed, 65 M 51, 210 P 756 (1922), St. v. Allison, 116 M 352, 153 P2d 141 (1944), U.S. v. U.S. Gypsum Co., 438 US 422 (1978), and Commonwealth v. Patry, 722 NE 2d 979 (Mass. App. Ct. 2000), and distinguishing St. v. Harris, 1999 MT 115, 294 M 397, 983 P2d 881 (1999), and St. v. LaDue, 2001 MT 47, 304 M 288, 20 P3d 775 (2001).

Jury Poll Indicating Lack of Unanimity of Verdict in Criminal Case — Error in Failing to Direct Further Deliberation or Discharge Jury: Following Pyatt's jury trial for felony stalking, the jury was polled in open court as to whether each juror agreed with the verdict. One juror said no, stating that he went along with the verdict because he was outnumbered. Recognizing that a unanimous verdict was required, the court then inquired whether the juror had voted yes in the jury room, and the juror said that he voted in favor of the majority in the end, so his vote was yes. The remainder of the jury also voted yes, so the court ruled that the verdict was unanimous, and Pyatt was convicted and sentenced to the Department of Corrections for 5 years. In polling a jury, the court is to inquire into the jurors' present states of mind as of the time of the poll. To fulfill the jury poll's purpose of safeguarding a defendant's right to a unanimous verdict, the jury poll must afford a juror an opportunity to make an unambiguous reply as to that juror's present state of mind. Here, the juror's response indicated disagreement with the verdict, and the court's further conversation was inappropriate. No juror should surrender an honest opinion as to the weight or effect of evidence or the innocence or guilt of a defendant because the majority of the jury feels otherwise or to return a unanimous verdict or prevent a mistrial. Once the juror indicated disagreement with the verdict, the court should have either directed the jury to deliberate further or discharged the jury, and failure to do so constituted reversible error. St. v. Pyatt, 2000 MT 136, 300 M 25, 1 P3d 953, 57 St. Rep. 555 (2000), following St. v. Holloway, 740 P2d 711 (N. Mex. App. 1987).

Return of Blank Verdict Form—No General Rule: Turner was charged under the felony-murder rule for complicity in a prison riot that led to the deaths of several other inmates. The jury reached an inconclusive verdict on the underlying burglary charge, returning a blank verdict form. Turner contended that under St. v. Weinberger, 206 M 110, 671 P2d 567 (1983), a blank verdict form is a not guilty verdict. Distinguishing Weinberger, the Supreme Court declined to define the meaning of a blank verdict form in any given case or to state a general rule, noting the jury's intent from the record and holding that the jury's blank verdict had no impact on the ultimate issue of whether the state sustained its burden of proof. St. v. Turner, 265 M 337, 877 P2d 978, 51 St. Rep. 467 (1994).

Defendant Alleging Inconsistent Verdict: The jury returned a verdict finding the defendant guilty of aggravated burglary, aggravated kidnapping, and felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and not guilty of robbery and theft. The defendant argued that the verdict was inconsistent because if the jury found him innocent of robbery, it could not find him guilty of aggravated burglary and kidnapping. The Supreme Court held that the verdict was not inconsistent because the jury could find that the defendant had inflicted bodily injury while acting with the purpose to commit a robbery but had not completed the robbery. St. v. LaPier, 242 M 335, 790 P2d 983, 47 St. Rep. 760 (1990).

Initial Verdict Not Unanimous — No Mistrial: In considering the criminal charge against the defendant, the jury returned to the courtroom and disclosed its vote of 10 to 2 in favor of conviction. The judge did not make a prohibited inquiry of the jury as to its numerical division, nor was it reversible error for the judge to ask the jury to return to the jury room for a reasonable time to attempt to reach a unanimous decision when he emphasized that no juror should think any pressure was being placed on him to reach a unanimous decision. Given the manner in which the jury disclosed its initial vote, the trial court was correct in refusing to grant a mistrial because of the initial verdict. St. v. George, 219 M 377, 711 P2d 1379, 43 St. Rep. 26 (1986).

Jury Not to Consider Sentence: District Court properly refused to give and avoided prejudicial error by refusing to give defendant's requested instruction that there is a mandatory 2-year sentence for each verdict of guilty of kidnapping which may not be suspended or deferred by the court. Sentencing is solely for the court, and the jury is not to consider possible punishment upon conviction. St. v. Herrera, 197 M 462, 643 P2d 588, 39 St. Rep. 731 (1982).

Use of Juror Affidavits to Show Misconduct: When the jury failed to reach a verdict and juror affidavits showed that, because of outside influences on the jury during its deliberations, a verdict of acquittal on three of the charges was actually rendered by the jury but not returned to the court due to confusion over jury instructions, justice compelled the use of the juror affidavits to prove what actually occurred and the rule that juror affidavits cannot be used to impeach jury verdicts did not apply as the jury did not return a verdict of any kind. St. v. Herron, 169 M 193, 545 P2d 678 (1976), distinguished in St. v. White Clay, 1998 MT 244, 291 M 147, 967 P2d 370, 55 St. Rep. 1014 (1998).

Manslaughter Included in Murder: When the defendant was charged under former law with murder in the second degree, it was permissible for the jury to find him guilty of involuntary manslaughter. St. v. Allison, 122 M 120, 199 P2d 279 (1948).

An information under former law charging murder, when stripped of the terms conveying the idea of deliberation, premeditation, and malice, sufficiently charged manslaughter, and the accused could be found guilty of the lesser offense. St. v. Crean, 43 M 47, 114 P 603 (1911).

When under former law there was evidence tending to show that the defendant was guilty of murder in the first degree, murder in the second degree, and manslaughter, it was the duty of the court to instruct that a verdict for manslaughter could be returned since manslaughter was not a degree of murder. St. v. Shadwell, 26 M 52, 66 P 508 (1901).

Failure to Object to Instructions — Verdict Reviewable: The failure of the defendant to object to instructions under former law on first degree murder did not deprive him of the right to ask for a new trial on the ground that the evidence did not justify a verdict of murder in that degree. St. v. Gunn, 85 M 553, 281 P 757 (1929).

Technical Pleading Rules Inapplicable: A verdict is not subject to the technical rules that govern pleadings. Tripp v. Silver Dyke Min. Co., 70 M 120, 224 P 272 (1924); Consol. Gold & Sapphire Min. Co. v. Struthers, 41 M 565, 111 P 152 (1910).

Offense Found Independent of Offense Charged:

A party cannot be charged with one crime and be convicted of another independent offense. Thus, under former law a verdict of guilty of malicious destruction of property was insufficient under a charge of the malicious burning of property. The offense found did not include the offense charged. In such a case it was the right and duty of the trial court to require the jury to return some form of verdict authorized by law or to report a disagreement. St. v. Sieff, 54 M 165, 168 P 524 (1917).

Under former law, when the defendant was specifically charged with burglary in the nighttime, constituting the first degree of the offense of burglary, the jury could not convict him of the crime in the second degree, as having been committed in the daytime, since the former did not include the latter; the defendant needed only meet the accusation as made and not another and a different one, and the prosecution was held to proof of the charge as set out in the information. St. v. Copenhagen, 35 M 342, 89 P 61 (1907).

Court's Charge — Restricting Consideration of Lesser Offense: While under former law the offense of kidnapping included the minor offenses of false imprisonment and assault in the third degree, the court did not need to so formulate the charge that the jury could find the defendant guilty of a lower offense or of an included offense when the evidence was such as to show that the defendant was guilty of the offense charged or was entitled to an acquittal. St. v. McDonald, 51 M 1, 149 P 279 (1915).

Verdict Upon Finding of Insanity: Under former law when the defendant, charged with assault in the first degree, relied wholly upon the defense of insanity, the court's instruction that the jury might find the defendant guilty of assault in the first, second, or third degree or not guilty was inaccurate; the jury should have been told that, if they found him not guilty because insane, their verdict should be "not guilty by reason of insanity". St. v. Crowe, 39 M 174, 102 P 579 (1909).

Presence of Jurors When Verdict Delivered: When the record did not show that the jurors were not all present when the verdict was delivered and from the minutes no other fair inference could be drawn than that they were actually present at the time, the omission from the minutes of a statement that their names were called prior to delivery of the verdict was not an error that prejudiced the defendant in his substantial rights. St. v. DeLea, 36 M 531, 93 P 814 (1908).

Jury's Misunderstanding of Instructions: The affidavits of two jurors, filed in aid of a motion for a new trial by the defendant in a prosecution for murder, in which both stated that they had misunderstood the instructions of the court, which clearly charged the jury that it could find the accused guilty of any grade of unlawful homicide or acquit him, in that from a reading of the instructions the two jurors were under the impression that the jury was required to either find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree or acquit him, and that being unwilling to acquit they voted for murder in the first degree rather than declare him innocent, did not show such misconduct on the part of the jury as to entitle the defendant to a new trial. St. v. Beesskov, 34 M 41, 85 P 376 (1906).

Jury Poll Indicating Lack of Unanimity of Verdict in Criminal Case — Error in Failing to Direct Further Deliberation or Discharge Jury: Following Pyatt's jury trial for felony stalking, the jury was polled in open court as to whether each juror agreed with the verdict. One juror said no, stating that he went along with the verdict because he was outnumbered. Recognizing that a unanimous verdict was required, the court then inquired whether the juror had voted yes in the jury room, and the juror said that he voted in favor of the majority in the end, so his vote was yes. The remainder of the jury also voted yes, so the court ruled that the verdict was unanimous, and Pyatt was convicted and sentenced to the Department of Corrections for 5 years. In polling a jury, the court is to inquire into the jurors' present states of mind as of the time of the poll. To fulfill the jury poll's purpose of safeguarding a defendant's right to a unanimous verdict, the jury poll must afford a juror an opportunity to make an unambiguous reply as to that juror's present state of mind. Here, the juror's response indicated disagreement with the verdict, and the court's further conversation was inappropriate. No juror should surrender an honest opinion as to the weight or effect of evidence or the innocence or guilt of a defendant because the majority of the jury feels otherwise or to return a unanimous verdict or prevent a mistrial. Once the juror indicated disagreement with the verdict, the court should have either directed the jury to deliberate further or discharged the jury, and failure to do so constituted reversible error. St. v. Pyatt, 2000 MT 136, 300 M 25, 1 P3d 953, 57 St. Rep. 555 (2000), following St. v. Holloway, 740 P2d 711 (N. Mex. App. 1987).

Initial Verdict Not Unanimous — No Mistrial: In considering the criminal charge against the defendant, the jury returned to the courtroom and disclosed its vote of 10 to 2 in favor of conviction. The judge did not make a prohibited inquiry of the jury as to its numerical division, nor was it reversible error for the judge to ask the jury to return to the jury room for a reasonable time to attempt to reach a unanimous decision when he emphasized that no juror should think any pressure was being placed on him to reach a unanimous decision. Given the manner in which the jury disclosed its initial vote, the trial court was correct in refusing to grant a mistrial because of the initial verdict. St. v. George, 219 M 377, 711 P2d 1379, 43 St. Rep. 26 (1986).

Verdict by Full Panel: When on the poll of the jury one juror answered that the verdict of guilty of burglary was his verdict provided that the sentence was suspended but thereafter, upon inquiry by the court, unqualifiedly answered that it was his verdict, a motion for dismissal of the information on the ground that the verdict had not been rendered by a full panel was properly denied. St. v. Asher, 63 M 302, 206 P 1091 (1922).

No significant change.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: At beginning substituted "a verdict of not guilty is returned" for "judgment of acquittal is given on a general verdict" and at end, after "given", deleted "except, where the acquittal is because of a variance between the pleading and proof which may be obviated by a new indictment or information, the court may order his detention to the end that a new indictment or information may be filed by the county attorney"; and made minor change in style.

Case Notes

Jury Disregarding the Law: The jury has the power to disregard the law as declared and acquit the defendant, however convincing the evidence may be, and the court has no power to punish the jury for such conduct. St. v. Koch, 33 M 490, 85 P 272 (1906).

Case Notes

Value of Stolen Property at Issue — Error in Refusal of Instruction on Lesser Included Offense: Where the defendant had been charged with the felony theft of a guitar alleged to have a value of more than $150, the District Court erred in refusing an instruction requiring the jury to convict the defendant of the lesser included offense of misdemeanor theft if they found the value of the guitar to be less than $150. Under the rationale of St. v. Taylor, 163 M 106, 515 P2d 695 (1973), the instruction should have been given because the weight of the evidence of value of the guitar was a question for the jury. St. v. Young, 206 M 19, 669 P2d 239, 40 St. Rep. 1474 (1983).

Modification of Verdict Without New Trial: Under a former statute providing that when the verdict is contrary to the law or evidence but the evidence shows the accused to be guilty only of a lesser degree or a lesser included offense rather than the degree of which he was convicted, the court could modify the judgment without granting a new trial. The expression "the verdict is contrary to the evidence" meant the same thing as the expression "insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict". St. v. Schoenborn, 55 M 517, 178 P 294 (1919); Flaherty v. Butte Elec. Ry., 42 M 89, 111 P 348 (1910).

46-16-607. Conviction of lesser included offense.Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is a newly developed provision intended to regulate a jury's consideration of lesser included offenses. The statute allows a lesser included offense instruction only upon a party's request and only if the evidence warrants it. The Commission recognized that the statute makes significant changes in established procedure. The statute has been drafted to comport with a recent Ninth Circuit Court decision. See U.S. v. Jackson, 726 F2d 1466 (9th Cir. 1984).

Jury Instruction Regarding Text Messages to Minor Offering Money in Exchange for Seeing Minor Nude — District Court Did Not Abuse Discretion by Refusing to Give Jury Instruction for Violation of Privacy in Communication as Lesser-Included Offense of Sexual Abuse of Children — Crime Charged Is Matter of Prosecutorial Discretion. St. v. Brown, 2022 MT 176, 410 Mont. 38, 517 P.3d 177.

Car Speeding up to 150 MPH — Criminal Endangerment — Jury Instruction on Negligent Endangerment Properly Denied: The defendant was driving up to 150 miles an hour on the interstate and passing numerous vehicles. Ultimately, the defendant stopped after his car ran over spike strips and he was charged with criminal endangerment. At trial, the defendant proposed a jury instruction to the lesser included offense of negligent endangerment, which the District Court did not permit. Following his conviction, the defendant appealed, arguing that the District Court abused its discretion in not allowing the instruction because a rational jury could have found that he had acted negligently. The Supreme Court examined the record and agreed it did not support the finding that the defendant had acted negligently and affirmed the ruling. St. v. Jensen, 2019 MT 60, 395 Mont. 119, 437 P.3d 117.

Negligent Endangerment Lesser Included Offense of Criminal Endangerment — District Court Erred by Not Giving Jury Instruction on Negligent Endangerment: The defendant was charged with criminal endangerment for driving his daughter while allegedly under the influence of alcohol and prescription painkillers. At trial, his counsel offered a jury instruction on negligent endangerment as a lesser included offense of criminal endangerment, which the District Court declined to give. The jury convicted him of criminal endangerment. On appeal, the defendant argued that the District Court had erred in not giving the jury the instruction on negligent endangerment. The Supreme Court agreed, concluding that the only difference between criminal endangerment and negligent endangerment is the state of mind of the accused and that there were facts that would allow a jury to infer either state of mind. The Supreme Court held that negligent endangerment is a lesser included offense of criminal endangerment and reversed and remanded the matter to the District Court for further proceedings. St. v. Shegrud, 2014 MT 63, 374 Mont. 192, 320 P.3d 455.

Failure to Instruct Jury on Misdemeanor Assault as Lesser Included Offense of Assault With Weapon — Reversible Error: Feltz's attorney requested that the jury be instructed on misdemeanor assault as a lesser included offense of assault with a weapon, based on the fact that one of the victims may not have been in fear of serious bodily injury or that the fear was not reasonable in light of the circumstances. The instruction was denied and Feltz appealed. The Supreme Court held that evidence in the record supported the instruction in this case. Failure to give the instruction was reversible error, and the case was remanded for a new trial. St. v. Feltz, 2010 MT 48, 355 Mont. 308, 227 P.3d 1035, distinguishing St. v. Reiner, 179 Mont. 239, 587 P.2d 950 (1978).

No Error in Refusing to Give Lesser Included Offense Instruction When Defendant Could Not Rationally Be Convicted of Lesser Offense: Schmidt contended that the trial court improperly denied a request to give an instruction on aggravated assault as a lesser included offense of deliberate homicide. The Supreme Court disagreed. By definition, aggravated assault does not include death, and if a death occurs, homicide is implicated, so the jury could not rationally have found Schmidt guilty of aggravated assault when the victim of Schmidt's attack died. The fact that aggravated assault constitutes a lesser included offense of deliberate homicide does not in itself satisfy the statutory requirement for a lesser included offense instruction if the jury was not warranted in finding guilt of aggravated assault based on the evidence. St. v. Schmidt, 2009 MT 450, 354 M 280, 224 P.3d 618 (2009).

No Possibility of Lesser Plea Instruction — No Error in Denial of Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea: As part of a plea agreement, Swensen pleaded guilty to felony assault and signed a waiver of rights, including the right to a jury instruction on a lesser included offense. Swensen subsequently moved to withdraw the guilty plea on grounds that the District Court failed to specifically advise him about the lesser included offense of misdemeanor assault during the change of plea hearing. The District Court denied the motion and Swensen was sentenced pursuant to the terms of the plea agreement. Swensen appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. A court may at any time before judgment and within 1 year after final judgment allow a defendant to withdraw a guilty plea upon a showing of good cause, which includes the minimal constitutional requirement that a guilty plea be voluntary and intelligent and may include additional criteria such as the discovery of new exculpatory evidence. In this case, Swensen's guilty plea to aggravated assault was voluntary, and the District Court's interrogation during the change of plea hearing was adequate. Additionally, Swensen's admissions on the record about the nature of the injuries inflicted on the victim effectively eliminated the possibility that Swensen was entitled to a lesser included offense instruction. Absent good cause, the District Court did not err in denying Swensen's motion to withdraw the guilty plea. St. v. Swensen, 2009 MT 42, 349 M 268, 203 P3d 786 (2009). See also St. v. Martinez, 1998 MT 265, 291 M 265, 968 P2d 705 (1998), and St. v. Peterson, 2013 MT 329, 372 Mont. 382, 314 P.3d 227.

No Prejudice Arising From Lesser Included Offense Instruction — Reversal Unwarranted: Potter was charged with aggravated assault. At trial, the District Court included two lesser included offense instructions for attempted aggravated assault and assault, and Potter objected to including the attempted aggravated assault instruction. The jury returned a guilty verdict on the aggravated assault charge. On appeal, Potter contended that the court erred by instructing the jury on attempted aggravated assault because attempted aggravated assault is not a lesser included offense of aggravated assault. However, the jury never reached the question of whether Potter committed the lesser offense, so Potter was not prejudiced by inclusion of the attempted aggravated assault instruction. Absent prejudice, the Supreme Court declined to reverse the conviction. St. v. Potter, 2008 MT 381, 347 M 38, 197 P3d 471 (2008).

Lesser Misdemeanor Assault Instruction Properly Refused Absent Evidentiary Support: At Johnson's trial for aggravated assault, Johnson contended that the trial court improperly refused to give the jury an instruction on the lesser offense of misdemeanor assault. The trial court held that the evidence did not warrant a lesser offense instruction, and on appeal, the Supreme Court agreed. The victim suffered two dislocated shoulders representing very severe trauma, with the possibility of injuries to the heart and lungs. One shoulder was permanently impaired, limiting the victim's range of motion and preventing the victim from returning to preinjury employment. Thus, the victim suffered more than pain, impairment, or reasonable apprehension of bodily injury characterizing misdemeanor assault. The evidence did not support a lesser misdemeanor offense instruction, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to give one. St. v. Johnson, 2008 MT 227, 344 M 313, 187 P3d 662 (2008).

No Right to Be Informed of Possibility of Lesser Included Offense When No Such Possibility Exists: Defendant was charged with felony attempted sexual assault, but ultimately pleaded nolo contendere to a charge of felony attempted kidnapping. After being sentenced to 10 years in prison, defendant appealed the conviction on grounds that the trial court erred by failing to inform defendant that he could have been convicted on a lesser charge of unlawful restraint and by failing to allow withdrawal of the guilty plea. However, only those lesser included offenses applicable to the charge of felony attempted sexual assault were relevant to defendant's decision to plead nolo contendere. The court and the state could not be faulted for failing to inform defendant of any lesser included offense that was not relevant to defendant's decision, and defendant had no right to be informed of the possibility of submitting a lesser included offense instruction to the jury when no such possibility existed. Absent anything in the record that an omission, misinformation, or mental incapacity hindered defendant's ability to enter knowingly and intelligently into a plea agreement, the trial court did not err in holding that defendant failed to establish good cause to withdraw the plea, and the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Iaforano, 2007 MT 77, 336 M 489, 155 P3d 1238 (2007).

Jury Instruction Regarding Effect of Intoxication on Mens Rea Properly Rejected: Following conviction for deliberate homicide, Smith asserted that the trial court erred in refusing to instruct the jury regarding evidence of Smith's intoxication when considering whether Smith acted with intent to commit the crime. Smith contended that 45-2-203 unconstitutionally violated due process by excluding evidence of intoxication in determining mental state. The Supreme Court noted that the due process issue had been decided contrary to Smith's argument in Mont. v. Egelhoff, 518 US 37 (1996), so declining Smith's intoxication instruction was not error. Viewed as a whole, the jury instructions fully and fairly instructed the jury on the applicable law, and Smith's conviction was affirmed. St. v. Smith, 2005 MT 325, 329 M 526, 127 P3d 353 (2005), distinguishing U.S. v. Burdeau, 168 F3d 352 (9th Cir. 1999).

Failure to Give Jury Instruction on Lesser Included Offense of Unlawful Restraint in Aggravated Kidnapping Trial — Reversible Error: In Meyer's aggravated kidnapping trial, Meyer requested a jury instruction allowing the jury to consider unlawful restraint as a lesser included offense, but the instruction was denied. The Supreme Court noted that what constitutes isolation in terms of kidnapping and unlawful restraint is an issue for the trier of fact to decide, as long as there is some basis in the evidence for its conclusion. The jury as trier of fact in this case did not receive full and fair instructions on the applicable law and thus was not allowed to consider whether Meyer was guilty of the lesser included offense of unlawful restraint in light of the evidence. The judgment was reversed, and the case was remanded for a new trial. St. v. Meyer, 2005 MT 215, 328 M 247, 119 P3d 1214 (2005).

Misinformation in Plea Agreement and Incomplete Information Provided by District Court Raising Doubt as to Intelligent Guilty Plea — Denial of Withdrawal of Plea Reversed: Rave was charged with sexual assault with bodily injury. Following advice of counsel, Rave accepted a plea agreement and pleaded guilty. Prior to sentencing, Rave moved to withdraw the guilty plea, but the motion was denied, and Rave was sentenced pursuant to the plea agreement. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the plea agreement erroneously advised Rave that sexual assault may be a lesser included felony offense and that the penalty was the same as for sexual assault with bodily injury when, in fact, the lesser included offense was a misdemeanor. In addition, the District Court did not correct the misinformation in the plea agreement when accepting the guilty plea, so Rave could not have made a knowing, intelligent, and voluntary plea. Thus, the Supreme Court reversed the denial of Rave's motion to withdraw the guilty plea and remanded for further proceedings. St. v. Rave, 2005 MT 78, 326 M 398, 109 P3d 753 (2005).

Lesser Included Offense Instruction on Resisting Arrest Not Warranted When Defendant Under Arrest at Time of Assault: Pittman was arrested for disorderly conduct, and Pittman assaulted an officer and attempted to assault other officers while at the detention center. At the trial for felony assault and felony attempted assault, Pittman contended that the jury should be given an instruction on the lesser included offense of resisting arrest, but the instruction was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Pittman was already under arrest when the felony assaults took place. Absent evidence in the record that would permit the jury to find Pittman guilty of resisting arrest and acquit on the felony charges, it was not error to deny Pittman's request for the lesser included offense instruction. St. v. Pittman, 2005 MT 70, 326 M 324, 109 P3d 237 (2005).

Misdemeanor Assault Not Lesser Included Offense of Sexual Assault — Denial of Lesser Included Offense Instruction Not Error: In a sexual assault trial, Cameron requested a jury instruction that misdemeanor assault was a lesser included offense of sexual assault. The request was denied. On appeal, Cameron raised several arguments regarding the lesser included offense and claimed error in denial of the instruction. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Martinez, 1998 MT 265, 291 M 306, 968 P2d 705 (1998), two criteria must be met before a defendant is entitled to a lesser offense instruction: (1) the offense must actually constitute a lesser included offense of the offense charged; and (2) there must be sufficient evidence to support the lesser included offense instruction. The court examined the elements of both offenses and concluded that the elements of misdemeanor assault and sexual assault are not similar and do not overlap. Thus, misdemeanor assault is not a lesser included offense of sexual assault. The jury was therefore properly instructed, and the sexual assault conviction was affirmed. St. v. Cameron, 2005 MT 32, 326 M 51, 106 P3d 1189 (2005), followed in St. v. Gerstner, 2009 MT 303, 353 M 86, 219 P3d 866 (2009). See also St. v. Denny, 2021 MT 104, 404 Mont. 116, 485 P.3d 1227.

No Prejudice to Defendant When Assistance of Counsel Not Deficient: Following conviction for deliberate homicide, Sellner filed a petition for postconviction relief based on ineffective assistance of counsel, contending that counsel was deficient in: (1) failing to investigate and present a case for justifiable use of force; (2) abandoning an attempted mitigated deliberate homicide defense; (3) pursuing a defense based on a civil suit filed against defendant; (4) failing to offer a "failure to agree" instruction to the jury; and (5) making other errors. The Supreme Court applied the Strickland test to determine whether counsel's performance was deficient and prejudicial, addressing each argument in turn, and concluded that Sellner's contentions of deficient counsel were unfounded. Absent a showing of deficient counsel, Sellner could not show prejudice, and the denial of the petition for postconviction relief was affirmed. Sellner v. St., 2004 MT 205, 322 M 310, 95 P3d 708 (2004), following St. v. Hubbel, 2001 MT 31, 304 M 184, 20 P3d 111 (2001).

No Error in Failure to Give Instruction Citing Statutory Language Regarding Value When Adequately Covered in Another Instruction: In a trial for attempted theft, Maloney offered a jury instruction, drawing from the statutory definition of value in 45-2-101, which included language that if value cannot be determined beyond a reasonable doubt, the value must be considered to be less than $1,000. The District Court rejected that instruction and gave an instruction that adequately informed the jury that value was an element of attempted theft and that the jury had to find that the value in question exceeded $1,000 to find Maloney guilty of felony theft. Although Maloney's proposed instruction followed more closely the statutory definition, citing exact statutory language in an instruction is not necessary if the instructions given explain the crime. Maloney's instruction would have added little to the jury's understanding of the law, and the District Court did not err in rejecting Maloney's instruction when the element of value was adequately covered in another instruction. St. v. Maloney, 2003 MT 288, 318 M 66, 78 P3d 1214 (2003).

Criminal Endangerment, Negligent Endangerment, and Partner or Family Member Assault Not Considered Lesser Included Offenses of Aggravated Assault: At trial for aggravated assault, the District Court refused Hoffman's request of lesser included offense instructions on the offenses of criminal endangerment, negligent endangerment, and partner or family member assault, and Hoffman appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Under 46-1-202(8)(a), a lesser included offense is one that is established by proof of the same or less than all the facts required to establish commission of the offense charged, while under 46-1-202(8)(c), a lesser included offense is one that differs from the offense charged only in the respect that a lesser kind of culpability suffices to establish its commission. Although Hoffman made prefatory reference to both subsections, the substance of Hoffman's argument focused entirely on subsection (8)(c), and the Supreme Court declined to address arguments related to subsection (8)(a) that were raised for the first time on appeal. It is incumbent on counsel to specify at trial which subsection is being relied upon. Subsection (8)(c) does not support a conclusion that criminal endangerment, negligent endangerment, or partner or family member assault is a lesser included offense of aggravated assault. The District Court's properly concluded that the offenses were too dissimilar to warrant a lesser included offense instruction. St. v. Hoffman, 2003 MT 26, 314 M 155, 64 P3d 1013 (2003), following St. v. Fisch, 266 M 520, 881 P2d 626 (1994).

Improper Jury Instructions — Mitigated Deliberate Homicide Verdict Without First Finding Guilt of Deliberate Homicide — Reversible Error: Demontiney was charged with deliberate homicide. On the first morning of trial, counsel exchanged jury instructions, and neither party's instructions included mitigated deliberate homicide. Following 3 days of testimony, the state proposed an instruction on mitigated deliberate homicide, arguing that evidence introduced at trial obligated the state to offer the instruction. The trial court agreed and stated that the jury would be instructed on mitigated deliberate homicide. Consistent with St. v. Scarborough, 2000 MT 301, 302 M 350, 14 P3d 1202 (2000), the state prepared instructions and a verdict form incorporating the "failure to agree" concept, directing the jury to consider all evidence relating to both the greater and lesser charges before considering the verdict on the greater charge. Nevertheless, the trial court's instructions and verdict form did not match those offered by either party. Rather, the trial court instructed the jury that it should first consider the deliberate homicide charge, and if it reached a not guilty verdict or was unable to reach a verdict on that charge, it was then to consider the mitigated deliberate homicide charge. The jury found Demontiney not guilty of deliberate homicide, but guilty of mitigated deliberate homicide. The Supreme Court found that the jury instructions were not a full and fair instruction on the applicable law. The District Court was bound by Scarborough, whether the court agreed with that decision or not. A finding of guilt on mitigated deliberate homicide requires a finding of every element of deliberate homicide, plus an additional finding of extreme mental or emotional stress. Thus, the jury's verdict was logically impossible, prejudicing Demontiney, and the jury instructions constituted reversible error. The verdict was vacated, and Demontiney was immediately discharged. (See 2003 amendment to 45-5-103.) Demontiney v. District Court, 2002 MT 161, 310 M 406, 51 P3d 476 (2002), distinguished in St. v. Schmidt, 2009 MT 450, 354 M 280, 224 P3d 618 (2009). However, see St. v. MacGregor, 2013 MT 297, 372 Mont. 142, 311 P.3d 428, in which the Supreme Court held that an improper jury instruction on mitigated deliberate homicide did not rise to the level of plain error because the defendant did not prove any mitigating factors as a matter of law.

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel in Failure to Offer "Failure to Agree" Instruction — Prejudice Warranting Remand for New Trial: At Rogers' trial for attempted sexual intercourse without consent and felony assault, the District Court provided jury instructions with misdemeanor sexual assault and misdemeanor assault as lesser included offenses. Rogers' attorney requested the “acquittal first” instruction, which provided that the jury was not to consider the lesser included offenses unless they first acquitted on the greater offenses. Rogers contended that the failure of the attorney to request the “failure to agree” instruction allowed under this section, which provides that the jury may consider a lesser included offense if it is unable to reach a verdict on the greater offense, constituted ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court agreed. The “failure to agree” instruction was drafted to protect against the serious risk identified in U.S. v. Jackson, 726 F2d 1466 (9th Cir. 1984), which arises when jurors harboring a doubt as to defendant’s guilt of the greater offense, but at the same time convinced that defendant had committed some offense, might wrongly yield to the majority and convict of the greater offense rather than not convict at all. The failure to offer this potentially beneficial instruction, when that failure is not part of counsel’s trial strategy, is an error so serious that it falls outside the range of competence required of attorneys in criminal cases. Thus, when sufficient facts exist to support a conviction for a lesser included offense, defense counsel must offer the “failure to agree” instruction unless there is a tactical reason for not doing so, and failure to offer the instruction in such cases is prejudicial error. St. v. Rogers, 2001 MT 165, 306 M 130, 32 P3d 724 (2001).

No Abuse of Discretion in Refusing to Instruct Jury on Lesser Included Offense of Negligent Homicide Absent Supporting Evidence: German was convicted of attempted felony assault and deliberate homicide. At trial, the court instructed the jury on German’s defense of justifiable use of force and gave a mitigated deliberate homicide instruction but refused to give a jury instruction regarding the lesser included offense of negligent homicide, finding no evidence to support the instruction. German appealed on grounds that the trial court erred in failing to give the negligent homicide instruction. The Supreme Court affirmed. District Courts have broad discretion in formulating jury instructions, including the authority to reject instructions that are not supported by evidence. A lesser included offense instruction must be given when properly requested and when the jury could be warranted in finding defendant guilty of the lesser included offense, based on the evidence, but the instruction need not be given if there is no evidence to support it. A lesser included offense instruction is not supported by the evidence when defendant’s evidence or theory, if believed, would require an acquittal. Here, German’s justifiable use of force defense, if proved, would have required an acquittal. German cited St. v. Martinez, 1998 MT 265, 291 M 306, 968 P2d 705 (1998), for the proposition that a defendant is generally entitled to a lesser included offense instruction and that the District Court may usurp the jury’s function by factually deciding the merits of the lesser included offense. The Supreme Court disagreed. Martinez neither overruled nor was inconsistent with cases entitling defendant to a lesser included offense instruction when evidence supports the instruction, and in both civil and criminal proceedings, the determination of whether there is sufficient evidence to raise an issue of fact for a jury is a question of law for the trial court. Only when the trial court determines as a matter of law that factual disputes exist are those disputes turned over to the jury. In this case, German’s own testimony was that he consciously made the decision to shoot the victim, so there was no support for a negligent homicide instruction and the trial court did not err in refusing to give one. St. v. German, 2001 MT 156, 306 M 92, 30 P3d 360 (2001), following St. v. Swan, 279 M 483, 928 P2d 933 (1996).

Failure of Counsel to Exercise Right to Lesser Included Offense Instruction — Presumption of Effective Assistance — Failure to Provide Evidence of Ineffectiveness: This section provides that upon a defendant’s request, the court shall instruct the jury that the jury may consider a lesser included offense if the jury cannot reach a verdict on the greater offense after reasonable effort. Because of the strong presumption that counsel acted reasonably and defendant’s failure to provide any evidence to the contrary, the court would not find that counsel provided ineffective assistance by failing to request the instruction. St. v. Hubbel, 2001 MT 31, 304 M 184, 20 P3d 111 (2001).

Negligent Endangerment Not Lesser Included Offense of Assault of Peace Officer: Section 45-5-210 provides that criminal endangerment, negligent endangerment, and assault are not included as offenses of assault on a peace officer. Fuqua was convicted of assault on a peace officer and argued that 45-5-210 unconstitutionally eliminated consideration of his claim of negligent endangerment as a lesser included offense. The Supreme Court noted that negligent endangerment differs from assault on a peace officer by requiring a lesser kind of culpability and by requiring proof of different conduct; thus, negligent endangerment is not a lesser included offense of assault on a peace officer. Having so concluded, the court declined to address the constitutional question of whether the Legislature can specifically eliminate consideration of an offense as a lesser included offense. St. v. Fuqua, 2000 MT 273, 302 M 99, 13 P3d 34, 57 St. Rep. 1141 (2000).

Criteria Required Before Lesser Included Offense Instruction Required: Two criteria must be met before a defendant is entitled to a lesser included offense instruction: (1) the offense must actually constitute a lesser included offense of the offense charged; and (2) there must be sufficient evidence to support the lesser included offense instruction. In regard to the second criterion, a lesser included offense instruction is not supported by the evidence when the defendant's evidence or theory, if believed, would require an acquittal. In this case, Hamby was charged with felony sexual assault on a 10-year-old girl with Down syndrome. Hamby contended that he was wrestling with the girl rather than sexually assaulting her and thus was entitled to a lesser included instruction for misdemeanor assault. However, if the evidence supported Hamby's theory that he was merely wrestling, there would not be sufficient evidence to establish that he knowingly made physical contact of an insulting or provoking nature to constitute a misdemeanor assault, so an acquittal would result. The evidence did not support Hamby's proposed jury instruction, and the District Court did not err in refusing to give it. St. v. Hamby, 1999 MT 319, 297 M 274, 992 P2d 1266, 56 St. Rep. 1272 (1999). See also St. v. Martinez, 1998 MT 265, 291 M 306, 968 P2d 705, 55 St. Rep. 1093 (1998).

Sufficient Evidence of Criminal Endangerment — Instruction on Negligent Endangerment Not Required: Martinosky was charged with felony criminal endangerment. During settlement of jury instructions, Martinosky offered a proposed instruction on negligent endangerment as a lesser included offense of criminal endangerment, but the instruction was refused. On appeal, without reaching the question of whether negligent endangerment was a lesser included offense of criminal endangerment, the Supreme Court found that the evidence established that Martinosky was fully aware of his actions and the probable outcome of those actions and thus acted knowingly, so an instruction on negligent endangerment was not warranted. St. v. Martinosky, 1999 MT 122, 294 M 427, 982 P2d 440, 56 St. Rep. 495 (1999), following St. v. Martinez, 1998 MT 265, 291 M 306, 968 P2d 705, 55 St. Rep. 1093 (1998). In St. v. Shegrud, 2014 MT 63, 374 Mont. 192, 320 P.3d 455, the Supreme Court ruled that negligent endangerment is a lesser included offense of criminal endangerment.

"Failure to Agree" Instruction — When Corrective Instruction Required: Generally, when a claimed error concerns jury instructions that were not objected to at the time that the instructions were settled, the alleged error may not be raised for the first time on appeal; however, the Supreme Court will review jury instructions in certain circumstances even in the absence of an objection to determine whether the jury was properly instructed. In the present case, there was significant confusion among the court, the prosecutor, and the defense counsel concerning the correct procedural sequence for the jury to consider greater and lesser offenses during deliberations, given a timely request by defendant. If a judge is of the opinion that instructions already given fully advise the jury on the procedures that it is to follow in deliberations, the judge's refusal to answer a jury's question already answered in the instruction is not error. However, when the instruction fails to fully advise, the judge should provide a corrective instruction. The withdrawal of defendant's timely request for an instruction at settlement was due to the mistaken representation of the court and the prosecutor that the law did not allow an instruction that the jury may consider a lesser offense if it fails to agree on a verdict for the greater offense, so the Supreme Court chose to review defendant's claim of error in a jury instruction. Under subsection (3) of this section, as long as a criminal defendant requests a "failure to agree" instruction at the settling of jury instructions, a District Court must instruct the jury that it may consider the lesser offense without first reaching a unanimous verdict on the greater offense. St. v. Robbins, 1998 MT 297, 292 M 23, 971 P2d 359, 55 St. Rep. 1213 (1998), following U.S. v. Jackson, 726 F2d 1466 (9th Cir. 1984).

Counsel Failure to Request Lesser Included Offense Instruction Based on Defense That No Rational Jury Would Believe: In a prosecution for attempted deliberate homicide, defendant's counsel did not render ineffective assistance by failing to request a jury instruction on the lesser included offense of aggravated assault. Therefore, counsel's performance was not outside the range of competence demanded of attorneys under similar circumstances. Defendant admitted that he shot a peace officer in the chest with a .41 caliber magnum pistol while running from the officer, who only wanted to talk to him. His defense was that he thought that the officer was part of a hit team hired by the government to get him and that a voice in his head told him that the officer had a flak jacket on and that if defendant shot the officer in the chest, he would not hurt the officer. The evidence did not support the instruction, and from the evidence, it would be irrational to conclude that defendant shot the officer with any intent other than to kill him. No jury could have rationally accepted the defense and have found defendant guilty of aggravated assault and not of attempted deliberate homicide. St. v. Sellner, 286 M 397, 951 P2d 996, 54 St.

Rep. 1464 (1997), followed in St. v. Howell, 1998 MT 20, 287 M 268, 954 P2d 1102, 55 St. Rep. 72 (1998).

Assault Lesser Included Offense of Deliberate Homicide — Error to Refuse Instruction on Lesser Included Offense: The defendant was convicted of deliberate homicide. At trial, the court refused the defendant's proposed jury instruction on the offense of assault. The Supreme Court determined that as a matter of law, under the express terms of 46-1-202, assault is an included offense of the crime of deliberate homicide. When there was some evidence supporting a defendant's theory that the defendant was guilty of assault but not murder, the District Court erred in refusing the proposed jury instruction on assault as a lesser included offense of deliberate homicide. St. v. Castle, 285 M 363, 948 P2d 688, 54 St. Rep. 1194 (1997). However, see St. v. Flores, 1998 MT 328, 292 M 255, 974 P2d 124, 55 St. Rep. 1329 (1998).

Deliberate Homicide Charged — Insufficient Evidence to Support Instruction on Negligent Homicide — No Purpose to Instruction on Definition of "Negligently": Goulet, Nelson, and Running Crane became intoxicated after drinking at several bars, and Goulet, after pushing Running Crane away when he tried to borrow a cigarette, stabbed Running Crane in the stomach, then in the chest, and finally in the back. During trial on charges of deliberate homicide, Goulet requested an instruction on negligent homicide, but the instruction was refused by the District Court. The Supreme Court held that the District Court did not err in refusing the requested instruction. The Supreme Court noted that a defendant is entitled to an instruction on a lesser included offense when the jury would be warranted in convicting on the lesser offense and acquitting on the greater offense. However, the Supreme Court noted that the only evidence that even approached evidence of negligence was that as he was stabbing Running Crane, Goulet was thinking that he hoped that he wasn't hurting Running Crane too badly. The Supreme Court called this evidence self-serving and insufficient to support the requested instruction. The Supreme Court also affirmed the District Court in its refusal to give an instruction on the definition of "negligently", saying that the District Court refused the instruction on the definition for the same reason that it refused the instruction on negligent homicide and that an instruction on the definition of a word standing alone, that is, not used in the instruction, would serve no purpose. St. v. Goulet, 283 M 38, 938 P2d 1330, 54 St. Rep. 482 (1997), followed in St. v. Fuqua, 2000 MT 273, 302 M 99, 13 P3d 34, 57 St. Rep. 1141 (2000).

Motion for New Trial Properly Denied — Attorney Assistance Not Ineffective: Swan argued that he was ineffectively represented because his attorney failed to request an instruction on a lesser included offense, neglected to ensure Swan's presence at an in camera hearing at which the trial court considered and answered a note from the jury inquiring whether an assault instruction applied to a felony aggravated assault charge as well as a felony assault (now assault with a weapon) charge, and allowed joinder of felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and felony aggravated assault charges. Finding that Swan failed to meet the first prong of the Strickland test, the Supreme Court held that Swan was effectively represented because counsel's performance was within the range of competence demanded of counsel in such cases and did not prejudice Swan in a manner that would have resulted in a different trial result. St. v. Swan, 279 M 483, 928 P2d 933, 53 St. Rep. 1246 (1996).

Assumption of Sexual Assault as Lesser Included Offense of Sexual Intercourse Without Consent — No Due Process Violation: Black was charged with sexual intercourse without consent. The court found insufficient evidence to convict on that charge but instead found him guilty of felony sexual assault. Black appealed on the grounds that he was convicted of an offense with which he was not charged, relying on St. v. Copenhaver, 85 M 342, 89 P 61 (1907). Neither Black nor the state raised the issue of whether sexual assault was a lesser included offense of sexual intercourse without consent, either at trial or directly on appeal. Although the issue was not properly before the Supreme Court on appeal and the court specifically declined to address it, the court nevertheless assumed for purposes of this opinion that sexual assault is a lesser included offense of sexual intercourse without consent. The court distinguished Copenhaver, in which defendant was convicted of a separate, independent offense that was not a lesser included offense. In this case, pursuant to the court's assumption and subsection(1) of this section, the court found that the charging document provided a sufficient basis for Black's conviction of sexual assault. Black's arguments that he was convicted of a crime with which he was not charged, that the charging document did not provide notice of the crime of which he was convicted, and that his due process rights were violated were thus rendered ineffective. St. v. Black, 270 M 329, 891 P2d 1162, 52 St. Rep. 215 (1995).

Endangering Welfare of Child Not Lesser Included Offense of Deviate Sexual Conduct: As evidenced by the plain language of 45-5-505 (amended and renumbered 45-8-218), the offense of deviate sexual conduct requires proof that the persons were of the same sex, while endangering the welfare of a child, 45-5-622, plainly requires proof of the ages of the offender and the victim. Each crime requires proof of additional facts that the other does not. Therefore, applying the test in Blockburger v. U.S., 284 US 299, 76 L Ed 306, 52 S Ct 180 (1932), the crime of endangering the welfare of a child is not a lesser included offense of deviate sexual conduct. St. v. Steffes, 269 M 214, 887 P2d 1196, 51 St. Rep. 1463 (1994).

Included Offense Based Upon Less Risk, Injury, or Culpability — Negligent Endangerment Not Lesser Included Offense of Aggravated Assault: Fisch was convicted of aggravated assault after the District Court refused to accept a jury instruction on negligent endangerment, which Fisch argued was a lesser included offense of aggravated assault. Citing St. v. Sheppard, 253 M 118, 832 P2d 370 (1992), the Supreme Court held that a person is entitled to an instruction on a lesser included offense only if, based upon the evidence, the jury could rationally find the person guilty of the lesser offense and if that entitlement is based upon one offense being, in law, an included offense of the other. Because the definition of “included offense” is written in the disjunctive with the qualifier “only”, a lesser included offense may differ in one and only one way from that of the offense charged. Fisch’s argument fails because at least two of the variations in degree exist between the offense charged and negligent endangerment. Moreover, Fisch’s “less serious risk”, “less serious injury”, and “lesser kind of culpability” arguments under 46-1-202(8)(c) also fail. As a result, the Supreme Court held that no amount of evidence as to negligent endangerment would entitle Fisch to the instruction he sought. St. v. Fisch, 266 M 520, 881 P2d 626, 51 St. Rep. 907 (1994), followed in St. v. Greywater, 282 M 28, 939 P2d 975, 54 St. Rep. 16 (1997), and St. v. Martinez, 1998 MT 265, 291 M 306, 968 P2d 705, 55 St. Rep. 1093 (1998).

Included Offense Based Upon Similar Proof — Failure to Raise in District Court: Fisch was convicted of aggravated assault after the District Court refused to accept a jury instruction on negligent endangerment, which Fisch argued was a lesser included offense of aggravated assault. Citing St. v. Henderson, 265 M 454, 877 P2d 1013, 51 St. Rep. 606 (1994), the Supreme Court noted that Fisch’s argument for a lesser included offense based upon 46-1-202(8)(a) was not raised in the District Court and that Fisch could not change his theory on appeal from that argued in the District Court. St. v. Fisch, 266 M 520, 881 P2d 626, 51 St. Rep. 907 (1994).

GENERAL

Prosecutor’s Inaccurate Description of DNA Evidence — Curative Jury Instruction — No Error Requiring New Trial: Defendant contended that a new trial was warranted because the prosecutor inaccurately stated that the victim’s and defendant’s DNA were found together at the scene of an alleged sexual assault. The trial court agreed that the evidence was mischaracterized and gave a curative instruction that the jury was to disregard any statement that mixed DNA was found and denied defendant’s motion for a new trial. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed on this point. Given the curative instruction, defendant did not demonstrate that the trial court acted arbitrarily without conscientious judgment or exceeded the bounds of reason in denying the new trial motion. St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007).

Trial Court’s Sua Sponte Objection to Testimony Not Violative of Court’s Duty to Ensure Fairness of Trial: Price was charged with assault with a weapon, and his defense was based upon the assertion that his roommate committed the crime. On the opening day of trial, both the prosecution and the defense elicited testimony regarding the roommate’s propensity for violence. At the beginning of the second day of trial, outside the presence of the jury, the trial judge objected sua sponte to the admission of the character testimony and heard arguments from both parties regarding the objection before ruling that the testimony was inadmissible. The judge then instructed the jury to disregard the testimony and limited testimony on the subject by a future witness. Following conviction, Price appealed on grounds that the judge’s actions constituted an abuse of discretion that impaired Price's defense and entitled Price to a new trial. The Supreme Court noted that although a trial judge should avoid officious interference in proceedings and remain impartial, the judge is not a mere figurehead or umpire at a trial who must remain silent and passive throughout a jury trial, speaking only to rule on motions and objections. Rather, the judge's duty is to ensure fairness, avoid waste of time, keep from the jury extraneous, potentially confusing matters, and facilitate the ascertainment of truth, which does not preclude a judge from excluding inadmissible evidence on the judge's own motion if the judge believes exclusion is in the interests of justice. Here, the judge did not cross the line between arbiter and advocate. The judge's objection pertained to testimony elicited by both parties and thus was not partial to the prosecution. The purpose of the objection was to prevent the jury from being misled by extraneous matters or basing the verdict on incompetence evidence, and the judge's action was in the nature of regulating the proceedings to ensure a fair trial. In addition, limiting the testimony by a future witness to the extent that the state opened the door regarding the roommate's character was not an abuse of discretion because the ruling was proportional to that testimony. St. v. Price, 2006 MT 79, 331 M 502, 134 P3d 45 (2006).

Prosecutor's Comments Improper — References to Unrelated Cases, Attempting to Define Reasonable Doubt, and Personal Opinions Regarding Guilt and Appropriateness of Sentence: In closing arguments in a case in which defendant was charged with attempting to fraudulently obtain dangerous drugs by altering a prescription, the prosecutor attempted to define reasonable doubt by referring to a rape case that he tried several years earlier and by citing the need for a new county jail as evidence that the state proved reasonable doubt every day. The comments were not only irrelevant but also misrepresented the state's burden of proof. Arguments attempting to define reasonable doubt will cause reversible error. The prosecutor also told the jury that defendant's denials were so commonplace that prosecutors had named it the "some dude" defense, as in "Blame it on somebody, some dude, some dude sitting out there". The "some dude" remarks were essentially the prosecutor's personal opinion on the strength of the state's case, referred to matters outside the record and to the prosecutor's own experience, and were similar to a prosecutor commenting on the believability of a witness. Closing arguments that reflect the prosecutor's personal opinions as to guilt are improper. Lastly, the prosecutor assured the jury that even if it found defendant guilty, the judge had the authority to order treatment rather than jail time. The comments were meant to reassure the jury that a guilty verdict would not hurt defendant, but would actually be a benefit in the long run. However, sentencing is solely the duty of the trial court, and in a noncapital case, the verdict should not be influenced in any way by sentencing considerations. It is impermissible for a jury to give weight to possible punishment when reaching a verdict. Although the case was remanded on other grounds, the Supreme Court admonished the prosecution not to make such comments on retrial. St. v. Stewart, 2000 MT 379, 303 M 507, 16 P3d 391, 57 St. Rep. 1615 (2000).

Prosecutor's Assertion of Personal Opinion — Motion for Mistrial Denied: Defendant moved for mistrial, asserting that the state's attorney's closing arguments constituted improper prosecutorial comment and misconduct. During closing, the state had argued that its office was too busy to prosecute innocent persons, stating: "We don't have time to do that, ladies and gentlemen. We do have 1,450 cases a year in the county attorney's office. We don't have time to spend chasing people that we believe are innocent or [have time] to frame people." The Supreme Court affirmed its disapproval of an attorney's assertion of a personal opinion and cautioned the state to refrain from such a tactic. However, since defendant had no evidence that these statements resulted in undue prejudice, the motion for mistrial was properly denied. St. v. Statczar, 228 M 446, 743 P2d 606, 44 St. Rep. 1668 (1987), followed in St. v. Gladue, 1999 MT 1, 293 M 1, 972 P2d 827, 56 St. Rep. 1 (1999). See also St. v. Maier, 1999 MT 51, 293 M 403, 977 P2d 298, 56 St. Rep. 208 (1999).

Statement That Armed Officer Is Guarding Defendant: Defendant contended that the prosecutor's statement before the jury that an armed deputy was "in charge and keeping the defendant" warranted a new trial. During cross-examination, defense counsel drew the jury's attention to the fact that the officer guarding the defendant was armed in order to demonstrate that the witness had limited powers of observation. A short time later, the prosecutor made the statement which defendant complained prejudiced him before the jury and which he claimed should have been the subject of a cautionary instruction. The court found that defense counsel obviously had drawn the jury's attention to the armed officer, and that if defendant thought a cautionary instruction was necessary he should have offered one. The defendant failed to show any error affecting his substantial rights or resulting in prejudice. St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986).

Testimony of Expert Witness — Testimony Stricken and Cautionary Instruction Given — No Abuse of Discretion in Refusing to Grant Mistrial: The state added an expert witness to the witness list just prior to trial. His testimony was later stricken from the record because a similar expert could not be procured for the defense. It was not an abuse of discretion by the District Court to refuse to grant defendant a mistrial based upon his testimony. The District Court was in the best position to determine if the testimony adversely affected the proceedings and properly found no prejudice once the testimony was stricken and a cautionary instruction given. St. v. Smith, 220 M 364, 715 P2d 1301, 43 St. Rep. 449 (1986).

Prisoner Handcuffed in Jury Presence:

If there were no showing of prejudice to the defendant resulting from a momentary viewing of him in handcuffs by the jury outside the courtroom, he was not denied a fair trial and hence is not entitled to a mistrial. St. v. Schatz, 194 M 59, 634 P2d 1193, 38 St. Rep. 1687 (1981).

In the absence of an indication of prejudicial consequences, the momentary and inadvertent observation of the defendant in handcuffs by the jury members does not warrant the granting of a new trial. St. v. Baugh, 174 M 456, 571 P2d 779 (1977).

Suppression of Evidence — Motion for New Trial: In a prosecution for attempted deliberate homicide, the defendant moved for a new trial, alleging that his counsel did not hear testimony offered by a state witness concerning an exculpatory item not admitted into evidence, claiming the prosecution had suppressed the evidence. The State did not take possession of the evidence during the trial or consider it evidence, and the defendant did not seek a continuance even when he gained knowledge of the evidence. There is no suppression of evidence if the defendant has knowledge of the facts and circumstances of the evidence. The court, therefore, did not err in denying the motion for a new trial. St. v. Kirkland, 184 M 229, 602 P2d 586 (1979), followed in Harris v. St., 234 M 482, 765 P2d 706, 45 St. Rep. 2067 (1988), and in St. v. Henry, 241 M 524, 788 P2d 316, 47 St. Rep. 476 (1990).

Prosecutorial Misconduct: It is not the duty of the prosecuting attorney to make independent determinations concerning the admissibility of evidence once the court rules such evidence is inadmissible. Willful attempts by the prosecutor in this case to place excluded evidence before the jury resulted in a reversal of the conviction because of its prejudicial effect. St. v. Bain, 176 M 23, 575 P2d 919 (1978).

Defendant's Admission Not Prejudicial: The trial judge was correct in refusing to grant the defendant's motion for a mistrial because the admission made by the defendant to the arresting officer on another charge in another state and introduced in the instant case was not prejudicial or a denial of the right to a fair trial. St. v. LaVe, 174 M 401, 571 P2d 97 (1977).

Erroneous Admission of Collateral Evidence: It was reversible error for the court to admit collateral, irrelevant, and prejudicial evidence as the underlying reason for a debt, payment of which was coerced by the defendant's intimidating acts. St. v. Williams, 174 M 288, 570 P2d 578 (1977).

Quotient Verdict: A quotient verdict is not a lot verdict. St. v. Moorman, 133 M 148, 321 P2d 236 (1958).

Perfecting Appeal While New Trial Motion Pending: The act of the defendant in a criminal prosecution in perfecting an appeal from the judgment of conviction while his motion for a new trial was pending did not deprive the trial court of jurisdiction thereafter to pass upon the motion, nor the Supreme Court of jurisdiction to consider the subsequent appeal from the order denying the new trial. St. v. Harkins, 85 M 585, 281 P 551 (1929).

Failure to Object to Instructions — Verdict Reviewable: The failure of the defendant to object to instructions under former law on first degree murder did not deprive him of the right to ask for a new trial on the ground that the evidence did not justify a verdict of murder in that degree. St. v. Gunn, 85 M 553, 281 P 757 (1929).

Different Judge: The District Court has authority to grant a motion for a new trial upon the ground that the verdict is contrary to the evidence without reference to the fact that the judge who presides at the hearing of the motion may not be the one who presided at the trial. St. v. Schoenborn, 55 M 517, 178 P 294 (1919).

INSUFFICIENT EVIDENCE

Verdict Contrary to Law and Evidence: A motion for a new trial in a criminal case upon the ground that the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence presents for the court's determination the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict. St. v. Hughes, 76 M 421, 246 P 956 (1926).

Insufficient Evidence — Showing Required: A defendant is not required to show an entire absence of evidence of some fact necessary to make out a case in order to secure a new trial. If he can convince the District Court that the evidence in its entirety is insufficient in weight to justify the verdict, he is entitled to a new trial. St. v. Schoenborn, 55 M 517, 178 P 294 (1919).

JURY MISCONDUCT

Sleeping Jurors Not Observed by District Court — Motion for New Trial Properly Dismissed Without Hearing: After a jury found him guilty of 10 sexual crimes, the defendant moved for a new trial on multiple grounds, including an allegation that several jurors may have been asleep during portions of the trial testimony. The District Court received briefs and denied the motion without conducting a hearing. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed and determined that the defendant's allegations were inconsistent with the District Court's own personal observations. Moreover, it was not an abuse of discretion for the District Court to deny the motion for a new trial based on the briefing of the parties without conducting a hearing. St. v. Geren, 2012 MT 307, 367 Mont. 437, 291 P.3d 1144.

New Trial — General Rule Prohibiting Admission of Juror Testimony — Exception for Extraneous Prejudicial Information: Following Lawlor's conviction for felony DUI, Lawlor moved for a new trial, alleging that during deliberations a juror improperly offered to other jurors an opinion relating to Lawlor's prior DUI convictions, references to which had been precluded by a motion in limine. The District Court denied the new trial motion, and Lawlor appealed. Rule 606, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), generally forbids the admission of juror testimony for purposes of ordering a new trial, but one exception hinges on whether extraneous prejudicial information was improperly brought to the jury's attention. Examples of impermissible extraneous information and external influence include: (1) telephoning a relative with regard to previous litigation by the plaintiff; (2) visiting the scene of an accident; (3) conducting experiments and informing the jury of the findings; (4) receiving evidence outside of court; (5) bringing a newspaper article into the jury room and showing it to the jury; (6) the jury's use of demonstrative evidence and experimentation with evidence; (7) pressure from other jurors; and (8) knowledge and information shared from one juror to another. In this case, comments by the juror in question derived from that juror's general knowledge of the criminal justice system when the juror mentioned that felony DUI cases are tried in District Court. The comment was internal and not an external influence subject to the exception in Rule 606, M.R.Ev., so the District Court properly denied Lawlor's motion for a new trial based on the juror affidavit. St. v. Lawlor, 2002 MT 235, 311 M 493, 56 P3d 863 (2002). See also St. v. Kelman, 276 M 253, 915 P2d 854 (1996), and St. v. Cooksey, 2012 MT 226, 366 Mont. 346, 286 P.3d 1174.

Jurors' Notes to Court During Deliberations Not Grounds for Mistrial: During deliberations, the jury sent several notes and questions to the court regarding one of the jurors, who was felt to be obstructing deliberations. Defendant's motion for mistrial based on breakdown in the deliberative process was denied. Following conviction, the juror in question prepared an affidavit alleging that he was unaware of the notes and would not have voted for a guilty verdict had he known about them. The District Court struck the affidavit, finding no juror misconduct, in effect denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The Supreme Court held that the notes constituted an entirely internal process and did not introduce an extraneous or outside element into deliberations, signal a breakdown in deliberations, or have any bearing on defendant's guilt or innocence. Even assuming that the notes had somehow affected the juror's vote, introduction of such testimony is prohibited under Rule 606(b), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), and the affidavit was properly stricken. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000).

Juror Affidavit Alleging Compulsion, Belief in Innocence, and Improper Belief in Effect of Hung Jury: A new trial was not required when defendant offered an affidavit in which a juror stated: (1) her belief that defendant was innocent; (2) that the verdicts were the result of pressure against her and other jurors to end deliberation; and (3) her belief that if a new trial was ordered defendant would be convicted anyway. St. v. Anderson, 211 M 272, 686 P2d 193, 41 St. Rep. 1357 (1984).

Interrogation of Jurors as Basis for Mistrial — Motion Properly Denied: In a prosecution for attempted deliberate homicide in which the jury was exposed to publicity about the defendant, the court denied the defendant's motion on the fourth day of trial to interrogate the jurors on the effects of the publicity. In this state, the court is under no mandatory duty to question jurors on prejudicial effects of publicity. Rather, such a matter is within the discretion of the court, and each case must be decided on a case-by-case basis. As there were cautionary instructions given to the jury and the defendant produced no evidence of prejudice, the court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's motion. St. v. Kirkland, 184 M 229, 602 P2d 586 (1979), followed in St. v. Cunningham, 2018 MT 56, 390 Mont. 408, 414 P.3d 289.

Use of Jurors' Affidavits: Although jurors' affidavits were admissible to show the existence of juror misconduct, they were not admissible to show the jurors were not actually influenced by the unauthorized evidence. St. v. Davison, 173 M 510, 568 P2d 159 (1977).

Confession of Error by Attorney General — Juror Bias: The court set aside a conviction of first degree burglary and remanded the case for a new trial for error committed by the trial court, confessed by the Attorney General and shown by the record, in refusing the defendant's motion for retrial based on the ground that a juror was biased and prejudiced. St. v. Summers, 107 M 34, 79 P2d 560 (1938).

Jurors Impeaching Own Verdict: The fact that jurors may impeach their own verdict when it has been decided by lot excludes all other exceptions to the general rule that jurors will not be heard to impeach their own verdict. St. v. Lewis, 52 M 495, 159 P 415 (1916); St. v. Wakely, 43 M 427, 117 P 95 (1911); Sutton v. Lowry, 39 M 462, 104 P 545 (1909); St. v. O'Brien, 35 M 482, 90 P 514 (1907); St. v. Beesskove, 34 M 41, 85 P 376 (1906).

Jury's Misunderstanding of Instructions: The affidavits of two jurors, filed in aid of a motion for a new trial by the defendant in a prosecution for murder, in which both stated that they had misunderstood the instructions of the court, which clearly charged the jury that it could find the accused guilty of any grade of unlawful homicide or acquit him, in that from a reading of the instructions the two jurors were under the impression that the jury was required to either find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree or acquit him, and that being unwilling to acquit they voted for murder in the first degree rather than declare him innocent, did not show such misconduct on the part of the jury as to entitle the defendant to a new trial. St. v. Beesskove, 34 M 41, 85 P 376 (1906).

Bias Concealed by Juror: Under a former statute providing for a new trial when the verdict has been decided by lot or by any means other than a fair expression of opinion on the part of all the jurors, the fact that a juror, when sworn, was biased and prejudiced against the defendant, which fact he concealed upon his voir dire examination and which neither the defendant nor his counsel discovered until after the verdict, was ground for a new trial. St. v. Mott, 29 M 292, 74 P 728 (1903).

Incompetent Juror — Showing Necessary: While it is imperative that the accused shall have a trial by an impartial jury, after the verdict error will not be presumed and it is incumbent on the accused to make it appear affirmatively that he is entitled to a new trial by reason of having been deprived of this constitutional right. Mere possibility or even probability that one of the jurors was incompetent is not sufficient to overthrow the verdict. St. v. Mott, 29 M 292, 74 P 728 (1903).

Consent to Taking Exhibits to Jury Room: Exhibits introduced in evidence in a prosecution for murder which are sent to the jury during its retirement will not be considered as having been received out of court when it is found on a motion for a new trial that counsel for the defendant consented to their being taken to the jury room during the jury's retirement. St. v. Allen, 23 M 118, 57 P 725 (1899).

Newspapers Received by Jury out of Court:

Under a former statute providing that a new trial shall be granted "when the jury has received any evidence, papers, or documents, not authorized by the court", the word "papers" referred to such written instruments as might be competent testimony when inspected by the court and found to be competent under the Rules of Evidence and did not include newspapers; and the reception by the jury of newspapers containing comments on the case did not in itself vitiate the verdict. St. v. Jackson, 9 M 508, 24 P 213 (1890).

Under a former statute providing that a new trial shall be granted "when the jury has been separated without leave of court, or been guilty of any misconduct, tending to prevent a fair and due consideration of the case", the reception by the jury of newspapers containing comments on the trial adverse to the defendant is misconduct tending to show injury to the defendant. St. v. Jackson, 9 M 508, 24 P 213 (1890). See also St. v. Pepo, 23 M 473, 59 P 721 (1900).

NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE

Evidence Not Newly Discovered — Postconviction Petition Time-Barred: The defendant filed a petition for postconviction relief 3 years after the 1-year deadline for filing had expired. He contended that he had newly discovered evidence that warranted an exception to the deadline. After the District Court denied his petition, he appealed to the Supreme Court, which concluded that evidence that the District Court had told him he would not be required to register as a violent offender did not constitute newly discovered evidence. The Supreme Court agreed that his petition was therefore time-barred. Mascarena v. St., 2019 MT 78, 395 Mont. 245, 438 P.3d 323.

Petition for Postconviction Relief Based on Newly Discovered Evidence — Cases Relying on Fifth Factor in Clark Overruled: Years after being convicted of sexual assault, the petitioner filed a petition for postconviction relief after his alleged victim recanted. Later, however, the alleged victim said he was coerced into recanting. The District Court denied the petitioner's request for a new trial and based its decision on the concurring opinion in St. v. Beach, 2013 MT 130, 370 Mont. 163, 302 P.3d 47, which requires a petitioner to affirmatively and unquestionably establish his innocence. On appeal, the petitioner argued that the District Court should have instead applied the five factors in St. v. Clark, 2005 MT 330, 330 Mont. 8, 125 P.3d 1099. The Supreme Court disagreed, and overruled cases where it had applied the fifth factor in Clark to a petition for postconviction relief. However, the Supreme Court also reversed the District Court, holding that the District Court had erred in applying the test in the Beach concurrence. The Supreme Court ruled that the test in 46-21-102 applies to a petition for postconviction relief that is based upon newly discovered evidence, as well as the first four factors in Clark, and remanded the matter to the District Court for further proceedings. Marble v. St., 2015 MT 242, 380 Mont. 366, 355 P.3d 742.

Postconviction Letter From Lead Detective Not Considered Newly Discovered Evidence Warranting New Trial: Following DuBray's conviction for robbery, theft, and deliberate homicide, DuBray received a letter from the lead detective in the case indicating that the detective thought that there was more to the case and wanted to hear DuBray's story. DuBray contended that the letter indicated that the detective wanted the real story because he only got part of it right, which impeached the detective's trial testimony, constituting new evidence that entitled DuBray to a new trial. The Supreme Court applied the test in St. v. Clark, 2005 MT 330, 330 M 8, 125 P.3d 1099 (2005), to determine whether the letter constituted newly discovered evidence. Given that DuBray's trial counsel conducted a lengthy attack on the detective's objectivity at trial and advanced a theory that DuBray was charged based on rumor and innuendo, the letter would have been merely cumulative. Additionally, nothing in the letter indicated that a new trial in which the letter was admitted would have a reasonable probability of resulting in a different outcome. Thus, the letter failed to satisfy the Clark test, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying DuBray's motion for a new trial based on new evidence. DuBray v. St., 2008 MT 121, 342 M 520, 182 P.3d 753 (2008).

Alleged New Evidence Not Extending Statutory Time Bar for Postconviction Relief: Raugust contended that the period for filing for postconviction relief should be extended based on newly discovered evidence that the state mishandled a weapon found at the crime scene and that a key eyewitness confessed to the offense while waiting in the County Attorney's office to testify in Raugust's trial and because of ineffective assistance of counsel at trial. The Supreme Court disagreed. Raugust could not establish that the evidence regarding the weapon was so material that it would probably produce a different result at trial or that the evidence could not have been discovered in a timely manner. Evidence regarding the eyewitness directly conflicted with other evidence given at trial that tended to preclude the possibility that the eyewitness could have committed the crime, nor could Raugust show that the evidence could not have been discovered in a timely manner. The claims of ineffective counsel were not newly discovered evidence because Raugust was aware of the asserted deficiencies at trial. Raugust v. St., 2003 MT 367, 319 M 97, 82 P.3d 890 (2003), following St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P.2d 1052 (1959).

Abe was found guilty of accountability for deliberate homicide and was sentenced to 60 years in prison. One year and 14 days after the deadline, Abe filed a petition for postconviction relief on grounds of newly discovered evidence. Allegedly, two jurors from Abe's trial sat in on the trial of Abe's coconspirator and heard two of the state's witnesses testify differently than they did in Abe's trial. The Supreme Court applied the factors to be considered when a District Court evaluates a motion for a new trial based on newly discovered evidence as set out in St. v. Sullivan, 285 M 235, 948 P.2d 215 (1997) (see also St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P.2d 1052 (1959)), including the requirement that the evidence must have come to the knowledge of the defendant since trial and the requirement that the evidence must not be such as will tend only to impeach the character or credit of a witness. Here, Abe's counsel knew about the alleged discrepancies after Abe's trial but prior to Abe's appeal, so the discrepancies in testimony could have been raised on direct appeal. Further, the petition for postconviction relief alleged that the discrepancies undermined the credibility of the witnesses but did not establish that Abe did not engage in the criminal conduct for which he was convicted. Thus, the District Court concluded, and the Supreme Court agreed, that the alleged new evidence did not serve to extend the statutory bar for filing a petition for postconviction relief beyond the 1-year period in 46-21-102. Although Abe correctly pointed out that the state did not raise the issue of the statutory bar in District Court and that the District Court did not rule on the issue, the general rule that the Supreme Court will not address issues raised for the first time on appeal did not apply in this case because that rule does not apply when the issue is jurisdictional. The 1-year statute of limitations for postconviction relief is a jurisdictional limit, and lack of subject matter jurisdiction may be raised at any time under former Rule 12(h), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded). Dismissal of Abe's petition for postconviction relief was affirmed as procedurally barred. St. v. Abe, 2001 MT 260, 307 M 233, 37 P3d 77 (2001). See also Mascarena v. St., 2019 MT 78, 395 Mont. 245, 438 P.3d 323.

Evidence of Victim's Failure to Repair Car Not Grounds for New Trial Because Evidence Not Relevant to Amount of Pecuniary Loss Suffered by Victim: Allen argued that the trial court erred in not granting him a new trial in his felony mischief case, based on newly discovered evidence that his sister had not had her car repaired after he shot bullet holes in it. The Supreme Court stated that a new trial based on newly discovered evidence could be granted only if the evidence is so material that it would probably produce a different result upon a new trial. The Supreme Court ruled that in the case before it, evidence of failure to make repairs did not affect the amount of pecuniary loss suffered by the victim and therefore Allen's conviction for felony mischief was proper and he was not entitled to a new trial. St. v. Allen, 2001 MT 17, 304 M 129, 18 P3d 1006 (2001).

Alleged Failure by State to Disclose Medical Report Until After Trial — Inability to Assess Prejudice Absent Record: Defendant contended that he was entitled to a new trial based on the alleged failure of the state to disclose a medical report until after trial, but defendant did not provide a copy of the report or a detailed account of the report in the motion for a new trial. Lacking sufficient information upon which to assess claims of prejudice and ineffective assistance of counsel, the District Court properly denied the motion for new trial. St. v. Ahto, 1998 MT 200, 290 M 338, 965 P2d 240, 55 St. Rep. 851 (1998).

New Evidence of One Witness's Schizophrenia and Another's Night Blindness: New evidence of one witness's schizophrenia and of another's night blindness served only to impeach their credibility. Neither piece of evidence, a 1969 letter mentioning schizophrenia and undocumented and unsupported information as to night blindness, was so probative as to make a material difference in a jury's assessment of the credibility of the witnesses. Thus, the evidence was not so material that it would probably produce a different result upon a new trial. In addition, the night blindness evidence could have been discovered before trial. Therefore, it was not error to refuse a new trial because of the evidence. St. v. Lawrence, 284 M 140, 948 P2d 186, 54 St. Rep. 1082 (1997). See also companion case, St. v. Jenkins, 285 M 131, 948 P2d 204, 54 St. Rep. 1078 (1997).

New Evidence Tending to Be Exculpatory — Greeno Test Met — New Trial Warranted: The District Court examined newly discovered evidence, found that three elements of the test set out in St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959), were not met, and denied a motion for a new trial. The Supreme Court disagreed, finding that the new evidence, discovered well after trial due to no lack of due diligence on defendant's part, was more than cumulative, tended to exculpate defendant, and spoke to facts that were not evident at trial. The new evidence, including a purported confession and other evidence pointing to a different person as the criminal, was distinct from any evidence presented at trial and was so material that it would probably, albeit not necessarily, produce a different result at another trial. Because all the Greeno criteria were met, it was an abuse of discretion for the District Court to deny a motion for a new trial and remand was warranted. St. v. Cline, 275 M 46, 909 P2d 1171, 53 St. Rep. 32 (1996), followed in St. v. Sullivan, 285 M 235, 948 P2d 215, 54 St. Rep. 1128 (1997).

Test Whether New Trial Warranted on Grounds of Newly Discovered Evidence: In determining whether a new trial was warranted based on newly discovered evidence, the District Court properly applied the test set out in St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959), that: (1) the evidence must have come to the knowledge of the applicant since the trial; (2) it is not through want of diligence that it was not discovered earlier; and (3) it is so material that it would probably produce a different result upon retrial. St. v. DeMers, 234 M 273, 762 P2d 866, 45 St. Rep. 1901 (1988), followed in St. v. Haskins, 255 M 202, 841 P2d 542, 49 St. Rep. 922 (1992). See also St. v. Sullivan, 285 M 235, 948 P2d 215, 54 St. Rep. 1128 (1997).

Confrontation of Witnesses — Motion Properly Denied: The District Court did not err in denying defendant's motion for new trial based on newly discovered evidence when the evidence, a tape recording of an Oregon attorney's interview with a prosecution witness, was not so material that it would have produced a different result, the evidence was cumulative as to other impeachment evidence, and there was other substantial evidence of defendant's guilt. Defendant was not entitled to a new trial on the basis that he was denied full confrontation and impeachment of witnesses when the District Court did not abuse its discretion in limiting extensive cross-examination on pending charges against a witness. St. v. Short, 217 M 62, 702 P2d 979, 42 St. Rep. 1026 (1985), followed in St. v. Flores, 1998 MT 328, 292 M 255, 974 P2d 124, 55 St. Rep. 1329 (1998).

Character Witness: The defendant's motion for a new trial based on newly discovered evidence was properly denied because the defendant's newly discovered evidence, a witness who knew of the defendant's good conduct and character, would only go to discredit a prosecution witness's testimony and would not make the difference between the defendant's being or not being convicted in a new trial. St. v. Coleman, 177 M 1, 579 P2d 732 (1978).

Alibi Witnesses: When the defendant moved for a new trial based on newly discovered evidence supported by affidavits of purported alibi witnesses and an investigator who knew of and tried to locate one alibi witness before the trial, the court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion in light of St. v. Gallagher, 162 M 155, 509 P2d 852 (1973), which sets forth requirements for this motion. St. v. Briner, 173 M 185, 567 P2d 35 (1977).

Statements of Witnesses: The trial court did not err in denying the defendant's motion for a new trial based on newly discovered evidence in the form of statements taken from two witnesses subsequent to the trial. St. v. Quigg, 155 M 119, 467 P2d 692 (1970), distinguished in St. v. Nanoff, 160 M 344, 502 P2d 1138 (1972).

Perjury of State's Witness:

When the key witness at the trial in which the defendant was convicted of larceny made statements after the trial demonstrating that the testimony he gave was false and perjurious and, at the hearing on the defendant's motion for a new trial, the witness refused to give any testimony, the requirements for the granting of a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence were met, and the defendant should have been granted a new trial. St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959).

When newly discovered evidence may demonstrate perjury in the state's witness upon whose evidence the verdict of guilty was founded and, but for which, conviction could not have been had, and may probably produce a different result, a new trial should be granted on that ground. St. v. Hamilton, 87 M 353, 287 P 933 (1930).

Motion After Appeal Perfected: When the defendant had perfected an appeal to the Supreme Court and then discovered new evidence, the Supreme Court had no jurisdiction to grant a new trial. However, upon the defendant's prima facie showing of matters sufficient to warrant consideration, the court would instruct the District Court to entertain the defendant's motion for a new trial and would stay further proceedings pending such motion. St. v. Nicks, 131 M 567, 312 P2d 519 (1957).

Showing of Diligence Required: Motions for new trials on the ground of newly discovered evidence in criminal cases are not favored, and regardless of the facts set up in affidavits filed in support thereof, the defendant is not entitled to a retrial unless it is shown that he could not with reasonable diligence have discovered and produced the new evidence at the trial. St. v. Hamilton, 87 M 353, 287 P 933 (1930).

Cumulative Evidence:

Applications for new trials on the ground of newly discovered evidence are not favored by the courts and will not be granted when the new evidence is merely cumulative. St. v. Broell, 87 M 284, 286 P 1108 (1930).

Alleged newly discovered evidence that is cumulative only does not warrant the granting of a new trial, nor may the court be put in error for refusing a retrial on that ground when the movant made no attempt to show due diligence on his part to produce the newly discovered witness at the trial. St. v. Gies, 77 M 62, 249 P 573 (1926).

Lack of Due Diligence: When the defendant and his counsel accepted the statement of the County Attorney that a witness, then in the county jail, whose name was endorsed on the information had refused to testify, without verifying the prosecutor's statement by an interview with the witness, whereas after the trial they ascertained that if he had been called he would have testified that he and another committed the offense for which the defendant was convicted, they were lacking in due diligence in discovering and producing the alleged newly discovered evidence. St. v. Broell, 87 M 284, 286 P 1108 (1930).

Judgment Unsupported by Evidence: When no evidence of the fitness or unfitness of the parents of an accused delinquent minor to control or take care of him was heard by the court, a judgment that they were not unfit was unsupported by the evidence and refusal of a new trial on the ground of new evidence was error. State ex rel. Palagi v. Freeman, 81 M 132, 262 P 168 (1927).

Mistake of Prosecution Witness: When the owner of an animal that the defendant was charged with stealing testified that it was his property at the time it was taken and remained so until after the defendant's arrest when it was paid for by the latter, and such owner was fully cross-examined as to the transaction, a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence based upon the witness's affidavit to the effect that he was mistaken in so testifying was properly refused. St. v. Hughes, 78 M 87, 252 P 320 (1926).

Consideration of Motion: Though a motion for a new trial in a criminal case on the ground of newly discovered evidence is not generally viewed with favor by the courts, it was authorized by the former statutes and, when the prescribed conditions were met, entitled to the same consideration as a motion upon any other statutory ground; and while a broad discretion is lodged in the trial court in disposing of it, an order denying it is subject to review. St. v. Gangner, 73 M 187, 235 P 703 (1925).

Statements by Prosecuting Witness: An affidavit in support of a motion for a new trial following a conviction for attempted rape stating that the prosecuting witness, some 5 months before the trial, said to the affiant that, if the defendant didn't "fork over", she "would send him over the road for the rest of his life" was not "newly discovered evidence", that expression meaning evidence discovered since the trial. St. v. Prouty, 60 M 310, 199 P 281 (1921).

46-16-701. Effect of new trial.

Commission Comments

Commission Comment Not Divided: This section is a recodification of part of section 95-2101, R.C.M. 1947. Section 46-16-702 is also derived from section 95-2101. The commission comments to section 95-2101 are printed in their entirety under 46-16-701.

Source: R.C.M. 1947, sections 94-7601 and 94-7602; Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter] 38, [section] 116-1.

[Section 46-16-701] defines a new trial and states the effect of granting such a motion. It is basically the same as existing law.

[Section 46-16-702] does not specify the grounds which may be the basis for a motion for a new trial. The present Montana law follows a different format. [Section 46-16-702] encompasses the various grounds set forth in the existing Montana law plus it permits the granting of a motion for a new trial for any other reason the court may find to be in the interest of justice. At the same time it does not provide defense counsel with a list of reasons to be considered on making the motion for a new trial.

[Section 46-16-702(2)] provides, as does the existing law, that the motion be in writing. It requires also that the motion be made within thirty days following the entry of a finding or the return of a verdict. This is a slight change from the existing law which requires notice of certain motions to be made within thirty days after discovery of the facts upon which the moving party relied to support his motion and that in all other cases notice of motion be filed within ten days after rendition of the verdict. This particular limitation should be viewed in conjunction with the post-conviction remedies that are made available.

[Section 46-16-702] also provides that reasonable notice of the motion be given to the state.

[Section 46-16-702] provides that the motion for a new trial specify the grounds therefor. Some specific examples are: the trial of a felony charge in the absence of the defendant, jury misconduct, the court has erred in the decision of any question of law arising during trial, the verdict is contrary to law or evidence or new evidence is discovered. This section does not require the motion to be upon affidavits as do some subsections of R.C.M. 1947, section 94-7605 [now repealed].

[Section 46-16-702(3)] is not found specifically in the Revised Codes of Montana, 1947, or the codes of any other state which have been used for source material. However, it does not represent any great innovation in the law. It merely lists the alternative decisions available to the judge in deciding a motion for a new trial. He may either grant or deny the motion, or modify or change the verdict which is provided to a limited extent in the specific context of R.C.M. 1947, section 94-7603(6) [now repealed].

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: Deleted definition of new trial that read: "A "new trial" is a reexamination of the issue in the same court before another jury after a verdict or finding has been rendered".

Case Notes

Posttrial Recantation by Victim Witness — New Trial Properly Denied Based on Overwhelming Evidence of Guilt: The defendant was charged with violently assaulting his girlfriend. At trial, the girlfriend testified that the defendant had assaulted her. Her testimony was corroborated by another witness, who saw the victim shortly after the assault. After the trial, the victim contacted the prosecutor to recant her testimony, claiming that she had fallen off a cliff instead. The defendant filed a motion for a new trial based on the victim's recantation, which the District Court denied. Despite the recantation, the District Court concluded that the forensic evidence against the defendant, and exclusive of the victim's testimony, was overwhelming. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion for a new trial. St. v. Jones, 2020 MT 7, 398 Mont. 309, 459 P.3d 841.

Defendant's Testimony From First Trial Introduced in Second Trial — No Prejudice or Violation of Self-Incrimination: The defendant's conviction on sexual intercourse without consent charges was reversed in St. v. Franks, 2014 MT 273, 376 Mont. 431, 335 P.3d 725. The state retried the defendant in 2016. At the second trial, the defendant gave testimony that was contrary to testimony he had provided at his first trial. The defendant claimed that the admission of the evidence of his statement from the first trial violated his substantial rights because it was overly prejudicial and violated his right against self-incrimination; however, the Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed. St. v. Franks, 2017 MT 225, 388 Mont. 486, 402 P.3d 1190.

Trial Court's Improper Determination of Veracity of Recanted Testimony — Remand: In ruling on Crosby's motion for a new trial based on the recanted testimony of a witness, the District Court erroneously concluded that Crosby was entitled to a new trial only when the trial judge was satisfied that the recantation was untrue, which improperly placed the court in the role of factfinder. Instead, the court should have applied the test in St. v. Clark, 2005 MT 330, 330 M 8, 125 P3d 1099 (2005), to determine whether a new trial should be granted based on newly discovered evidence. The Supreme Court remanded for application of the Clark standard in determining whether Crosby was entitled to postconviction relief and a new trial. Crosby v. St., 2006 MT 155, 332 M 460, 139 P3d 832 (2006). In Marble v. St., 2015 MT 242, 380 Mont. 366, 355 P.3d 742, the Supreme Court overruled Crosby to the extent it applied the fifth factor in the Clark test to a petition for postconviction relief that is based upon newly discovered evidence.

Recantation of Sexual Assault Victim's Testimony — Remand for Consideration of New Trial — Perry Partially Overruled: Following Clark's conviction of sexual assault against his stepdaughter, she recanted her testimony and Clark moved for a new trial, citing St. v. Perry, 232 M 455, 758 P2d 268 (1988). The Supreme Court overruled Perry to the extent that it stands for the proposition that a trial judge is required to grant a new trial only when satisfied that the recantation of the witness is true. However, the Perry proposition that the weight to be given to recanted testimony is for the trial judge to determine was retained as authoritative precedent to be considered as part of the analysis set out in Berry v. St., 10 Ga. 511 (Ga. 1851), describing when it is proper to grant a new trial based on newly discovered evidence, as adopted in St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959). In applying the restated Berry test, a District Court is not to make factual determinations as to the veracity of the recantation, but should evaluate the recantation for materiality and its tendency to be cumulative or impeaching and should determine whether there is a reasonable probability that a new trial would produce a different outcome, keeping in mind the aspects of recantations that make them inherently suspect. If the Berry elements are met, a new trial is warranted; if not, the prior judgment stands. Here, the record was not clear as to the District Court's reasons for denying a new trial and whether the court correctly applied the law, so the case was remanded to allow the District Court to readdress Clark's motion for a new trial. St. v. Clark, 2005 MT 330, 330 M 8, 125 P3d 1099 (2005), followed in Crosby v. St., 2006 MT 155, 332 M 460, 139 P3d 832 (2006), St. v. Parrish, 2010 MT 212, 357 Mont. 477, 241 P.3d 1041, and St. v. Jones, 2020 MT 7, 398 Mont. 309, 459 P.3d 841.

On remand, the District Court found that evidence of the victim's recanted testimony was neither cumulative nor impeaching and that a new trial based on the testimony had no reasonable probability of resulting in a different outcome, so Clark's motion for a new trial was denied. Clark appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. In the first trial, the jury had already heard Clark's theory, which was essentially confirmed by the recanted testimony, but had rejected the theory and convicted Clark. Thus, there was no probability that a new trial based on the same theory would result in a different outcome, so a new trial was unwarranted. St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 391, 347 M 113, 197 P3d 977 (2008), following Crosby v. St., 2006 MT 155, 332 M 460, 139 P3d 832 (2006). In Marble v. St., 2015 MT 242, 380 Mont. 366, 355 P.3d 742, the Supreme Court held that it erred in applying the Clark factors to a petition for postconviction relief, in particular the fifth factor, and overruled three cases to the extent they applied that factor to a petition for postconviction relief.

Use of Testimony From Prior Trial in Retrial Not Precluded: Ingraham was convicted of negligent homicide, criminal endangerment, and criminal trespass to property in relation to an automobile accident. Admission of certain evidence was found to constitute reversible prejudicial error, and the case was remanded for a new trial. On remand, Ingraham moved to preclude the state from using his testimony from the first trial during its case in chief at the second trial, based on this section and his constitutional right not to be compelled to testify against himself. The District Court granted Ingraham's motion, based in part on Harrison v. U.S., 392 US 219 (1968), as interpreted in People v. Armentero, 384 NW 2d 98 (Mich. App. 1986), and the state appealed. The Supreme Court examined the legislative history of this section, noting that prior to amendment in 1967, the statute expressly required that testimony must be produced anew in a new trial—i.e., testimony from an earlier trial could not be used in a new trial of the same case. However, the 1967 amendment deleted that requirement. When the Legislature amends a statute, it is presumed that some change to existing law is intended; thus, the presumption is that since 1967, the use of testimony from a prior trial in a new trial is not precluded by statute. With regard to the alleged constitutional issue of self-incrimination, the Supreme Court noted that under Harrison and subsequent federal cases, in order to preclude the use of prior testimony in a subsequent trial, the testimony must have been compelled by the admission of evidence both illegally obtained and improperly admitted at trial, but when testimony is compelled as a result of evidence that was improperly admitted rather than unconstitutionally obtained, Harrison does not preclude use of the testimony in a later trial. The District Court abused its discretion in granting Ingraham's motion excluding his prior testimony. State ex rel. Mazurek v. District Court, 2000 MT 266, 302 M 39, 22 P3d 166, 57 St. Rep. 1111 (2000).

Prosecution Presenting New Evidence at Second Trial: The defendant argued that the prosecution's introduction of new evidence at the second trial constituted double jeopardy. The Supreme Court ruled that a mistrial placed the parties in the same position as if there had been no trial in the first instance and that therefore the introduction of new evidence was proper. St. v. Van Dyken, 242 M 415, 791 P2d 1350, 47 St. Rep. 835 (1990).

Admissibility in Second Trial of Testimony Given in First Trial: After having testified in his first trial, which ended in a mistrial, defendant declined to testify in his second trial. Defendant argued that his testimony given in the first trial was inadmissible in the second because this section places the parties in a new trial in the same position as if there had been no trial and that the first trial was therefore a nullity. The court found that under this section and 46-16-702 there must be a "finding" or a "verdict of guilty" in the first trial in order for these sections to apply, that since the first trial resulted in a hung jury and mistrial there was no "finding or verdict", and that therefore defendant did not fit under these sections. Admission of defendant's testimony from the first trial was not error. St. v. Hall, 234 M 57, 761 P2d 1283, 45 St. Rep. 1726 (1988).

Mention of Prior Trial: This section does not compel automatic reversal if anyone other than defendant or his witnesses mentions to the jury that there has been another trial. However, the judge and counsel for both sides should carefully guard the record to ensure that none of the parties loses or gains any rights because of the result of the previous trial. St. v. Musgrove, 202 M 59, 655 P2d 982, 39 St. Rep. 2327 (1982).

Justice's Court — Authority to Grant New Trial: A Justice's Court is not a "court" for the purposes of 46-16-701, and a Justice of the Peace may not dismiss charges against a defendant upon a motion for a new trial. Forsythe v. Wenholtz, 170 M 496, 554 P2d 1333 (1976).

Attacking Charge on New Trial: When a first conviction is set aside, the defendant is not precluded upon a remand for a new trial from attacking the indictment or information. St. v. Hale, 129 M 449, 291 P2d 229 (1955), overruled on another point in St. v. Bogue, 142 M 459, 384 P2d 749 (1963).

New Trial Not Double Jeopardy: When one convicted of crime is granted a new trial, he is not placed in new jeopardy by the second trial but is in the same jeopardy he was in when the first trial was had. St. v. Aus, 105 M 82, 69 P2d 584 (1937).

1999 Amendment: Chapter 301 in (1) inserted second sentence concerning ordering new trial without motion or after motion and hearing. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 301, L. 1999, provided: "WHEREAS, in State v. Brummer, 1998 MT 11, [287] Mont. [168], 953 P.2d 250, 55 St. Rep. 30 (1998), the Montana Supreme Court determined that section 46-16-702, MCA, created an ambiguity as to whether a court could order a new trial sua sponte."

1991 Amendment: In (2), after “guilty”, deleted “reasonable notice of the motion” and at end substituted “state” for “prosecution”; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Exculpatory Evidence Requested by Defendant — Discovered After Trial — Reasonable Diligence — New Trial Ordered: The defendant was charged with partner or family member assault. Prior to trial, the defendant requested discovery from the state, including photographs in the possession of any law enforcement official or other interested parties. The state never indicated the existence of any evidence sought to be held in the control of another agency and represented that the defendant had received full discovery. At trial, the defendant asserted a justifiable use of force defense, stating that he was struck in the face and subsequently suffered a black eye. The state claimed that there was no evidence to suggest the defendant was struck. The defendant was found guilty; however, he subsequently obtained photographs taken at the detention facility. The photographs, taken automatically by the web-based telephone system, showed a discoloration under the defendant’s eye. The defendant filed a motion to dismiss or for a new trial. The District Court denied the motion, stating that the state was unaware of the photographs and the defendant could have obtained them with reasonable diligence. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, holding that the defendant satisfied all five elements of St. v. Clark, 2005 MT 330, 330 Mont. 8, 125 P.3d 1099, including holding that the state should have been aware of the photographs that were in its exclusive control and the defendant’s discovery request constituted sufficient diligence. St. v. Chavis, 2019 MT 108, 395 Mont. 413, 440 P.3d 640.

Technical Violation of Alternate Juror Statute — Harmless Error — No Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: The District Court did not err in denying the defendant’s motion to set aside the jury verdict and grant the defendant a new trial, despite a technical violation of 46-16-118. Following a guilty verdict, the court may grant the defendant a new trial if required in the interest of justice without a motion or if justified by law and by the weight of the evidence deny, grant, or modify the verdict after motion and hearing. While the statutory jury selection procedures, including those regarding alternate jurors contained in 46-16-118 are designed to protect against violations of the defendant’s constitutional right to a fair and impartial jury, not every violation of the statutory process must result in reversal. Technical departures from the jury selection statutes and violations that do not threaten the goals of random selection and objective disqualification do not constitute a substantial failure to comply. Similar to St. v. Bearchild, 2004 MT 355, 324 Mont. 435, 103 P.3d 1006, the defendant did not challenge the composition of the jury or even its impartiality but rather, challenged a particular juror. Although the defendant was entitled to an impartial jury, he had no right to a particular juror. There was no material failure by the District Court to comply with Montana’s jury selection statutes and the technical error was harmless. Because the error was harmless, the District Court correctly concluded that the interests of justice did not require a new trial and, as such, the defendant was unable to establish his ineffective assistance of counsel claims. St. v. Oschmann, 2019 MT 33, 394 Mont. 237, 434 P.3d 280.

Petitioner for Postconviction Relief — Presumption of Guilt Following Conviction: Because a petitioner who has filed a petition for postconviction relief is presumed guilty following the entry of a judgment of conviction, the petitioner’s burden in seeking postconviction relief is greater than that imposed on a petitioner seeking a new trial under 46-16-702. Marble v. St., 2015 MT 242, 380 Mont. 366, 355 P.3d 742.

Defendant Not Required to Pursue Postconviction Proceeding — Immediate Remedy Available: After the defendant was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent, the victim made posttrial statements contradicting her trial testimony. The defendant requested a new trial as a result of the statements, but the District Court concluded the request was barred by this section because it was not filed within the 30-day time limit. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that under the circumstances the defendant should not have been required to forego an appeal in order to first pursue a petition for postconviction relief when the District Court could provide an immediate remedy. St. v. Morse, 2015 MT 51, 378 Mont. 249, 343 P.3d 1196.

Failure of Juror to Disclose Experience of Incest — No Grounds for New Trial: The defendant was convicted of incest. After the trial, the defendant’s attorney learned that one of the jurors had been a victim of incest. The District Court held a hearing on the issue and concluded the defendant was not entitled to a new trial because the juror had not been asked if she was an incest victim during voir dire, so her failure to disclose was not intentional concealment. The District Court also concluded that there was no evidence that the juror exhibited ill will or bias toward the defendant. On appeal, the defendant argued that the District Court should have granted his motion for a new trial because the juror’s past experience produced an inherent bias. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that the defendant failed to show any evidence beyond his own speculation that the juror had any bias or ill will toward him and that being a victim of a sex crime does not produce inherent bias any more than does having been a victim of burglary or physical assault. St. v. Ring, 2014 MT 49, 374 Mont. 109, 321 P.3d 800, following St. v. Woods, 221 Mont. 17, 716 P.2d 624 (1986), and St. v. Dunfee, 2005 MT 147, 327 Mont. 335, 114 P.3d 217.

“Channeling” Baby Victim by Prosecutor in Closing Argument — Not Plain Error: During closing arguments in the defendant’s trial on charges of aggravated assault on an 8-month-old, the prosecutor “channeled” the victim for several minutes, which included telling the jury that “I can’t tell my mom I love her”. Although the defendant did not object at trial, on appeal to the Supreme Court, the defendant argued that the closing remarks constituted prosecutorial misconduct and that she was therefore entitled to a new trial. However, the court concluded that because the remarks did not rise to the level of plain error, the defendant had waived her right to raise the matter on appeal by not objecting at trial. St. v. Ugalde, 2013 MT 308, 372 Mont. 234, 311 P.3d 772.

Possible Disclosure of Defense Information and Strategies by Medical Examiner to Prosecuting Attorney — New Trial Not Warranted: The defendant sought to have the charges against her dismissed, arguing that her client confidentiality, work product privileges, and due process rights were violated when the state medical examiner disclosed information to the prosecuting attorney that he had obtained through a confidential consultation with the defendant’s counsel. The District Court disagreed and the defendant was convicted of aggravated assault. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed and held that the defendant was not adversely affected because the medical examiner was never called to testify in front of the jury. The court also held that any work product disclosed would have consisted of facts known to all parties already and that the defendant did not explain how a due process violation existed when she could not impeach a witness who never testified. St. v. Ugalde, 2013 MT 308, 372 Mont. 234, 311 P.3d 772.

Testimony by 10 Doctors in Criminal Trial — Neither Cumulative Nor Prejudicial: Over objection by the defendant at her trial on charges for aggravated assault, the prosecution called 10 medical experts to testify that the victim had suffered serious bodily injury. The District Court concluded that the testimony of the witnesses was necessary for the state to meet its burden to prove serious bodily injury, one of the elements of the crime. After her conviction, the defendant appealed and argued she was entitled to a new trial because the amount of testimony was cumulative and prejudicial. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the District Court had not abused its discretion by allowing the witnesses to testify because they were necessary to fully explain to the jury the cause and extent of the victim’s injuries. St. v. Ugalde, 2013 MT 308, 372 Mont. 234, 311 P.3d 772.

No Error in Denial of Motion for New Trial: Before trial, the defendant sent a letter to the District Court stating that he was unhappy with his counsel over a potential witness. However, the judge held a meeting in which the defendant noted that he was satisfied with his counsel and was no longer raising the concern about the witness. The day after the trial, the defendant sent another letter to the judge requesting that the court grant him a new attorney in a separate matter. After new counsel was appointed, the defendant argued that this second letter should have been construed as a timely motion for a new trial. However, the Supreme Court found that the letter referenced the previous trial to justify only his request for a new attorney in the other matter, not a request for a new trial in the original matter. St. v. Hammer, 2013 MT 203, 371 Mont. 121, 305 P.3d 843.

Sleeping Jurors Not Observed by District Court — Motion for New Trial Properly Dismissed Without Hearing: After a jury found him guilty of 10 sexual crimes, the defendant moved for a new trial on multiple grounds, including an allegation that several jurors may have been asleep during portions of the trial testimony. The District Court received briefs and denied the motion without conducting a hearing. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed and determined that the defendant’s allegations were inconsistent with the District Court’s own personal observations. Moreover, it was not an abuse of discretion for the District Court to deny the motion for a new trial based on the briefing of the parties without conducting a hearing. St. v. Geren, 2012 MT 307, 367 Mont. 437, 291 P.3d 1144.

Untimely Motion for New Trial Properly Dismissed: Sirles moved for a new trial based on comments by three jurors that they had felt pressured by the jury supervisor into returning a guilty verdict. The motion was denied, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court correctly determined that the motion concerned matters related to internal jury deliberations and thus could not be considered and that the motion was not filed within 30 days of the verdict and was therefore untimely. St. v. Sirles, 2010 MT 88, 356 Mont. 133, 231 P.3d 1089.

State's Alleged Failure to Reveal Exculpatory Evidence Unfounded — New Trial Not Warranted: Jackson asserted that a new trial was warranted because the state committed a Brady violation by failing to disclose exculpatory statements made to a professional counselor by a deputy who was wounded during an altercation with Jackson in which another deputy was killed, in which the wounded deputy stated that he felt responsible for the other officer's death. The District Court denied Jackson's motion for a new trial, and on appeal the Supreme Court found no reversible error. The state disclosed the name of the counselor well before trial, identifying the counselor as a person with whom the deputy had discussed the shooting, and the jury heard evidence from other witnesses that the deputy felt guilty about the incident. Thus, the record did not support Jackson's claim that exculpatory evidence was withheld, and denial of Jackson's motion was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Jackson, 2009 MT 427, 354 M 63, 221 P3d 1213 (2009).

Court's Sua Sponte Withdrawal of Defendant's Guilty Plea Following Judgment Considered Mistake of Law: Friedt pleaded guilty to a stop sign violation and to a charge of failing to carry proof of insurance in the vehicle and was sentenced in Municipal Court. During sentencing, the County Attorney failed to raise any issues of restitution. After judgment was entered, the court was advised by a victim of a claim of damages associated with Friedt's offenses. The court, sua sponte, withdrew Friedt's guilty pleas, appointed counsel, and set an omnibus hearing. Friedt then petitioned the Supreme Court for supervisory control, asserting that the Municipal Court lacked jurisdiction to vacate or modify the sentence once a valid sentence was pronounced and thus proceeded under a mistake of law in withdrawing the guilty pleas, which would result in a gross injustice and unnecessary expense if Friedt was required to stand trial on charges to which she knowingly and voluntarily pleaded guilty and on which she had been sentenced. The County Attorney argued that the Municipal Court retained jurisdiction under 46-16-702 and that the interests of justice to the victim and the mandatory restitution provision in 46-18-201 required the Municipal Court to remedy the situation sua sponte. The Supreme Court noted that 46-16-702 allows a new trial, following judgment, for a defendant in the interests of justice, but that the statute does not authorize a new proceeding to benefit a victim or a prosecutor who fails to timely raise a sentencing matter. Further, although 46-16-105 allows a court for good cause to allow withdrawal of a guilty plea within 1 year after judgment if evidence supports a fundamental miscarriage of justice, nothing in the statute allows a court to forcibly withdraw a defendant's guilty plea sua sponte under any circumstances. Therefore, the Supreme Court agreed that the Municipal Court's action constituted a mistake of law. Friedt's petition for supervisory control was granted, and the Municipal Court was instructed to vacate the order withdrawing Friedt's guilty pleas. Friedt v. Billings Municipal Court, 2008 MT 174, 343 M 386, 184 P3d 1032 (2008).

Failure to Timely Object to Opening Statement — Waiver of Appeal: Paoni moved for a mistrial based on allegedly impermissible statements by the prosecutor during opening statements, but failed to timely object when the statements were made. The mistrial motion was denied, and Paoni appealed. The Supreme Court noted that a defendant must make a timely objection to properly preserve an issue for appeal. Although unproved facts asserted in an opening statement may constitute grounds for a mistrial if there is a reasonable possibility that the unproved facts contributed to a conviction, in this case, even if the objection had been timely, the state later established a proper foundation for the statement, so denial of the motion for mistrial was proper, and Paoni's conviction was affirmed. St. v. Paoni, 2006 MT 26, 331 M 86, 128 P3d 1040 (2006), following St. v. Gardner, 2003 MT 338, 318 M 436, 80 P3d 1262 (2003), and followed, with regard to the necessity for timeliness of an objection to the prosecutor's statements, in St. v. McWilliams, 2008 MT 59, 341 M 517, 178 P3d 121 (2008).

No Prejudice Warranting New Trial on Grounds of Cumulative Error: Larson contended that he was denied a fair trial and was entitled to a new trial because of the cumulative errors argued in his appeal. The doctrine of cumulative error requires reversal of a conviction when a number of errors taken together prejudice a defendant's right to a fair trial. However, in this case, the Supreme Court declined to apply the doctrine after reviewing all the issues on appeal. There was no prejudice shown, there was no abuse of judicial discretion, none of the evidentiary rulings were erroneous, and there was sufficient evidence to support the conviction. Larson's mere allegations of error without proof of prejudice were insufficient to satisfy the doctrine, and Larson's conviction was affirmed. St. v. Larson, 2004 MT 345, 324 M 310, 103 P3d 524 (2004).

Motion Filed Seventy-Nine Days After Verdict Untimely — Denial Proper: McCarthy filed a pro se motion for a new trial 79 days after being found guilty of intimidation. The District Court denied the motion as untimely, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Under this section, a motion for a new trial must be filed within 30 days following a verdict or finding of guilty. St.

v. McCarthy, 2004 MT 312, 324 M 1, 101 P3d 288 (2004). See also St. v. Hammer, 2013 MT 203, 371 Mont. 121, 305 P.3d 843.

Sufficient Evidence of Sexual Contact to Preclude New Trial on Incest Charge: After the jury convicted Bailey of two counts of incest, Bailey moved for a new trial on grounds that there was insufficient evidence to support the verdict on one count, but the motion was denied. The child victim had been ruled incompetent to testify, and none of the expert witnesses testified regarding any specific incident of sexual contact between Bailey and the child. However, the child's mother did testify regarding an incident when she found Bailey and the victim in bed, which provided sufficient evidence for the jury to conclude that sexual contact occurred during the time in question, so denial of Bailey's motion for a new trial was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Bailey, 2004 MT 87, 320 M 501, 87 P3d 1032 (2004).

Alleged New Evidence Not Extending Statutory Time Bar for Postconviction Relief: Raugust contended that the period for filing for postconviction relief should be extended based on newly discovered evidence that the state mishandled a weapon found at the crime scene and that a key eyewitness confessed to the offense while waiting in the County Attorney's office to testify in Raugust's trial and because of ineffective assistance of counsel at trial. The Supreme Court disagreed. Raugust could not establish that the evidence regarding the weapon was so material that it would probably produce a different result at trial or that the evidence could not have been discovered in a timely manner. Evidence regarding the eyewitness directly conflicted with other evidence given at trial that tended to preclude the possibility that the eyewitness could have committed the crime, nor could Raugust show that the evidence could not have been discovered in a timely manner. The claims of ineffective counsel were not newly discovered evidence because Raugust was aware of the asserted deficiencies at trial. Raugust v. St., 2003 MT 367, 319 M 97, 82 P3d 890 (2003), following St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959).

Abe was found guilty of accountability for deliberate homicide and was sentenced to 60 years in prison. One year and 14 days after the deadline, Abe filed a petition for postconviction relief on grounds of newly discovered evidence. Allegedly, two jurors from Abe's trial sat in on the trial of Abe's coconspirator and heard two of the state's witnesses testify differently than they did in Abe's trial. The Supreme Court applied the factors to be considered when a District Court evaluates a motion for a new trial based on newly discovered evidence as set out in St. v. Sullivan, 285 M 235, 948 P2d 215 (1997) (see also St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959)), including the requirement that the evidence must have come to the knowledge of the defendant since trial and the requirement that the evidence must not be such as will tend only to impeach the character or credit of a witness. Here, Abe's counsel knew about the alleged discrepancies after Abe's trial but prior to Abe's appeal, so the discrepancies in testimony could have been raised on direct appeal. Further, the petition for postconviction relief alleged that the discrepancies undermined the credibility of the witnesses but did not establish that Abe did not engage in the criminal conduct for which he was convicted. Thus, the District Court concluded, and the Supreme Court agreed, that the alleged new evidence did not serve to extend the statutory bar for filing a petition for postconviction relief beyond the 1-year period in 46-21-102. Although Abe correctly pointed out that the state did not raise the issue of the statutory bar in District Court and that the District Court did not rule on the issue, the general rule that the Supreme Court will not address issues raised for the first time on appeal did not apply in this case because that rule does not apply when the issue is jurisdictional. The 1-year statute of limitations for postconviction relief is a jurisdictional limit, and lack of subject matter jurisdiction may be raised at any time under former Rule 12(h), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded). Dismissal of Abe's petition for postconviction relief was affirmed as procedurally barred. St. v. Abe, 2001 MT 260, 307 M 233, 37 P3d 77 (2001). See also Mascarena v. St., 2019 MT 78, 395 Mont. 245, 438 P.3d 323.

When Sexual Assault Occurred Question for Jury — Sufficient Evidence to Show That Incident Occurred When Alleged to Preclude New Trial: Longhorn was convicted of a sexual assault that allegedly occurred in 1992. He moved for a new trial based on testimony by the victim and witnesses at trial that seemed to indicate that the assault occurred in 1991. In denying the motion, the District Court noted that the jury was properly instructed that the incident occurred in 1992 or not at all and that a reasonable juror could easily find beyond a reasonable doubt that the incident occurred in 1992. The Supreme Court examined the record and agreed. The question of when the incident occurred was one for the jury, and there was substantial evidence for the jury to conclude that the assault happened in 1992. The Supreme Court declined to second-guess the jury, holding that denial of the motion for a new trial was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Longhorn, 2002 MT 135, 310 M 172, 49 P3d 48 (2002).

Motion for New Trial and Recusal Based on Occasional Professional Relationship Between Court and Witness Properly Denied: Following conviction of theft and deceptive practices, Landis moved for a new trial and requested the District Court to recuse itself in order to avoid an appearance of impropriety, because one of the state's witnesses was a counselor occasionally used by the court to provide psychosexual and mental health evaluations, and because the professional relationship between the court and the witness was not disclosed. However, Landis failed to present any authority that such an occasional professional relationship constituted an appearance of impropriety giving rise to the necessity of recusal or a right to a new trial. The Supreme Court noted that it was the jury, not the District Court, that determined the witness's credibility, so any undisclosed occasional relationship had no bearing on the ultimate resolution of Landis's case by the jury. St. v. Landis, 2002 MT 45, 308 M 354, 43 P3d 298 (2002).

Jurors' Notes to Court During Deliberations Not Grounds for Mistrial: During deliberations, the jury sent several notes and questions to the court regarding one of the jurors, who was felt to be obstructing deliberations. Defendant's motion for mistrial based on breakdown in the deliberative process was denied. Following conviction, the juror in question prepared an affidavit alleging that he was unaware of the notes and would not have voted for a guilty verdict had he known about them. The District Court struck the affidavit, finding no juror misconduct, in effect denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The Supreme Court held that the notes constituted an entirely internal process and did not introduce an extraneous or outside element into deliberations, signal a breakdown in deliberations, or have any bearing on defendant's guilt or innocence. Even assuming that the notes had somehow affected the juror's vote, introduction of such testimony is prohibited under Rule 606(b), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), and the affidavit was properly stricken. St. v. Hovevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000).

Alleged Failure by State to Disclose Medical Report Until After Trial — Inability to Assess Prejudice Absent Record: Defendant contended that he was entitled to a new trial based on the alleged failure of the state to disclose a medical report until after trial, but defendant did not provide a copy of the report or a detailed account of the report in the motion for a new trial. Lacking sufficient information upon which to assess claims of prejudice and ineffective assistance of counsel, the District Court properly denied the motion for new trial. St. v. Ahto, 1998 MT 200, 290 M 338, 965 P2d 240, 55 St. Rep. 851 (1998).

Authority of District Court to Order New Criminal Trial Sua Sponte: Absent a lawful enactment by the Legislature withholding a trial court's inherent power to grant a new trial sua sponte, the court's authority to do so stands. Addressing the ambiguity in the statutory language while giving effect to all provisions of this section, the Supreme Court held that the right of a defendant to move for a new trial does not affect the court's inherent power to order a new trial sua sponte when required in the interests of justice. Given the circumstances of the court's concern for the state's "selective prosecution", the violation of the court's pretrial order precluding the giving of instructions on lesser included offenses unless presented prior to trial, the overwhelmingly contradictory witness testimony, and the court's fear that the jury was deprived of an option more supportable by the facts, the interests of justice demanded a new trial and the District Court did not err in ordering one sua sponte. St. v. Brummer, 1998 MT 11, 287 M 168, 953 P2d 250, 55 St. Rep. 30 (1998), followed in St. v. Marker, 2000 MT 303, 302 M 380, 15 P3d 373, 57 St. Rep. 1282 (2000). See also St. v. Baker, 2013 MT 113, 370 Mont. 43, 300 P.3d 696, in which the Supreme Court clarified that Brummer does not excuse a defendant from filing a motion for a new trial within the timeframe required under 46-16-702, and St. v. Morse, 2015 MT 51, 378 Mont. 249, 343 P.3d 1196, in which the Supreme Court determined that an untimely motion for a new trial did not prohibit the District Court from providing a remedy when the facts warranting a new trial came from posttrial statements made by the victim after the expiration of the 30-day time limit.

Motion for Judgment Notwithstanding Verdict — Effect and Treatment: The statutes governing criminal procedure do not provide for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, but that motion is considered a motion for a new trial under this section, and the standard for review is whether the lower court abused its discretion. St. v. Bell, 277 M 482, 923 P2d 524, 53 St. Rep. 792 (1996).

New Evidence Tending to Be Exculpatory — Greeno Test Met — New Trial Warranted: The District Court examined newly discovered evidence, found that three elements of the test set out in St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959), were not met, and denied a motion for a new trial. The Supreme Court disagreed, finding that the new evidence, discovered well after trial due to no lack of due diligence on defendant's part, was more than cumulative, tended to exculpate defendant, and spoke to facts that were not evident at trial. The new evidence, including a purported confession and other evidence pointing to a different person as the criminal, was distinct from any evidence presented at trial and was so material that it would probably, albeit not necessarily, produce a different result at another trial. Because all the Greeno criteria were met, it was an abuse of discretion for the District Court to deny a motion for a new trial and remand was warranted. St. v. Cline, 275 M 46, 909 P2d 1171, 53 St. Rep. 32 (1996), followed in St. v. Sullivan, 285 M 235, 948 P2d 215, 54 St. Rep. 1128 (1997).

Motion After Thirty Days — Judicial Exceptions Distinguished: The defendant filed a motion for a new trial 3½ years after conviction. The Supreme Court distinguished several of its past decisions and held that the defendant's motion was time-barred. The defendant has the opportunity to raise postverdict claims through a petition for postconviction relief. There are no "reasonable time" or "serious case" exceptions to the 30-day filing requirement under this section. St. v. Gollehon, 274 M 116, 906 P2d 697, 52 St. Rep. 1182 (1995), followed in St. v. Belgarde, 1998 MT 152, 289 M 287, 962 P2d 571, 55 St. Rep. 590 (1998).

Alleged Juror Prejudice Caused by Defendant's Voluntary Ex Parte Contact With Juror: Defendant, whose ex parte contact with a juror was caused by his own actions in going to an airport cafe where she worked and ordering coffee, could not wait until he was found guilty and then seek a new trial based on alleged juror prejudice. St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457, 51 St. Rep. 1151 (1994).

Failure to File Motion Within Thirty Days — Motion Considered: Although defendant did not file a new trial motion within 30 days after the guilty verdict, as required by this section, the Supreme Court considered the merits of the motion and its denial because the District Court gave extensive consideration to the motion and it was a serious case (deliberate homicide). St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457, 51 St. Rep. 1151 (1994), distinguished in St. v. Gollehon, 274 M 116, 906 P2d 697, 52 St. Rep. 1182 (1995).

Proof of Actual Prejudice Required — No Presumption of Prejudice: Defendant seeking a new trial because of defendant's ex parte contact with a juror must prove actual prejudice; there is no presumption of prejudice. St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457, 51 St. Rep. 1151 (1994).

Lower Court's Ruling on Untimely Motion Upheld: The state argued that the trial court should have summarily dismissed Barrack's motion for a new trial because it was filed late and that the trial court should not have treated the motion as a petition for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court noted that at the time that the trial court incorrectly treated the untimely motion for a new trial as a petition for postconviction relief, Barrack could still have filed a timely appeal and may have been lulled into a position in which he did not timely pursue his appeal rights. The Supreme Court held that under the unique facts of the case, it would affirm the lower court's decision to rule on the untimely motion but that its decision could not be read as enlarging the scope of postconviction relief or as diminishing a defendant's obligation to timely file any motions. St. v. Barrack, 267 M 154, 882 P2d 1028, 51 St. Rep. 983 (1994), Redcrow was distinguished in St. v. Gollehon, 274 M 116, 906 P2d 697, 52 St. Rep. 1182 (1995).

Failure to Meet Second Prong of Strickland Test — No Prejudice Shown — Claim of Ineffective Counsel Denied: Denny's counsel neglected to investigate and interview several witnesses in her case, which satisfied the first prong of the Strickland test for ineffective counsel. However, because the potential witnesses were never interviewed, it was impossible to determine whether their testimony would have produced a different result. The second prong of Strickland was not satisfied because Denny could not demonstrate that counsel's omission prejudiced the case to such a degree as to deprive Denny of a fair trial. Denny's motion for a new trial on grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel was properly denied. St. v. Denny, 262 M 248, 865 P2d 226, 50 St. Rep. 1537 (1993), following Nealy v. Cabana, 764 F2d 1173 (5th Cir. 1985), United States ex rel. Cross v. DeRobertis, 811 F2d 1008 (7th Cir. 1987), and Lawrence v. Armontrout, 900 F2d 127 (8th Cir. 1990), and cited in St. v. Hagen, 273 M 432, 903 P2d 1381, 52 St. Rep. 1048 (1995). Hagen was followed in St. v. Boucher, 1999 MT 102, 294 M 296, 980 P2d 1058, 56 St. Rep. 431 (1999), and St. v. Cady, 2000 MT 353, 303 M 258, 15 P3d 479, 57 St. Rep. 1491 (2000).

Grant of New Trial at Discretion of Trial Court: As stated in this section, the grant or denial of a motion for a new trial is within the discretion of the trial court. Absent an abuse of that discretion, the court's decision will be affirmed. St. v. Gambrel, 246 M 84, 803 P2d 1071, 47 St. Rep. 2270 (1990). See also St. v. Goettle, 253 M 111, 831 P2d 595, 49 St. Rep. 438 (1992).

Failure to File Supporting Brief — New Trial Denied: Defendant maintained that he was entitled to a new trial pursuant to 46-16-701 and this section. The state contended that a summary ruling was proper under Rule 2, M.U.D.C.R. (Title 25, ch. 19), because defendant failed to file a supporting brief within 5 days. Defendant argued that Rule 2 did not apply to criminal cases. The state contended that the decision to deny the motion for a new trial was a matter of trial court discretion. The Supreme Court held that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion when defendant failed to provide sufficient information to support his motion for a new trial. St. v. Sor-Lokken, 246 M 70, 803 P2d 638, 47 St. Rep. 2264 (1990).

Test Whether New Trial Warranted on Grounds of Newly Discovered Evidence: In determining whether a new trial was warranted based on newly discovered evidence, the District Court properly applied the test set out in St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959), that: (1) the evidence must have come to the knowledge of the applicant since the trial; (2) it is not through want of diligence that it was not discovered earlier; and (3) it is so material that it would probably produce a different result upon retrial. St. v. DeMers, 234 M 273, 762 P2d 866, 45 St. Rep. 1901 (1988), followed in St. v. Haskins, 255 M 202, 841 P2d 542, 49 St. Rep. 922 (1992). See also St. v. Sullivan, 285 M 235, 948 P2d 215, 54 St. Rep. 1128 (1997).

Admissibility in Second Trial of Testimony Given in First Trial: After having testified in his first trial, which ended in a mistrial, defendant declined to testify in his second trial. Defendant argued that his testimony given in the first trial was inadmissible in the second because 46-16-701 places the parties in a new trial in the same position as if there had been no trial and that the first trial was therefore a nullity. The court found that under 46-16-701 and this section there must be a "finding" or a "verdict of guilty" in the first trial in order for these sections to apply, that since the first trial resulted in a hung jury and mistrial there was no "finding or verdict", and that therefore defendant did not fit under these sections. Admission of defendant's testimony from the first trial was not error. St. v. Hall, 234 M 57, 761 P2d 1283, 45 St. Rep. 1726 (1988).

Statement of Codefendant After Trial Not So Material as to Produce Different Result: Statements made by a codefendant exculpating defendant from crimes were not sufficient to warrant a new trial. The lack of veracity of both defendants, plus the fact that the evidence presented an additional inconsistency for jury consideration, justified refusal of a new trial because the new evidence was not so material as to produce a different result upon another trial. St. v. Miller, 231 M 497, 757 P2d 1275, 45 St. Rep. 790 (1988), citing St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959).

Motion Based on Cumulative Evidence Properly Denied: It was not error to deny a motion for a new trial based on alleged newly discovered evidence when such evidence was cumulative. St. v. Lamping, 231 M 288, 752 P2d 742, 45 St. Rep. 616 (1988), citing St. v. Matkins, 45 M 58, 121 P 881 (1912).

Rules for Granting New Trial Based on Newly Discovered Evidence: In order for newly discovered evidence to be sufficient to warrant granting a new trial, it must be determined that: (1) the evidence came to the knowledge of the applicant since the trial; (2) it was not through want of diligence that it was not discovered earlier; (3) it is so material that it would probably produce a different result upon another trial; (4) it is not merely cumulative—that is, does not speak to facts in relation to which there was evidence at the trial; (5) the application is supported by the affidavit of the witness whose evidence is alleged to have been newly discovered or its absence accounted for; and (6) the evidence is not such as will only tend to impeach the character or credit of a witness. St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959), followed in St. v. Kutnyak, 211 M 155, 685 P2d 901, 41 St. Rep. 1277 (1984); St. v. Short, 217 M 62, 702 P2d 979, 42 St. Rep. 1026 (1985); St. v. Cyr, 229 M 337, 746 P2d 120, 44 St. Rep. 2013 (1987); St. v. Redcrow, 242 M 254, 790 P2d 449, 47 St. Rep. 672 (1990); St. v. Goodwin, 249 M 1, 813 P2d 953, 48 St. Rep. 539 (1991); In re J.R.T., 258 M 520, 853 P2d 710, 50 St. Rep. 642 (1993); St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994); St. v. Hatfield, 269 M 307, 888 P2d 899, 52 St. Rep. 1 (1995); St. v. Fina, 273 M 171, 902 P2d 30, 52 St. Rep. 887 (1995); St. v. Sullivan, 285 M 235, 948 P2d 215, 54 St. Rep. 1128 (1997); St. v. Whitlow, 285 M 430, 949 P2d 239, 54 St. Rep. 1227 (1997); St. v. Berger, 1998 MT 170, 290 M 78, 964 P2d 725, 55 St. Rep. 686 (1998), and St. v. Hall, 1999 MT 297, 297 M 111, 991 P2d 929, 56 St. Rep. 1190 (1999). Redcrow was distinguished in St. v. Gollehon, 274 M 116, 906 P2d 697, 52 St. Rep. 1182 (1995). The rules were also applied in St. v. Abe, 2001 MT 260, 307 M 233, 37 P3d 77 (2001).

Newly Discovered Evidence — Material Cumulative — Different Result at New Trial Not Probable: An "intelligence" file relating to problems involving the deceased was kept by the Sheriff's office. For the homicide trial, defense demanded all materials held by the Sheriff's office concerning the case, but through apparent inadvertence, the file was not turned over to the defense. It was not discovered until 5 months after the trial during a search of the Sheriff's files by defense counsel and an assistant County Attorney. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying a new trial after it had determined: that the file was not deliberately suppressed; that the material in the file was testified to at the trial and the material would have been cumulative; and that the material was not germane to the defendant's defense of use of justifiable force. The Supreme Court held that under the rules set forth in St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959), a new trial was not necessary because the file was not so material that it would probably produce a different result upon another trial. St. v. Kutnyak, 211 M 155, 685 P2d 901, 41 St. Rep. 1277 (1984).

Inclusion of Grounds Not Necessary in Order Denying Motion for New Trial: The Supreme Court refused to extend the ruling of St. v. Williams, 193 M 432, 632 P2d 328, 38 St. Rep. 1253 (1981) (annotated below), to denial of a motion for a new trial under this section. The court also observed that in this case comments made by the trial judge did set forth the reason he denied the motion. St. v. Hall, 203 M 528, 662 P2d 1306, 40 St. Rep. 621 (1983).

Conviction of Lesser Included Offense — Lack of Mental State as Defense — No Mental State Verdict Form: The trial court refused defendant's request for a verdict form that stated that the defendant was found not guilty of attempted deliberate homicide due to mental disease or defect. The jury found him not guilty of that offense but did find him guilty of the lesser included offense of aggravated assault. The defendant alleged that due to his drugged state he lacked the necessary mental state to commit the offense charged and that the jury finding of not guilty of the charged offense on that basis yet guilty of the lesser offense constituted inconsistent and irreconcilable verdicts. The Supreme Court held that although a mental state verdict form would have been preferable in determining whether the trial court abused its discretion in refusing a new trial, it must look at every fact that the jury reasonably could have deduced from all the evidence, and in this case the basis for the conviction for the lesser included offense could have been based on several grounds. St. v. Doney, 194 M 22, 636 P2d 1377, 38 St. Rep. 1707 (1981).

Order for New Trial to Include Grounds: Former Rule 59(f), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), which requires that an order of the District Court granting a new trial must include a statement of the grounds for the trial, is applicable to motions for new trial in criminal actions. Therefore, when the trial court grants a new trial under this section, there must be a statement of the grounds for the order contained in that order. St. v. Williams, 193 M 432, 632 P2d 328, 38 St. Rep. 1253 (1981).

Unreasonable Notice: Ten minutes before the sentencing hearing, counsel for the defendant moved the court for a new trial. The County Attorney had not been given advance notice of the motion or an opportunity to brief the question. Clearly, such action denied the state "reasonable notice". St. v. Williams, 193 M 432, 632 P2d 328, 38 St. Rep. 1253 (1981).

Insufficient Evidence — Acquittal Required: The defendant was convicted of tampering with or fabricating evidence. The defendant moved the court for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict and for a new trial. A new trial was granted. The Supreme Court found that there was insufficient evidence to support the conviction, and therefore the District Court should have entered a judgment of acquittal rather than granting a new trial. St. v. Warren, 192 M 436, 628 P2d 292, 38 St. Rep. 773 (1981).

Examination After Trial — New Evidence on Mental Defect: Application for new trial based on a psychiatric examination that could have been conducted prior to trial but was not conducted until after was properly denied. St. v. Higley, 190 M 412, 621 P2d 1043, 37 St. Rep. 1942 (1980). See also St. v. Pease, 227 M 424, 740 P2d 659, 44 St. Rep. 1203 (1987). As applied to newly discovered battered women's syndrome, see St. v. Redcrow, 242 M 254, 790 P2d 449, 47 St. Rep. 672 (1990), distinguished in St. v. Gollehon, 274 M 116, 906 P2d 697, 52 St. Rep. 1182 (1995).

Jury Instructions on Lesser Included Offenses — No Error When Omitted Instruction Not Offered by Appellant: On appeal, the defendant in a deliberate homicide case alleged error in the failure to give jury instructions on mitigated deliberate homicide and negligent homicide. The general rule is that an instruction is required where there is some evidence to support the lesser included offense. Both negligent homicide and mitigated deliberate homicide are to be considered lesser included offenses of deliberate homicide. Here, a lesser included offense instruction was offered by the State and objected to by the defense. The Montana Supreme Court reiterated its position that error may not be predicated upon the failure to give an instruction when the party alleging the error failed to offer the instruction. Failure to offer an instruction removes the cause of error, particularly when the defense counsel has objected to the instruction upon the ground that the defendant was either guilty of deliberate homicide or not guilty. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470 (1980).

Evidence Impeached at Hearing — No Abuse of Discretion for Denial: When evidence presented at hearing on motion for new trial was impeached to the point that the trial judge felt that he had been lied to, the motion was properly denied. St. v. Rose, 187 M 74, 608 P2d 1074 (1980).

Intimidation of Witnesses: When protection was immediately provided for two witnesses upon the discovery that they were being intimidated, and the jury had all the facts before it to weigh those witnesses' credibility, the District Court sufficiently guarded the defendant's rights and a mistrial was not warranted. St. v. Booke, 178 M 225, 583 P2d 405 (1978).

Motion After Thirty Days: A motion for a new trial on the basis of newly discovered evidence filed in the District Court after the 30-day period for filing with the District Court was untimely and filed in the wrong court. If the grounds for seeking a new trial do not arise until after the 30-day period or until after the appeal is filed, the proper procedure is to stay the appeal, remand the case to the District Court, file the motion, secure the District Court's decision thereon, and continue with the appeal. St. v. Best, 161 M 20, 503 P2d 997 (1972), distinguished in St. v. Gollehon, 274 M 116, 906 P2d 697, 52 St. Rep. 1182 (1995).

Improper Denial of Bail: The trial court abused its authority in denying bail to a defendant whose conviction for first degree murder was reversed and remanded for a new trial. St. v. Campbell, 160 M 111, 500 P2d 801 (1972).

Motion After Appeal Perfected: Once an appeal has been perfected to the Supreme Court, the District Court loses jurisdiction of the case, except that if a motion for a new trial is then pending, the District Court retains jurisdiction thereof with power to rule thereon. St. v. Nicks, 131 M 567, 312 P2d 519 (1957).

Assignment of Error in Denying New Trial — No Record, Not Argued: When an alleged error in denying the defendant's motion for a new trial was not argued and nothing appeared in the record to sustain it, the assignment did not merit consideration. St. v. Wong Sun, 114 M 185, 133 P2d 761 (1943).

Newspaperman's Bias: After conviction of first degree murder, the defendant moved for a new trial on the ground, among others, that a juror had been guilty of misconduct in concealing from the court, while under examination on his voir dire, the fact that after the arrest of the defendant he, as correspondent for the newspaper published at the county seat, had furnished it articles, which were published, in effect complimenting the officers for their quick action in apprehending the "murderer", whose "worthless carcass will lie to rot deeply buried when the wheels of justice cease to grind". The motion was denied. The court held, in answer to the contention that the trial court abused its discretion in denying the motion, that in view of the explanation of his conduct by the juror on the hearing of the motion that the articles were not intended to be personal as applied to the defendant, whom he did not know, but applicable to anyone who committed homicide, and the advantageous position of the trial judge in passing upon the sincerity and truth of the statements of the juror on his examination touching his competency as well as on the hearing of the motion, the court did not err in its ruling. St. v. Hoffman, 94 M 573, 23 P2d 972 (1933). See also St. v. Huffman, 89 M 194, 296 P 789 (1931).

Verdict Contrary to Law and Evidence: A motion for a new trial in a criminal case upon the ground that the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence presents for the court's determination the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict. St. v. Hughes, 76 M 421, 246 P 956 (1926).

Appeal: Rulings upon the admission or rejection of testimony and upon giving or refusing instructions may be reviewed either upon appeal from the judgment or on appeal from an order refusing a new trial, but any other questions arising from this section may be reviewed only upon appeal from an order denying a new trial. St. v. Brantingham, 66 M 1, 212 P 499 (1923).

Modification of Verdict Without New Trial: Under a former statute providing that when the verdict is contrary to the law or evidence but the evidence shows the accused to be guilty only of a lesser degree or a lesser included offense rather than the degree of which he was convicted, the court could modify the judgment without granting a new trial and the expression "the verdict is contrary to the evidence" meant the same thing as the expression "insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict". St. v. Schoenborn, 55 M 517, 178 P 294 (1919); Flaherty v. Butte Elec. Ry., 42 M 89, 111 P 348 (1910).

Scope of Appeal of Ruling on Motion: Upon an appeal from an order granting or denying a motion for a new trial, the Supreme Court sits as a court of error and review, not as a court of original jurisdiction or as an appellate court that is clothed with authority to try the motion de novo. St. v. Schoenborn, 55 M 517, 178 P 294 (1919).

Content of Notice of Motion: The notice of a motion for a new trial in a criminal case need not state whether the motion will be based on affidavits or a bill of exceptions, and the statement therein of the grounds on which the motion will be made is notice of what will be the basis of the motion. St. v. Landry, 29 M 218, 74 P 418 (1903).

Waiver of Objection: When on a motion for a new trial it is found that the counsel for the defendant consented to the taking of certain exhibits to the jury room previously admitted in evidence on a prosecution for murder, such consent constitutes a waiver of any objection to the sending of the exhibits to the jury during retirement. St. v. Allen, 23 M 118, 57 P 725 (1899).

LOWER COURT PROCEEDINGS

Chapter Commission Comments

Source of 1991 Commission Comments: The 1991 comments to this chapter were prepared by the Commission on Criminal Procedure appointed by the Supreme Court. The Commission's work extended over nearly a decade. The comments were prepared for proposed rules of criminal procedure. The Supreme Court determined that the proposed rules would be better suited to adoption by the Legislature. The Commission received assistance from the State Bar of Montana and the Montana County Attorneys' Association. The following were members of the Commission at various times: Robert L. Deschamps III, Chairman; Honorable Thomas A. Olson; Honorable Henry Loble; Honorable Leif B. Erickson; Professor James T. Ranney; John P. Connor; Daniel V. Donovan; Gary G. Doran; Harold Hanser; Joe L. Hegel; Ted O. Lympus; Marc F. Racicot; and Michael J. Sherwood. The Commission also received valuable assistance from its intern, Peter Carroll, and from Leslie Halligan, who compiled the Commission's work.

The Commission's work ultimately resulted in the enactment of Chapter 800, Laws of 1991. The commission comments were substantially rewritten by the Code Commissioner and his staff to reflect changes from the time the rules were initially proposed and to reflect the change from a rules format to a statute format. The Code Commissioner has substituted references to "statute" for "rule" when appropriate and has substituted MCA citations for references to proposed rules. The Code Commissioner has inserted "1987" in MCA references that originated with the Commission because that is the version of the MCA the Commission originally used. The annotator has also deleted references to "proposed" material that has been adopted. Bracketed material has been inserted to indicate changes made by the 1991 Legislature that were not based on the Commission's proposal. The Code Commissioner extends his thanks to John P. Connor and Michael J. Sherwood for their review of the revised comments.

Chapter Case Notes

Limited Jurisdiction: Police courts (now City Courts), like Justices' Courts, are courts of limited jurisdiction and have only such authority as is expressly conferred upon them. State ex rel. Marquette v. Police Court, 86 M 297, 283 P 430 (1929).

Nature of Action for Ordinance Violation: The nature of an action for the violation of a city ordinance, whether civil or criminal, must be determined by the relief sought in the proceeding without regard to the question of whether some other proceeding may or may not be brought under the state statutes. State ex rel. Marquette v. Police Court, 86 M 297, 283 P 430 (1929).

Part 1

Preliminary Matters — Justices' and City Courts

Part Case Notes

Remedy for Criminal Prosecution of Public Nuisance: Panasuk, convicted in City Court of misdemeanor criminal public nuisance charges under 45-8-111, contended that because 3-10-301, 25-31-102, and former Rule 4(B), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), preclude a nonrecord court from hearing actions involving the title to or possession of real property, jurisdiction for prosecution of the public nuisance charge must lie with the District Court. He cited 45-8-112 as authority that any action to abate a nuisance must be brought in the name of the state and that because abatement is a form of injunctive relief, the District Court has exclusive jurisdiction. He also argued that 27-30-202 provides the exclusive civil and criminal remedies for public nuisance. His claims were dismissed for the following reasons: (1) charges filed under 45-8-111 were criminal rather than related to a civil action involving title to or possession of real property, which is regulated by the sections cited by Panasuk; (2) the remedy created by 27-30-202 has been supplemented by subsequent legislative action regarding a City Court's jurisdiction over misdemeanors and by the enactment of 46-17-101 (now repealed), which requires that all prosecutions brought in City Court be commenced by a sworn complaint; and (3) because Panasuk's interpretation would result in a direct contradiction between 27-30-202 and statutes subsequently enacted, the argument that 27-30-202 provides the exclusive remedies for public nuisance is erroneous. Billings v. Panasuk, 253 M 403, 833 P2d 1050, 49 St. Rep. 499 (1992).

Disqualification of Justice of the Peace: Under former law, the word "judge" did not include "justice of the peace", and a Justice of the Peace could not be disqualified on a simple affidavit for substitution of judge. Bailey v. St., 163 M 380, 517 P2d 708 (1973).

Procedure for Requesting Speedy Trial — Justice's Court: An inmate of the state prison who sought a speedy trial upon a Justice's Court complaint, by virtue of which a detainer had been filed at the prison, should have petitioned the District Court setting forth the facts of the complaint against him and requested a speedy trial rather than directing such a request to the County Attorney or petitioning the Supreme Court. Petition of Ditton, 145 M 594, 403 P2d 205 (1965).

Pleading City Ordinance: In a criminal proceeding, it is sufficient to plead a city ordinance by reference to its title, section, and subdivision of section. Philipsburg v. Weinstein, 21 M 146, 53 P 272 (1898).

The Trial — Justices' and City Courts

46-17-201. Juries in misdemeanor cases.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is an adaptation of 1987 MCA 46-17-201. The statute recognizes the defendant's right to a jury of six members but allows that a jury of less than six may be agreed upon. Subsection (2) deletes the requirement for both parties' approval before a jury trial may be waived. The statute permits such a waiver upon the defendant's written request. The change recognizes that waiver of the jury trial is an exclusive right of the defendant.

Commission Comment Not Divided: This section is a recodification of part of section 95-2004, R.C.M. 1947. Sections 46-17-203 through 46-17-205 [46-17-204 and 46-17-205 now repealed] are also derived from section 95-2004. The commission comments to section 95-2004 are printed in their entirety under 46-17-201.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 346 in (1) at beginning deleted "Subject to subsection (3)"; deleted former (3) that read: "(3) A defendant in a misdemeanor case filed in justice's or city court is limited to one jury trial, either in justice's or city court or on appeal to the district court. The defendant shall either elect a jury trial in justice's or city court or reserve jury trial for the district court in the event of conviction and subsequent appeal to the district court. The defendant's election or reservation must be noted by the court on the face of the charging document"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 19, 1999.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 346, L. 1999, provided: "WHEREAS, in Woirhaye v. Montana Fourth Judicial District Court, 1998 MT 320, [292] Mont. [185], [972] P.2d [800] (1998), the Montana Supreme Court found that Chapter 129, Laws of 1997, impinges upon rights to a jury trial guaranteed by Article II, section 26, of the Montana Constitution."

1997 Amendment: Chapter 129 at beginning of (1) inserted reference to subsection (3); and inserted (3) limiting defendants to one jury trial in misdemeanor criminal cases filed in a Justice's or City Court and requiring election or reservation of jury trial. Amendment effective March 24, 1997.

Applicability: Section 5, Ch. 129, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] applies to criminal charges filed on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective March 24, 1997.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 7 in (1) and (2) substituted reference to parties for reference to defendant; and made minor changes in style.

1991 Amendment: In (1), after "defendant", inserted "in a misdemeanor case" and at end inserted "at any time before the verdict"; substituted (2) concerning waiver of jury trial by defendant for former text that read: "(2) A trial by jury may be waived by the consent of both parties expressed in open court and entered in the docket"; and deleted (3) that read: "(3) Questions of law shall be decided by the court and questions of fact by the jury except that, when a jury trial is waived, the court shall determine both questions of law and questions of fact".

Case Notes

Constitutionality of Waiver of Jury Trial by Defendant Over State's Objection — Writ of Supervisory Control Granted: Defendant Courville was charged in Justice's Court with speeding, DUI, and possession of an open container. Courville requested a waiver of a jury trial, and the state objected. The Justice's Court granted the waiver, finding that the statute violated Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const. The state filed an application for a writ of supervisory control and a motion for stay of proceedings pending the Supreme Court's review of the application. Courville argued that only a defendant, and not the state, has the constitutional right to a jury trial and the corresponding ability to waive the right despite statutory language to the contrary in this section. The Supreme Court vacated the waiver of a jury trial, holding that Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const., provides a right of a jury trial to the state and that both parties in a criminal trial must consent to waiver. State ex rel. Long v. Justice's Court, 2007 MT 3, 335 M 219, 156 P3d 5 (2007), overruling State ex rel. Nelson v. District Court, 262 M 70, 863 P2d 1027 (1993).

Purpose of Act — Declaratory Judgment Properly Used to Test Constitutionality of Criminal Jurisdictional Statute—Previous Opinion Applied by Remand: Defendants in criminal proceedings in several different Justices' Courts filed actions under the Uniform Declaratory Judgments Act (UDJA) to have declared unconstitutional statutes requiring a criminal defendant in a Justice's Court proceeding to choose between a jury trial in Justice's Court or in District Court. Several civil actions requesting the same relief under the UDJA were consolidated for the purposes of appeal. The state argued that the UDJA was not intended to be used for this purpose and that the various criminal defendants could obtain the same relief by raising the unconstitutionality of the underlying statute as a defense in their individual criminal prosecutions. The Supreme Court noted that acceptance of the state's position would require each criminal defendant to litigate the constitutionality of the pertinent sections of law both in the District Courts and in the Montana Supreme Court. Citing Goff v. St., 141 M 605, 374 P2d 862 (1962), St. v. Wilson, 160 M 473, 503 P2d 522 (1972), and Gryczan v. St., 283 M 433, 942 P2d 112 (1997), and noting that the issue of the constitutionality of the pertinent statutes could be raised, but not finally decided, in the District Courts, the Supreme Court held that it was proper to use the UDJA to determine the constitutionality of the statutes requiring the election of a jury trial in one court and not both courts. On this substantive issue, the Supreme Court cited its recent decision in Woirhaye v. District Court, 1998 MT 320, 292 M 185, 972 P2d 800, 55 St. Rep. 1298 (1998), holding that the statute requiring the election was unconstitutional, and remanded the cases to the District Courts with directions to enter declaratory judgments in favor of the plaintiffs and appellants. McGillivray v. St., 1999 MT 3, 293 M 19, 972 P2d 804, 56 St. Rep. 11 (1999).

Limitation to One Jury Trial Held Unconstitutional: In 1997, the Legislature enacted the provisions codified at 46-7-102(1)(g), 46-17-311(1), and former subsection (3) of this section providing that a person tried for a misdemeanor in Justice's or City Court who appeals to the District Court has the right to only one jury trial. (See 1999 amendment.) Woirhaye was charged with misdemeanor DUI and requested a jury trial in Missoula County Justice's Court. Upon his conviction by the Justice's Court jury, Woirhaye appealed to the District Court for a trial de novo pursuant to Art. VII, sec. 4(2), Mont. Const., and 46-17-311. Woirhaye asked that the District Court declare subsection (3) of this section unconstitutional, but the District Court denied his motion. Woirhaye then petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control, which was granted on the grounds that Woirhaye would otherwise be denied a fundamental right. The Supreme Court held that Woirhaye's right to a jury trial in both the Justice's Court or City Court and the District Court was a fundamental right guaranteed by Art. II, sec. 24 and 26, Mont. Const. The Supreme Court pointed out that the right to a jury trial is guaranteed by Art. III, sec. 2, clause 3, of the U.S. Constitution and the sixth amendment to the U.S. Constitution and also that even if that were not the case, Montana may, under the rationale of St. v. Bullock, 272 M 361, 901 P2d 61 (1995), provide rights in excess of those guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution. The Supreme Court noted, in response to the state's argument that Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., guarantees "a" jury trial, that the state's argument was not persuasive against the language of Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const. The Supreme Court also distinguished Ludwig v. Mass., 427 US 618 (1976), holding that Art. VII, sec. 4(2), Mont. Const., was not implicated in the case, and stated that any language in N. Cent. Serv., Inc. v. Hafdahl, 191 M 440, 625 P2d 56 (1981), indicating that a requirement for a jury trial applicable to Small Claims Court was satisfied if the right was granted at the District Court level, was dicta and could not be relied upon to support the state's case that only one jury trial was required. Consequently, the Supreme Court held 46-7-102(1)(g), 46-17-311(1), and former subsection (3) of this section to be unconstitutional as violating Woirhaye's right to a jury trial. (See 1999 amendment.) Woirhaye v. District Court, 1998 MT 320, 292 M 185, 972 P2d 800, 55 St. Rep. 1298 (1998), followed in McGillivray v. St., 1999 MT 3, 293 M 19, 972 P2d 804, 56 St. Rep. 11 (1999), and Balyeat Law, P.C. v. Harrison, 1999 MT 144, 295 M 13, 983 P2d 902, 56 St. Rep. 566 (1999), and followed and clarified in St. v. Rensvold, 2006 MT 146, 332 M 392, 139 P3d 154 (2006).

City Court Error to Refuse Waiver of Jury Trial — Error Waived by De Novo Appeal: McCarvel was charged with DUI within the city limits of Billings and scheduled for trial in the City Court. The city demanded a jury trial, but McCarvel waived his right to trial by jury. The City Court refused to accept the waiver, and the jury convicted McCarvel. On appeal to the District Court, McCarvel moved to dismiss on the grounds that the City Court committed error. The District Court refused to dismiss, and McCarvel changed his plea to guilty. Citing St. v. O'Brien, 35 M 482, 90 P 514 (1907), the Supreme Court held that because the trial in District Court is a trial de novo, in which a defendant has an opportunity for a trial without a jury, the opportunity for a District Court trial cured whatever prejudice resulted from the City Court's refusal to grant the right to a waiver provided under the provisions of this section. Billings v. McCarvel, 262 M 96, 863 P2d 441, 50 St. Rep. 1460 (1993).

Guilty Plea Not to Be in Writing: Both 46-12-201, regarding the arraignment of an accused, and this section, regarding the procedure applicable to a plea in Justice's Court, require that a defendant appear in open court, that there be actual communication between the judge and defendant, that the judge first make the requisite inquiries of and provide mandated information to the defendant, and that a plea be accepted as part of that communicative process. There is no provision in either statute that allows a judge to accept a guilty plea from a defendant in either a felony or misdemeanor case through the expedient of the defendant or defendant's counsel simply filing a written plea with the court. The Supreme Court expressed its disapproval of the practice and admonished state courts to comply with the statutory mandates. However, in this case, defendant was at all times represented by counsel, who was personally involved in the written plea. Because defendant's substantive rights were not affected, acceptance of the written guilty plea by the trial court was allowed to stand. St. v. Schneiderhan, 261 M 161, 862 P2d 37, 50 St. Rep. 1242 (1993).

Waiver of Jury Trial When Only Questions of Law Raised: Where defendant raised only legal questions in his challenge to the constitutionality of 61-3-301, his waiver of jury trial was effective regardless of whether or not the court advised him that only legal issues were involved and that the judge, not a jury, decides all legal issues, since only the court can decide questions of law. St. v. Turk, 197 M 311, 643 P2d 224, 39 St. Rep. 584 (1982).

Questions of Law — Questions of Fact: The provision that the court shall decide questions of law but can give no charge with respect to matters of fact was the statement in legislative form of an ancient legal maxim which has been enacted in many statutes and has been deemed so vital to the rights and liberties of the people that it has been engrafted upon the constitutions of states. St. v. Sullivan, 9 M 174, 22 P 1088 (1890).

46-17-202. Formation of trial jury for justices', municipal, and city courts.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute preserves the first two subsections of 1987 MCA 46-17-202. Subsection (1) governs the formation of a list of potential jurors for lower courts. Subsection (2) retains the provision allowing oral notice that a juror has been summoned. The remainder of the 1987 code provision is not retained because the conduct of voir dire and other matters concerning actual jury selection are governed by other statutes.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 133 in (1) in fifth sentence after "must be" substituted "filed" for "kept on file". Amendment effective April 5, 2007.

Extension of Effective Date: Section 1, Ch. 99, L. 2005, amended sec. 9, Ch. 441, L. 2003, by extending the effective date imposed by Ch. 441 to October 1, 2007. Effective March 24, 2005.

Applicability Date Extended: Section 2, Ch. 99, L. 2005, amended sec. 10, Ch. 441, L. 2003, to read: "[This act] applies to combined jury lists compiled partly from the lists submitted under [section 1] [61-5-127] by the department of justice to the clerks of the district courts on and after the second Monday of May 2008." Amendment effective March 24, 2005.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 441 in (1) in first sentence near beginning after "jury list" inserted "under 3-15-404(6)" and near middle before "shall prepare" substituted "clerk of the district court" for "county commissioners and clerk and recorder" and in fifth sentence near beginning after “must be” substituted “kept on file” for “filed” and at end inserted “as provided in 3-15-403”. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

Applicability: Section 10, Ch. 441, L. 2003, provided: “[This act] applies to combined jury lists compiled partly from the lists submitted under [section 1] [61-5-127] by the department of justice to the clerks of the district courts on and after the second Monday of May 2006.”

1991 Amendment: In (1), in first sentence after “justice’s”, inserted “municipal”; deleted (3) and (4) that read: “(3) The prosecuting attorney and the defendant or his attorney shall conduct the examination of prospective jurors. The court may conduct an additional examination. The court may limit the examination by the defendant, his attorney, or the prosecuting attorney if the court believes such examination to be improper.”

(4) Each party may challenge jurors for cause, and each challenge must be tried by the court. The challenge may be for any cause enumerated in 46-16-304(2) (renumbered 46-16-115). Each defendant shall be allowed three peremptory challenges, and the state shall be allowed the same number of peremptory challenges as all of the defendants”; and made minor changes in style.

1983 Amendment: In (1), after “the county” substituted “commissioners and clerk and recorder” for “jury commission”.

Case Notes

Justice’s Court Jury Properly Drawn: Following several delays, a jury was hastily assembled the day before the deadline for a speedy trial dismissal in Justice’s Court. Although several potential jurors were dismissed by the Justice’s Court clerk for medical or travel reasons, the defendant failed to prove that there was not substantial compliance with 3-15-313. The defendant’s assertion that he could not find sufficient evidence in the record to prove compliance with 3-15-313 was insufficient. St. v. Fehringer, 2013 MT 10, 368 Mont. 226, 293 P.3d 853.

Impartial Jury — No Change of Venue: Notwithstanding the pretrial publicity and the judge’s comment that transfer of the case would cause expense to the county, if each juror seated could render an impartial verdict based upon the evidence, there was no error in not transferring the case. St. v. Buckley, 171 M 238, 557 P2d 283 (1976).

How Challenges Taken — Waiver: When the State waived its fourth peremptory challenge and the defendant exhausted his peremptory challenges, it was not error, on the panel’s being filled and passed for cause, to permit the State to peremptorily challenge a juror who was in the box when the State waived its fourth challenge; the State’s waiver of its fourth challenge was not a waiver of any subsequent challenge to which it was entitled. St. v. Peel, 23 M 358, 59 P 169 (1899).

Case Notes

Person Pleading Guilty in Justice's Court Not Entitled to Appeal to District Court for Trial De Novo: Fyant pleaded guilty in Justice's Court to failure to provide proof of insurance and received a suspended sentence and a $350 fine with the understanding that all or part of the fine would be suspended upon a finding by the court of an inability to pay on the part of Fyant. Fyant offered proof of the inability to pay, but the Justice's Court made no finding regarding her ability to pay and refused to suspend the fines. Fyant filed an appeal with the District Court on the grounds that the sentence was illegal. The Supreme Court held that according to this section, a person who pleads guilty in Justice's Court waives the right of trial de novo and that Fyant failed to take advantage of the other methods of postconviction relief available to her. St. v. Fyant, 2004 MT 298, 323 M 408, 104 P3d 434 (2004).

Contrary Instructions Regarding Appeal Process From Justice's Court — Appeal to District Court Considered Petition for Postconviction Relief: Boucher pleaded guilty to DUI in Justice's Court, signing a form stating that the plea was voluntary and constituted waiver of the right to appeal to District Court. Despite the waiver, the written judgment stated that Boucher could appeal to the District Court within 10 days. Boucher subsequently learned that his driving privileges would be revoked in Washington as a result of the guilty plea, so he moved to withdraw the guilty plea following conviction. The motion was denied, and Boucher appealed to District Court, but that court held that the guilty plea was voluntary and dismissed the appeal for lack of subject matter jurisdiction because under this section, entry of a guilty plea in Justice's Court waives a defendant's right to a trial de novo in District Court. Further, 46-17-311 procedurally requires adjudication of a matter by trial in a Justice's Court or City Court as a prerequisite to an appeal in District Court. Boucher then appealed to the Supreme Court, which exercised subject matter jurisdiction by considering Boucher's appeal to District Court as a petition for postconviction relief. Under 46-21-101, a defendant who asserts the illegality of a sentence and has exhausted all appeal remedies provided by law may petition for postconviction relief with the District Court in the county where the court of limited jurisdiction is located. A petition for postconviction relief is not another form of appeal from a criminal case, but a separate civil proceeding aimed at vacating, setting aside, or correcting a sentence, and is available to a defendant whose sentence is imposed by a court of limited jurisdiction. Here, the District Court correctly determined that Boucher had no right to appeal the Justice's Court's denial of the motion to withdraw the guilty plea. However, given the contrary instructions concerning the appeals process issued by the Justice of the Peace, the fact that the Justice's Court is not a court of record, and the nature of Boucher's constitutional challenge to the validity of his plea, the District Court held an evidentiary hearing to establish a factual basis for ruling on the issues, and those proceedings constituted the functional equivalent of a postconviction hearing. Boucher was eligible to pursue postconviction relief given the absence of an appellate remedy and the constitutional claims asserted, and the District Court erred in finding that it had a lack of subject matter jurisdiction. (See 2003 amendment.) St. v. Boucher, 2002 MT 114, 309 M 514, 48 P3d 21 (2002), following St. v. Christensen, 265 M 374, 877 P2d 468 (1994), and St. v. Liefert, 2002 MT 48, 309 M 19, 43 P3d 329 (2002).

Question of Adequacy of Advisement Regarding Waiver of Appeal Rights Resolved in Favor of Defendant: The first factor in determining whether good cause existed in allowing the withdrawal of a guilty plea and whether a court abused its discretion in denying a motion to withdraw the guilty plea, as set out in St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997), is the adequacy of the court's interrogation at the time that the plea was entered regarding the defendant's understanding of the consequences of the plea. The plea must be a voluntary, knowing, and intelligent choice among the alternative courses of action open to the defendant. In the present case, Boucher was charged with DUI, and at his initial appearance, the Justice's Court had Boucher acknowledge in writing that he understood the waivers that he would make if he pleaded guilty. Boucher pleaded not guilty and waived no rights. Five months later, the state amended the complaint, and Boucher changed his plea to guilty, but at the time that the plea was entered, the Justice's Court did not reiterate the information provided at the initial appearance and failed to question Boucher regarding his understanding of the waiver of his constitutional rights. The Supreme Court concluded that the court's colloquy was inadequate and that good cause existed to permit Boucher to withdraw his guilty plea. Any doubt about the voluntariness of Boucher's plea was resolved in his favor, and the Supreme Court remanded to Justice's Court for further proceedings. (See 2003 amendment.) St. v. Boucher, 2002 MT 114, 309 M 514, 48 P3d 21 (2002).

Appeal to District Court Allowed Only After Trial in Lower Court, Not After Forfeiture of Bond — Exclusive Statutory Remedy for Appeals From Courts of Limited Jurisdiction: Kempin was charged in Justice's Court with seven fish and game violations but failed to appear for trial, so the appearance bonds that Kempin had posted were forfeited and Kempin's hunting, fishing, and trapping privileges were suspended for 10 years. Kempin appealed to the District Court within 10 days of the Justice's Court judgment, but the appeal was dismissed for lack of jurisdiction and because Kempin had no statutory right to appeal the forfeitures as a matter of law, so Kempin appealed to the Supreme Court. Under Art. VII, sec. 4, Mont. Const., District Courts must hear appeals from inferior courts as trials de novo unless otherwise provided by law, and appeal of a criminal conviction from a court of limited jurisdiction is governed exclusively by 46-17-311, which provides three circumstances under which a criminal defendant may appeal to District Court for a trial de novo: (1) when a defendant pleads guilty or nolo contendere but preserves legal issues raised by pretrial motion for appeal; (2) when a defendant files written notice of intention to appeal within 10 days after a judgment is rendered following a trial; and (3) when a defendant appeals revocation of a suspended sentence. Here, Kempin claimed that denial of a District Court trial by jury following forfeiture in Justice's Court violated his due process rights. However, Kempin raised no appealable pretrial issues, nor was the case an appeal of a suspended sentence, so the first and third circumstances did not apply. Kempin did appeal the judgment within 10 days, but there was no trial, so Kempin was not constitutionally entitled to a trial de novo when there had been no trial initially, nor is 46-17-311 unconstitutionally vague for not explicitly proscribing an appeal following a forfeiture. The Supreme Court agreed with the District Court's explanation in declining jurisdiction—that if a defendant was automatically entitled to a trial de novo on appeal without first having a trial in Justice's Court, a defendant could avoid Justice's Court altogether by not appearing and forfeiting the Justice's Court bonds and then pursuing a trial in District Court, which would render the Justice's Court system meaningless. Kempin's other due process arguments were also not compelling because Kempin waived his trial rights by failing to appear in Justice's Court to assert any constitutional rights and in light of his stated intention to forfeit the bonds and the advance notice of the suspension of the hunting, fishing, and trapping privileges. Absent any statutory basis for an appeal, dismissal of the appeal by the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Kempin, 2001 MT 313, 308 M 17, 38 P3d 859 (2001). See also St. v. Feight, 2001 MT 205, 306 M 312, 33 P3d 623 (2001), and St. v. Schulke, 2005 MT 77, 326 M 390, 109 P3d 744 (2005).

No Authority to Appeal Justice's Court Order Denying Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea: The Feights got into a fight with a highway patrol officer at a high school basketball game and were charged with misdemeanor assault. They were informed of their rights in Justice's Court, waived their right to counsel, and pleaded guilty. More than a month later, they moved through counsel to withdraw their guilty pleas, claiming good cause under 46-16-105. The Justice's Court denied the motion, holding that the Feights had been given due process and had voluntarily, knowingly, and willingly entered guilty pleas. The Feights appealed the denial of their motion to withdraw their guilty pleas to District Court. The state moved to dismiss the appeal, contending that the District Court lacked jurisdiction to review denial of the motion to withdraw a plea. The District Court dismissed the appeal but remanded to Justice's Court with a recommendation that the Feights be allowed to withdraw their pleas. Instead, the Justice's Court reinstated judgment, and the Feights appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court affirmed. The statutes that provide for and determine the jurisdiction of a District Court to entertain an appeal from a Justice's Court include 3-5-303, 46-12-204, 46-17-311, and this section. However, none of these statutes provide authority for appeal to the District Court from the denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea. Further, the specific language of these sections prevails over the general language in 46-20-104 defining the scope of appeal by a criminal defendant. The Legislature has not created a statutory right of appeal from a Justice's Court denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea, and the Supreme Court refrained from creating one. St. v. Feight, 2001 MT 205, 306 M 312, 33 P3d 623 (2001), distinguishing St. v. Rogers, 267 M 190, 883 P2d 115 (1994), and followed in St. v. Fox, 2001 MT 209, 306 M 353, 34 P3d 484 (2001).

Procedure After Trial — Justices' and City Courts

Part Case Notes

Justice's Court — Authority to Grant New Trial: A Justice's Court is not a "court" for the purposes of 46-16-701, and a Justice of the Peace may not dismiss charges against a defendant upon a motion for a new trial. Forsythe v. Wenholz, 170 M 496, 554 P2d 1333 (1976).

2009 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

Chapter 335 in (4) near end of first sentence increased from $25 to $75 the dollar rate at which fines are satisfied based on each day of imprisonment; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2009.

Style changes were slightly different in the chapters. In each case, the codifier chose appropriate text.

1989 Amendment: In (4), near end of first sentence, increased rate at which fine is paid off by imprisonment to $25 from $10 per day; and made minor changes in phraseology.

Case Notes

Fine With or Without Imprisonment: The Legislature recognized a distinction between a judgment for a fine and one for a fine with imprisonment until the fine is paid. State ex rel. Hodgdon v. District Court, 33 M 119, 82 P 663 (1905).

Imprisonment for Full Period — Judgment Discharged: When a defendant was imprisoned under a predecessor section for the full period prescribed in a judgment rendered in a Justice's Court, such imprisonment operated ipso facto to satisfy and discharge the judgment. Petelin v. Kennedy, 29 M 466, 75 P 82 (1904).

Attorney General's Opinions

Indigents Unable to Pay Fines: A person who has been sentenced to a term of imprisonment and has also been fined cannot be imprisoned beyond the maximum term of imprisonment set by statute for the crime in question if he is indigent and financially unable to pay the fine at the time of sentencing. When an offense is punishable by fine only, a court cannot initially imprison an indigent because he is financially unable to pay the fine. If an indigent is unable to pay a fine it would not be unreasonable to require him to pay on a predetermined installment basis. 34 A.G. Op. 17 (1971).

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 149, L. 1997, provided: “WHEREAS, in State v. Rogers, 267 Mont. 190 (1994), the Montana Supreme Court held that an appeal de novo was available for a Justice’s Court revocation of a suspended sentence and also held that a jury trial was not available.”

1993 Amendment: Chapter 262 in first sentence of (1), after “justice’s”, deleted “municipal” and inserted second sentence regarding appeal from Municipal Court to District Court.

1991 Amendment: In (1), at beginning, substituted “for cases in which legal issues are preserved for appeal pursuant to 46-12-204” for “as provided in 46-17-203”, after “justice’s” inserted “municipal”, and at end substituted “for other criminal cases” for “a trial jury in a civil action, except that the total number of jurors drawn shall be at least six plus the total number of peremptory challenges”; in (2), at beginning of first sentence, substituted “The defendant” for “A party”, substituted “filing” for “giving”, and after “judgment” deleted “except that the state” and inserted “is rendered following trial” and inserted second sentence concerning notice of appeal by prosecution; in (3), after “days”, inserted “of filing the notice of appeal, the court shall transfer”, after “record of the” substituted “court of limited jurisdiction to the district court” for “justice’s or city court proceedings must be transferred to the district court or the appeal must be dismissed”, and deleted last sentence that read: “It is the duty of the appellant to perfect the appeal”; and made minor changes in style.

Coordination Instruction — Amendment Void: Section 2, Ch. 470, L. 1991, provided: “If Senate Bill No. 51 is passed and approved and if Senate Bill No. 51 contains a section amending 46-17-311, then [this act] is void.” Senate Bill No. 51 was approved May 23, 1991, as Ch. 800, L. 1991, and included an amendment to 46-17-311. Therefore, the amendment to 46-17-311 contained in sec. 1, Ch. 470, L. 1991, is void.

1985 Amendment: In (2) at beginning substituted “A party” for “The defendant” and at end inserted “except that the state may only appeal in the cases provided for in 46-20-103”; and near end of (3) substituted “appellant” for “defendant”.

Case Notes

State Appeal of DUI Charge Dismissed Orally Prior to Written Order Not Premature: A Justice Court dismissed the charges against the defendant, who was charged with DUI. The state appealed the decision to the District Court before the Justice Court had issued a written order dismissing the charges. The defendant filed a motion to dismiss, arguing that the state’s appeal was premature because a written order had not yet been issued by the Justice Court. After the District Court denied the defendant’s motion to dismiss, a jury convicted him of the charge. On appeal, the defendant claimed that the District Court had erred in denying his motion to dismiss. The Supreme Court disagreed, ruling that the appeal was not premature, having been filed after the Justice Court had orally dismissed the charges. St. v. Reger, 2018 MT 133, 391 Mont. 400, 419 P.3d 670.

No Good Cause for Failure to Appear at Hearing — Appeal Properly Dismissed: The defendant was convicted of misdemeanor counts following a trial in absentia. She appealed to the District Court but failed to appear at a hearing as ordered by the District Court. The District Court dismissed her appeal based on her failure to appear. She appealed the dismissal, but the Supreme Court concluded that she had not shown good cause to prevent the dismissal of her case based on her deliberate choice not to attend the hearing. St. v. Ziolkowski, 2014 MT 58, 374 Mont. 162, 321 P.3d 816.

Appeal on the Record From Justice's Court — No Right to Substitute District Judge: The defendant filed a notice of appeal of her guilty plea in Justice's Court. She then filed a motion to substitute the District Court judge before whom her appeal would be heard. The District Court denied the motion to substitute as untimely. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that 3-1-804 does not grant a defendant the right to substitute a District Court judge on an appeal from a Justice's Court of record. D.H. v. Fourth Judicial District Court, 2012 MT 106, 365 Mont. 82, 278 P.3d 1010.

Trial De Novo Rather Than Hearing Appropriate Absent Evidence of Prosecutor Conduct Warranting Mistrial: On an appeal from City Court on a DUI conviction, Whittinghill contended that the District Court should have held an evidentiary hearing on whether the prosecutor goaded Whittinghill into moving for a mistrial. However, Whittinghill did not present any cogent argument or statement of available evidence indicating that the situation was a product of prosecutor misconduct and only speculated about why the prosecution's only witness gave offending testimony. Absent a showing that the prosecutor did anything to goad the defense into moving for a mistrial, the District Court properly denied an evidentiary hearing and granted a trial de novo. Helena v. Whittinghill, 2009 MT 343, 353 M 131, 219 P3d 1244 (2009).

Date Defendant Sentenced In Absentia Considered Date of Legally Effective Sentence for Appeal Purposes: Clark was charged with a misdemeanor traffic violation but failed to appear for trial and was tried, convicted, and sentenced by the Municipal Court in absentia pursuant to 46-16-123 on June 12, 2006. A warrant was issued for failure to appear, and Clark appeared before a different Municipal Court on July 14, 2006, and was informed of the June sentence. Clark sought to appeal to District Court, but the District Court dismissed the appeal on grounds that it was untimely. On appeal to the Supreme Court, Clark argued that dismissal of the appeal by the District Court was in error because the period for filing a Municipal Court appeal should have begun on July 14 when he was informed of the June sentence, rather than June 12 when the sentence was actually imposed. The Supreme Court disagreed. A valid sentence was imposed on June 12 and was not subject to postponement or modification until Clark appeared on the bench warrant. By Municipal Court Rule, Clark had until June 26 to file an appeal, but the appeal was not filed until July 28 and was therefore untimely and was properly dismissed by the District Court. St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 317, 346 M 80, 193 P3d 934 (2008). See also St. v. Bonamarte, 2006 MT 291, 334 M 376, 147 P3d 220 (2006).

Improper Denial of State's Right to Appeal Justice's Court Suppression Motion: A Justice's Court granted Willis's motion to suppress that precluded the state from presenting statements made by Willis on the day of an accident on grounds that the state had unlawfully obtained the statements in violation of constitutional guarantees against self-incrimination. The state appealed the Justice's Court's ruling to the District Court, and the District Court granted Willis's motion to dismiss on grounds that the District Court lacked jurisdiction. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. Regardless of whether the Justice's Court order suppressed evidence or a confession or admission, the state had a statutory right under 46-20-103 to appeal the Justice's Court's ruling. Trial de novo in District Court was the proper proceeding for the state's appeal pursuant to St. v. Yarns, 252 M 45, 826 P2d 543, 49 St. Rep. 132 (1992), and St. v. Kesler, 228 M 242, 741 P2d 791, 44 St. Rep. 1490 (1987). St. v. Willis, 2008 MT 293, 345 M 402, 192 P3d 691 (2008). See also St. v. Strizich, 286 M 1, 952 P2d 1365, 54 St. Rep. 1241 (1997).

Interim Appeal, Rather Than Trial De Novo, Appropriate for Consideration of Double Jeopardy Challenge: Barron appealed a Justice's Court decision to the District Court for trial de novo, then moved to dismiss the case on double jeopardy grounds. The motion was denied, and Barron appealed to the Supreme Court. Normally, the Supreme Court will not consider appeals from District Court unless a final judgment of conviction has been rendered. However, as set out in Three Forks v. Schillinger, 2007 MT 331, 340 M 211, 173 P3d 681 (2007), there is no trial de novo if a second trial in District Court would violate the provision against double jeopardy. Thus, notwithstanding the fact that the District Court had not rendered final judgment, the Supreme Court accepted Barron's interim appeal to consider the merits of the double jeopardy claim. St. v. Barron, 2008 MT 69, 342 M 100, 179 P3d 519 (2008).

Appeal of City Court Ruling — Trial De Novo in District Court Proper Remedy: Defendant was charged in Three Forks City Court with four counts of endangering the welfare of a minor. The City Court determined that a fair trial could not be had in Three Forks and, upon motion by the city for a change of venue, ordered the case and jurisdiction transferred to Madison County. A Madison County Justice's Court jury convicted defendant of one count and acquitted on three counts. Defendant appealed to Gallatin County District Court, requesting that the case be dismissed because the Three Forks City Court improperly granted the change of venue. The District Court denied the motion to dismiss, but concluded that the change of venue was an abuse of discretion and remanded to the Three Forks City Court for a new trial. The city appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. The general rule is that, with few exceptions, District Courts must try appeals from Justices' Courts and City Courts de novo, rather than acting as courts of review (see 2011 amendment). In this case, none of the statutory or case law exceptions to the general rule applied, so the District Court was limited to the remedy of conducting a de novo trial as required by this section, regardless whether the City Court's change of venue was erroneous. A trial de novo in District Court also cured any prejudice that might have been suffered by defendant occasioned by the change of venue. The case was remanded for a trial de novo in Gallatin County District Court. Three Forks v. Schillinger, 2007 MT 331, 340 M 211, 173 P3d 681 (2007), distinguishing Woirhaye v. District Court, 1998 MT 320, 292 M 185, 972 P2d 800 (1998), and St. v. Rensvold, 2006 MT 146, 332 M 392, 139 P3d 154 (2006).

Counsel Present but Defendant Not in Attendance for District Court Appeal in Misdemeanor Case — No Authority of District Court to Dismiss Appeal When Defendant Not Required to Be Present: Clark appealed a Justice's Court judgment for issuing a bad check, and the District Court set a trial de novo. On the day of trial, Clark's counsel was present, but Clark did not appear in person. Because Clark was not present, the District Court dismissed the appeal pursuant to this section and reinstated the Justice's Court judgment. Clark appealed to the Supreme Court, which reversed and remanded. Under 46-16-120, a defendant may appear by counsel only in all misdemeanor cases unless the court requires the defendant's personal appearance. Because Clark's counsel was present and ready to proceed and because the District Court did not require Clark's personal presence, the District Court did not have authority to dismiss the appeal and should have proceeded with the trial pursuant to 46-16-122. St. v. Clark, 2006 MT 313, 335 M 39, 149 P3d 551 (2006).

Concurrent Justice's Court and District Court Jurisdiction Over Misdemeanor Family Assault No Right to Trial De Novo From Court of Record: Brockway was charged with two misdemeanor and two felony counts of family member assault. Brockway moved to sever the misdemeanor counts and have them tried first in Justice's Court so that he would have the opportunity to appeal to District Court. The District Court concluded that it lacked jurisdiction to try the misdemeanor charges, so the misdemeanor charges were severed and remanded for trial in Justice's Court. The state appealed. The Supreme Court held that the District Court's conclusion that it did not have jurisdiction to try the misdemeanors was erroneous. Under 3-10-303, District Courts have concurrent jurisdiction with Justices' Courts over misdemeanor charges of partner or family member assault. Additionally, under this section, there is no right to a trial de novo from District Court or from a Justice's Court that is a court of record, so Brockway was entitled to one jury trial in a court of record—in this case, the District Court—and if convicted, Brockway could then appeal to the Supreme Court. The case was remanded for trial in District Court on all charges. St. v. Brockway, 2005 MT 179, 328 M 5, 116 P3d 788 (2005).

Failure to Provide Notice That Arresting Officer Would Appear as Witness — No Error: At Boettiger's DUI bench trial in Justice's Court, the arresting officer testified regarding Boettiger's actions on the day in question. Boettiger was convicted and appealed to District Court, but the state did not provide Boettiger with written notice that the officer would again be a witness. Nevertheless, the District Court allowed the officer to testify over Boettiger's objection, and Boettiger's counsel subjected the officer to extensive cross-examination. Boettiger was again convicted and on appeal alleged error in the state's failure to list the officer as a potential witness. The Supreme Court did not condone the failure to provide notice but found that Boettiger knew that the officer would testify again and failed to demonstrate prejudice as a result of the officer's testimony. The Supreme Court disregarded the irregularity because it did not affect Boettiger's substantive rights, and the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Boettiger, 2004 MT 313, 324 M 20, 101 P3d 285 (2004), following St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307 (1997).

Contrary Instructions Regarding Appeal Process From Justice's Court — Appeal to District Court Considered Petition for Postconviction Relief: Boucher pleaded guilty to DUI in Justice's Court, signing a form stating that the plea was voluntary and constituted waiver of the right to appeal to District Court. Despite the waiver, the written judgment stated that Boucher could appeal to the District Court within 10 days. Boucher subsequently learned that his driving privileges would be revoked in Washington as a result of the guilty plea, so he moved to withdraw the guilty plea following conviction. The motion was denied, and Boucher appealed to District Court, but that court held that the guilty plea was voluntary and dismissed the appeal for lack of subject matter jurisdiction because under 46-17-203, entry of a guilty plea in Justice's Court waives a defendant's right to a trial de novo in District Court. Further, this section procedurally requires adjudication of a matter by trial in a Justice's Court or City Court as a prerequisite to an appeal in District Court. Boucher then appealed to the Supreme Court, which exercised subject matter jurisdiction by considering Boucher's appeal to District Court as a petition for postconviction relief. Under 46-21-101, a defendant who asserts the illegality of a sentence and has exhausted all appeal remedies provided by law may petition for postconviction relief with the District Court in the county where the court of limited jurisdiction is located. A petition for postconviction relief is not another form of appeal from a criminal case, but a separate civil proceeding aimed at vacating, setting aside, or correcting a sentence, and is available to a defendant whose sentence is imposed by a court of limited jurisdiction. Here, the District Court correctly determined that Boucher had no right to appeal the Justice's Court's denial of the motion to withdraw the guilty plea. However, given the contrary instructions concerning the appeals process issued by the Justice of the Peace, the fact that the Justice's Court is not a court of record, and the nature of Boucher's constitutional challenge to the validity of his plea, the District Court held an evidentiary hearing to establish a factual basis for ruling on the issues, and those proceedings constituted the functional equivalent of a postconviction hearing. Boucher was eligible to pursue postconviction relief given the absence of an appellate remedy and the constitutional claims asserted, and the District Court erred in finding that it had a lack of subject matter jurisdiction. (See 2003 amendment.) St. v. Boucher, 2002 MT 114, 309 M 514, 48 P3d 21 (2002), following St. v. Christensen, 265 M 374, 877 P2d 468 (1994), and St. v. Liefert, 2002 MT 48, 309 M 19, 43 P3d 329 (2002).

Appeal to District Court Allowed Only After Trial in Lower Court, Not After Forfeiture of Bond — Exclusive Statutory Remedy for Appeals From Courts of Limited Jurisdiction: Kempin was charged in Justice's Court with seven fish and game violations but failed to appear for trial, so the appearance bonds that Kempin had posted were forfeited and Kempin's hunting, fishing, and trapping privileges were suspended for 10 years. Kempin appealed to the District Court within 10 days of the Justice's Court judgment, but the appeal was dismissed for lack of jurisdiction and because Kempin had no statutory right to appeal the forfeitures as a matter of law, so Kempin appealed to the Supreme Court. Under Art. VII, sec. 4, Mont. Const., District Courts must hear appeals from inferior courts as trials de novo unless otherwise provided by law, and appeal of a criminal conviction from a court of limited jurisdiction is governed exclusively by this section, which provides three circumstances under which a criminal defendant may appeal to District Court for a trial de novo: (1) when a defendant pleads guilty or nolo contendere but preserves legal issues raised by pretrial motion for appeal; (2) when a defendant files written notice of intention to appeal within 10 days after a judgment is rendered following a trial; and (3) when a defendant appeals revocation of a suspended sentence. Here, Kempin claimed that denial of a District Court trial by jury following forfeiture in Justice's Court violated his due process rights. However, Kempin raised no appealable pretrial issues, nor was the case an appeal of a suspended sentence, so the first and third circumstances did not apply. Kempin did appeal the judgment within 10 days, but there was no trial, so Kempin was not constitutionally entitled to a trial de novo when there had been no trial initially, nor is this section unconstitutionally vague for not explicitly proscribing an appeal following a forfeiture. The Supreme Court agreed with the District Court's explanation in declining jurisdiction—that if a defendant was automatically entitled to a trial de novo on appeal without first having a trial in Justice's Court, a defendant could avoid Justice's Court altogether by not appearing and forfeiting the Justice's Court bonds and then pursuing a trial in District Court, which would render the Justice's Court system meaningless. Kempin's other due process arguments were also not compelling because Kempin waived his trial rights by failing to appear in Justice's Court to assert any constitutional rights and in light of his stated intention to forfeit the bonds and the advance notice of the suspension of the hunting, fishing, and trapping privileges. Absent any statutory basis for an appeal, dismissal of the appeal by the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Kempin, 2001 MT 313, 308 M 17, 38 P3d 859 (2001). See also St. v. Feight, 2001 MT 205, 306 M 312, 33 P3d 623 (2001), and St. v. Schulke, 2005 MT 77, 326 M 390, 109 P3d 744 (2005).

No District Court Error in Failing to Hold Trial De Novo in Municipal Court Appeal: Campbell was charged in Missoula Municipal Court with criminal trespass, disorderly conduct, and obstructing a police officer. Campbell failed to appear for trial and was tried in absentia and convicted on all charges. Campbell appealed to District Court, was notified of the appropriate Municipal Court appeal procedure in 3-6-110, and was given 10 days to file a brief. Campbell failed to file a brief, so the District Court dismissed the appeal and remanded to Municipal Court for further proceedings. Campbell appealed to the Supreme Court on grounds that the District Court should have conducted a trial de novo pursuant to this section. The Supreme Court disagreed. Campbell's appeal was from a Municipal Court and thus was governed by 3-6-110, rather than this section, so the appeal was confined to review of the record and questions of law. The District Court did not err in failing to conduct a trial de novo, and dismissal of Campbell's appeal for failure to file a brief was affirmed. Missoula v. Campbell, 2001 MT 271, 307 M 286, 37 P3d 670 (2001).

No Authority to Appeal Justice's Court Order Denying Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea: The Feights got into a fight with a highway patrol officer at a high school basketball game and were charged with misdemeanor assault. They were informed of their rights in Justice's Court, waived their right to counsel, and pleaded guilty. More than a month later, they moved through counsel to withdraw their guilty pleas, claiming good cause under 46-16-105. The Justice's Court denied the motion, holding that the Feights had been given due process and had voluntarily, knowingly, and willingly entered guilty pleas. The Feights appealed the denial of their motion to withdraw their guilty pleas to District Court. The state moved to dismiss the appeal, contending that the District Court lacked jurisdiction to review denial of the motion to withdraw a plea. The District Court dismissed the appeal but remanded to Justice's Court with a recommendation that the Feights be allowed to withdraw their pleas. Instead, the Justice's Court reinstated judgment, and the Feights appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court affirmed. The statutes that provide for and determine the jurisdiction of a District Court to entertain an appeal from a Justice's Court include 3-5-303, 46-12-204, 46-17-203, and this section. However, none of these statutes provide authority for appeal to the District Court from the denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea. Further, the specific language of these sections prevails over the general language in 46-20-104 defining the scope of appeal by a criminal defendant. The Legislature has not created a statutory right of appeal from a Justice's Court denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea, and the Supreme Court refrained from creating one. St. v. Feight, 2001 MT 205, 306 M 312, 33 P3d 623 (2001), distinguishing St. v. Rogers, 267 M 190, 883 P2d 115 (1994), and followed in St. v. Fox, 2001 MT 209, 306 M 353, 34 P3d 484 (2001).

Improper Reliance by District Court on Justice's Court Proceeding Constituting Denial of Right to Trial De Novo — Reversal Warranted: Stedman was convicted in Justice's Court of criminal mischief and appealed to District Court for a trial de novo. During the District Court trial, the judge referenced the Justice's Court proceedings in several instances, which strongly suggested that the judge was unduly influenced by the Justice's Court proceedings, denying Stedman of the constitutional and statutory right to a trial de novo. The Supreme Court remanded for a trial de novo. St. v. Stedman, 2001 MT 150, 306 M 65, 30 P3d 353 (2001), distinguished in McDunn v. Arnold, 2013 MT 138, 370 Mont. 270, 303 P.3d 1279.

Purpose of Act — Declaratory Judgment Properly Used to Test Constitutionality of Criminal Jurisdictional Statute — Previous Opinion Applied by Remand: Defendants in criminal proceedings in several different Justices' Courts filed actions under the Uniform Declaratory Judgments Act (UDJA) to have declared unconstitutional statutes requiring a criminal defendant in a Justice's Court proceeding to choose between a jury trial in Justice's Court or in District Court. Several civil actions requesting the same relief under the UDJA were consolidated for the purposes of appeal. The state argued that the UDJA was not intended to be used for this purpose and that the various criminal defendants could obtain the same relief by raising the unconstitutionality of the underlying statute as a defense in their individual criminal prosecutions. The Supreme Court noted that acceptance of the state's position would require each criminal defendant to litigate the constitutionality of the pertinent sections of law both in the District Courts and in the Montana Supreme Court. Citing Goff v. St., 141 M 605, 374 P2d 862 (1962), St. v. Wilson, 160 M 473, 503 P2d 522 (1972), and Gryczan v. St., 283 M 433, 942 P2d 112 (1997), and noting that the issue of the constitutionality of the pertinent statutes could be raised, but not finally decided, in the District Courts, the Supreme Court held that it was proper to use the UDJA to determine the constitutionality of the statutes requiring the election of a jury trial in one court and not both courts. On this substantive issue, the Supreme Court cited its recent decision in Woirhaye v. District Court, 1998 MT 320, 292 M 185, 972 P2d 800, 55 St. Rep. 1298 (1998), holding that the statute requiring the election was unconstitutional, and remanded the cases to the District Courts with directions to enter declaratory judgments in favor of the plaintiffs and appellants. McGillivray v. St., 1999 MT 3, 293 M 19, 972 P2d 804, 56 St. Rep. 11 (1999).

Limitation to One Jury Trial Held Unconstitutional: In 1997, the Legislature enacted the provisions codified at 46-7-102(1)(g), 46-17-201(3), and former subsection (1) of this section, providing that a person tried for a misdemeanor in Justice's or City Court who appeals to the District Court has the right to only one jury trial. Woirhaye was charged with misdemeanor DUI and requested a jury trial in Missoula County Justice's Court. Upon his conviction by the Justice's Court jury, Woirhaye appealed to the District Court for a trial de novo pursuant to Art. VII, sec. 4(2), Mont. Const., and this section. Woirhaye asked that the District Court declare 46-17-201(3) unconstitutional, but the District Court denied his motion. Woirhaye then petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control, which was granted on the grounds that Woirhaye would otherwise be denied a fundamental right. The Supreme Court held that Woirhaye's right to a jury trial in both the Justice's Court or City Court and the District Court was a fundamental right guaranteed by Art. II, sec. 24 and 26, Mont. Const. The Supreme Court pointed out that the right to a jury trial is guaranteed by Art. III, sec. 2, clause 3, of the U.S. Constitution and the sixth amendment to the U.S. Constitution and also that even if that were not the case, Montana may, under the rationale of St. v. Bullock, 272 M 361, 901 P2d 61 (1995), provide rights in excess of those guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution. The Supreme Court noted, in response to the state's argument that Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., guarantees "a" jury trial, that the state's argument was not persuasive against the language of Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const. The Supreme Court also distinguished Ludwig v. Mass., 427 US 618 (1976), holding that Art. VII, sec. 4(2), Mont. Const., was not implicated in the case, and stated that any language in N. Cent. Serv., Inc. v. Hafdahl, 191 M 440, 625 P2d 56 (1981), indicating that a requirement for a jury trial applicable to Small Claims Court was satisfied if the right was granted at the District Court level, was dicta and could not be relied upon to support the state's case that only one jury trial was required. Consequently, the Supreme Court held 46-7-102(1)(g), 46-17-201(3), and former subsection (1) of this section to be unconstitutional as violating Woirhaye's right to a jury trial. (See 1999 amendment.) Woirhaye v. District Court, 1998 MT 320, 292 M 185, 972 P2d 800, 55 St. Rep. 1298 (1998), followed in McGillivray v. St., 1999 MT 3, 293 M 19, 972 P2d 804, 56 St. Rep. 11 (1999), and Balyeat Law, P.C. v. Harrison, 1999 MT 144, 295 M 13, 983 P2d 902, 56 St. Rep. 566 (1999), and followed and clarified in St. v. Rensvold, 2006 MT 146, 332 M 392, 139 P3d 154 (2006).

Trial De Novo — Exclusive District Court Remedy for Alleged Denial of Jury Trial in City Court — No Right to District Court Review: The exclusive remedy of defendant convicted of traffic violations in City Court, who claimed that he was forced into a bench trial in City Court and denied the exercise of his right to a jury trial, was a trial de novo in the District Court. The District Court could not sit as a court of review (see 2011 amendment). Therefore, the District Court properly denied his motion to dismiss for failure to allow a jury trial in City Court. St. v. McKee, 1998 MT 110, 288 M 454, 958 P2d 700, 55 St. Rep. 433 (1998).

Payment of Justice's Court Cost Imposed as Judgment of District Court Held Improper — Smith Reaffirmed: Morales was charged with assaulting a sports official, in violation of 45-5-211, after striking a basketball referee. Upon his conviction in Justice's Court, Morales appealed to District Court. Upon his conviction, the District Court ordered Morales to pay the costs of the trial in Justice's Court. The Supreme Court reaffirmed its holding in Billings v. Smith, 281 M 133, 932 P2d 1058 (1997), and held that a trial de novo in District Court has the effect of erasing any debt for costs in Justice's Court incurred before the appeal to District Court. St. v. Morales, 284 M 238, 943 P2d 1286, 54 St. Rep. 862 (1997), followed in St. v. Bustle, 2010 MT 68, 355 Mont. 487, 228 P.3d 1150.

Appeal From Justice's Court to District Court — Failure to Include Citation of Authority for Lack of Jurisdiction — Jurisdictional Argument Not Addressed on Appeal: Sol appealed his DUI conviction in Justice's Court to the District Court. In the Supreme Court, Sol argued that the failure of the Justice's Court Clerk to timely transmit the file to the District Court within the time provided by this section deprived the District Court of jurisdiction. The Supreme Court noted that Sol had failed to cite any authority, as required by former Rule 23, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), for his assertion that the clerk's failure deprived the District Court of jurisdiction. For this reason, the Supreme Court declined to address the issue of the District Court's jurisdiction. St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307, 54 St. Rep. 246 (1997).

Failure of Justice's Court Clerk to Timely Transmit Case File to District Court — No Speedy Trial Violation: Sol appealed his DUI conviction in the Justice's Court to the District Court. The Justice's Court Clerk failed to transmit the case file within the time provided by this section. The District Court Clerk scheduled the trial 110 days after Sol filed his notice of appeal from Justice's Court. Sol argued that the clerk's failure caused a violation of his right to a speedy trial. The Supreme Court noted that the 1-day delay in transmittal of the file probably resulted in the District Court Clerk's scheduling the trial 1 day later, in 110 days rather than in 109 days. Because a delay must be presumptively prejudicial before other speedy trial factors will be analyzed and because a delay of less than 6 months is not presumptively prejudicial, the Supreme Court held that it would not apply the other speedy trial criteria and held that Sol's right to a speedy trial had not been violated. St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307, 54 St. Rep. 246 (1997).

Justice's Court Clerk Delay Not Attributable to Prosecution: After Sol appealed his DUI conviction in Justice's Court to the District Court, the Justice's Court Clerk failed to transmit the case file to the District Court within the 30-day time limit required by this section. Sol argued that the requirements of the statute should be strictly construed against the state. The Supreme Court held that the duty to transmit the file was only the duty of the clerk and neither Sol nor the prosecution was responsible for the transmittal. Citing the reasoning in St. v. Dubray, 201 M 327, 654 P2d 970 (1982), the Supreme Court refused to attribute to the prosecution the Justice's Court Clerk's failure to strictly comply with the statute. St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307, 54 St. Rep. 246 (1997).

Objection to Dismissal Not Prerequisite to State's Right to Appeal Dismissal: The state did not have to object in Justice's Court to the defendant's motion to dismiss in order to preserve the state's right to appeal the grant of the motion to the District Court. St. v. Romero, 279 M 58, 926 P2d 717, 53 St. Rep. 1050 (1996).

Appeal of Misdemeanor Conviction From Justice's Court to District Court — No Record of Oral Pronouncement of Sentence in Justice's Court — District Court Jurisdiction Upheld: Tweedy was convicted by a Justice's Court jury of misdemeanor assault and was scheduled for sentencing on April 18, 1989. On April 19, Tweedy filed a notice of appeal to the District Court. The Justice's Court filed its sentencing order on May 3. Later, in response to a motion by Tweedy to dismiss the underlying charge, the state contended that the District Court had not acquired jurisdiction over Tweedy. The Supreme Court held that since there was no evidence in the record that the sentencing hearing scheduled for April 18 did not, in fact, take place and since, under St. v. Mortenson, 175 M 403, 574 P2d 581 (1978), appeal may be taken within 10 days after sentence is orally pronounced in open court, Tweedy's notice of appeal was timely filed and the District Court had jurisdiction over the case. The Supreme Court also noted that the later enactment of 46-18-116, which applies to Justices' Courts by virtue of 46-1-103, requiring a signed judgment on the record, should eliminate confusion in the future regarding when the statutory time for appeal begins to run. St. v. Tweedy, 277 M 313, 922 P2d 1134, 53 St. Rep. 656 (1996).

Appeal to District Court — Burden on State to Ensure Speedy Trial: Tweedy perfected the appeal of his misdemeanor conviction to the District Court. After Tweedy asked for and received a continuance and was substituted for his counsel, to act pro se, nothing further happened in the case until 5 years later, when the state moved to dismiss Tweedy's appeal because of his lack of diligence in pursuing it. The District Court granted the state's motion. The Supreme Court held that the burden was not upon Tweedy to pursue the appeal, but was upon the state to ensure that the constitutional requirements for a speedy trial were complied with. The Supreme Court reasoned that any other decision would ignore the de novo nature of the appeal to District Court and would penalize a defendant exercising a statutory right of appeal. St. v. Tweedy, 277 M 313, 922 P2d 1134, 53 St. Rep. 656 (1996).

Notice of Appeal Timely Filed: Defendant was convicted by a City Court jury of driving under the influence of alcohol and resisting arrest. Defendant's notice of appeal was filed 14 days after conviction and sentencing. The appeal was dismissed on the basis that the appeal was not timely filed. The District Court erred in dismissing the appeal because it failed to exclude intermediate weekend days and legal holidays as required by rule. St. v. Price, 271 M 409, 897 P2d 1084, 52 St. Rep. 527 (1995), followed in St. v. Pizzola, 283 M 522, 942 P2d 709, 54 St. Rep. 774 (1997).

Period of Time Prescribed or Allowed — Ten Days or Less: The Justice's Court sentenced Schindler on March 4, 1994. On appeal, the state contended that Schindler's notice of appeal filed by fax on March 14, 1994, was untimely. The Supreme Court applied Rule 21, M.U.R.J.C.C. (Title 25, ch. 24), in interpreting this section to mean that when the period of time prescribed or allowed is 10 days or less, intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays are excluded from the calculations. St. v. Schindler, 268 M 489, 886 P2d 978, 51 St. Rep. 1421 (1994), distinguishing St. v. Arthur, 234 M 75, 761 P2d 806 (1988), and followed in St. v. Pizzola, 283 M 522, 942 P2d 709, 54 St. Rep. 774 (1997).

Revocation of Suspended Sentence — Right to Trial De Novo in District Court Based on Similarities to Criminal Proceedings — Legislative Intent: Defendant pleaded guilty and received a suspended sentence in Justice's Court. Upon defendant's arrest again on additional charges, the state filed a petition in Justice's Court to revoke the suspended sentence. The Justice's Court found that defendant had violated the conditions of the suspended sentence and again suspended sentence, adding additional conditions. Defendant appealed to the District Court for a trial de novo on the petition for revocation of suspended sentence. The state moved to dismiss the appeal, arguing that no appeal is available under this section because a suspended sentence revocation is an administrative rather than a criminal proceeding. The District Court agreed and granted the state's motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that based on cogent and numerous similarities between criminal and revocation proceedings, appeals de novo from Justice's Court revocations of suspended sentences are available under and governed by this section. Any other holding would foreclose any appeal to or review by any court from a Justice's Court's revocation of a suspended sentence and would fail to take into account the Legislature's intent to provide for appeals de novo to the District Court from all final Justice's Court proceedings, criminal or civil. (See 1997 amendment.) St. v. Rogers, 267 M 190, 883 P2d 115, 51 St. Rep. 1037 (1994).

Dismissal of Appeal Based on Failure to Post Bond — Reversible Error: On appeal of a City Court conviction of misdemeanor assault, defendant moved for a stay of execution pending appeal and requested that the record be transferred to the District Court. The District Court informed defendant that a $1,000 appearance bond must be filed within 10 days or the appeal would be dismissed and the City Court judgment reinstated. Upon defendant's failure to post the bond, the appeal was dismissed. The right to appeal a criminal conviction from Justice's Court or City Court is purely statutory. Nothing in this section requires that an appeal bond or appearance bond be posted to perfect an appeal, and in the absence of such a requirement, the District Court may not impose one. The District Court's requirement of an appearance bond and subsequent dismissal based on the failure to post the bond constituted reversible error. St. v. Ward, 266 M 424, 880 P2d 1343, 51 St. Rep. 885 (1994), following State ex rel. Abbitt v. Justice Court, 220 M 210, 714 P2d 140 (1986).

Municipality Not Liable for Municipal Judge's Violation of Defendants' Civil Rights: Under state law, a Municipal Court Judge's failure to advise indigent defendants of their right to appointed counsel occurred under the state's judicial authority rather than under the municipality's authority, precluding imposition of civil rights liability against the city. Eggar v. Livingston, 40 F3d 312 (1994).

Premature Appeal of Judgment Not Including Sentence — De Novo Appeal Only — Appeal Not Perfected Properly Dismissed: Todd was convicted of assault in Justice's Court and, before he was sentenced, filed a notice of intention to appeal. The Justice's Court nevertheless proceeded to sentencing, and Todd was sentenced to pay a $250 fine or to perform community service, to pay costs, and to a 6-month deferred sentence. Several months after fulfilling the community service, Todd was informed that he had not paid the costs, whereupon the state moved for imposition of sentence and for dismissal of the earlier appeal. The court granted the state's motion, and Todd subsequently filed a notice of appeal from the Justice's Court's order dismissing the first appeal. The District Court held that it had no jurisdiction to review the Justice's Court's order and dismissed the appeal. Citing St. v. Hegeman, 248 M 49, 808 P2d 509 (1991), and St. v. Wilson, 252 M 264, 827 P2d 1286 (1992), the Supreme Court held that the right to appeal from a judgment was a right to appeal from a judgment that includes a sentence and that because sentence had not been pronounced at the time that Todd filed his first notice, the notice was premature and ineffective. The Supreme Court held that the second notice of appeal was also ineffective in that it was filed months after sentencing and not within the time required by statute. The District Court was correct in holding that it had no jurisdiction to review the Justice's Court's order dismissing the first appeal, both because the appeal to District Court is a trial de novo and not a review of lower court orders and because the notice of appeal was untimely filed. St. v. Todd, 262 M 108, 863 P2d 423, 50 St. Rep. 1466 (1993), followed in St. v. Tweedy, 277 M 313, 922 P2d 1134, 53 St. Rep. 656 (1996), followed in St. v. Mora, 277 M 411, 922 P2d 516, 53 St. Rep. 736 (1996).

Retrial of Unconvicted Offense Prohibited — Dismissal of Conviction for Uncharged Offense Affirmed: Barker was charged with DUI but was convicted of reckless driving by the Ravalli County Justice of the Peace. Barker appealed to the District Court and filed a motion to dismiss, which the District Court granted. On appeal by the state, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the reckless driving charge and the DUI charge were inapposite charges and that reckless driving was not a lesser included offense of DUI. The Supreme Court also held that while a defendant's statutory remedy for appealing a Justice's Court decision is a trial de novo in the District Court, it would be a violation of the prohibition against double jeopardy to try Barker again on the DUI charge because Barker was originally charged with that offense and jeopardy had attached when the first witness was sworn. When Barker appealed from the erroneous conviction of an uncharged offense, he did not waive his constitutional protection against double jeopardy for charges of which he was acquitted. St. v. Barker, 260 M 85, 858 P2d 360, 50 St. Rep. 970 (1993).

Oral Pronouncement of Guilt and Delayed Sentencing — Appeal Improper Pending Final Judgment: Following a nonjury trial on February 5, the Justice of the Peace orally pronounced defendant guilty of DUI and driving while the privilege to do so was suspended or revoked and ordered defendant to obtain an alcohol evaluation and return for sentencing February 26. On February 7, the Justice's Court issued a written order and mailed it to the prospective parties. On February 11, defendant filed a notice of appeal with the District Court, and the case was transferred on March 11. On March 28, the state filed a motion to dismiss on the basis that the appeal was premature because defendant had not been sentenced. On April 1, the District Court dismissed and remanded the case back to Justice's Court for sentencing before defendant had an opportunity to respond with a brief. An appeal cannot be utilized until judgment has been fully rendered. Dismissal was proper because the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction absent final judgment by the Justice's Court. St. v. Wilson, 252 M 264, 827 P2d 1286, 49 St. Rep. 243 (1992), distinguished in St. v. Caldwell, 1998 MT 261, 291 M 272, 968 P2d 711, 55 St. Rep. 1076 (1998).

Judgment and Sentence Prerequisite to Appeal to District Court — Misdemeanors: Except for misdemeanors listed in 3-5-302(2), a District Court is limited to appellate jurisdiction of misdemeanor cases. Imposition of sentence and entry of a final judgment by a Justice's Court or City Court are prerequisites to appeal to a District Court, and a party may not consent to subject matter jurisdiction or waive the want of jurisdiction. St. v. Hegeman, 248 M 49, 808 P2d 509, 48 St. Rep. 318 (1991), followed in St. v. Todd, 262 M 108, 863 P2d 423, 50 St. Rep. 1466 (1993), St. v. Tweedy, 277 M 313, 922 P2d 1134, 53 St. Rep. 656 (1996), and St. v. Diesen, 1998 MT 163, 290 M 55, 964 P2d 712, 55 St. Rep. 655 (1998), and distinguished in St. v. Caldwell, 1998 MT 261, 291 M 272, 968 P2d 711, 55 St. Rep. 1076 (1998).

Dismissal of Appeal From City Court to District Court — No Final Judgment: Appellant sought to appeal from City Court to District Court a decision made at a show cause hearing regarding forfeiture of bail bonds. However, because no order or final judgment issued out of the hearing, there was no right of appeal from that hearing. Helena v. Buck, 247 M 313, 806 P2d 27, 48 St. Rep. 213 (1991).

Duty to Perfect Appeal Rests With Appellant: The defendant filed a notice of appeal with the City Court after being convicted of his fourth DUI. The defendant's attorney failed to complete and return a praecipe to transmit the record to District Court within the 30-day time limit. The Supreme Court held that no right to a trial de novo existed. The duty to perfect the appeal lay with the appellant, and there was no assertion by the defendant that the request for transmittal had been made within the 30-day period. St. v. Speith, 244 M 392, 797 P2d 221, 47 St. Rep. 1630 (1990), followed in St. v. Todd, 262 M 108, 863 P2d 423, 50 St. Rep. 1466 (1993), and distinguished in St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307, 54 St. Rep. 246 (1997).

Physical Filing Required: "Giving written notice" of intention to appeal requires that notice must be actually received and filed by the court, not that it simply has been mailed. St. v. Arthur, 234 M 75, 761 P2d 806, 45 St. Rep. 1741 (1988), following St. v. Mortenson, 175 M 403, 574 P2d 581 (1978). Arthur was distinguished in St. v. Price, 271 M 409, 897 P2d 1084, 52 St. Rep. 527 (1995).

Waiver of Jury Trial in Justice Court — Right to Jury Trial on Appeal: Defendant waived the right to jury trial in Justice Court and was convicted in a bench trial. It was his right, after making a timely request, to a trial by jury on appeal to the District Court. St. v. Bender, 232 M 424, 756 P2d 1157, 45 St. Rep. 1165 (1988).

Notice of Appeal Not Timely Filed — Appeal Properly Dismissed: The right to appeal a criminal conviction from Justice's Court to District Court is purely statutory, and compliance with this section is required to perfect an appeal. Unless a party has made timely compliance by giving written notice of intention to appeal within 10 days after judgment, the District Court does not acquire jurisdiction. Therefore, where 21 days elapsed from judgment to filing of notice of appeal, the District Court had no other course but to dismiss the appeal. St. v. Hartford, 228 M 254, 741 P2d 1337, 44 St. Rep. 1500 (1987), distinguished in St. v. Price, 271 M 409, 897 P2d 1084, 52 St. Rep. 527 (1995), and St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307, 54 St. Rep. 246 (1997).

Trial De Novo of Criminal Case on Appeal From Justice's Court to District Court — No District Court Jurisdiction to Review Justice's Court Order Suppressing Evidence: A criminal case on appeal from Justice's Court to District Court must be tried anew in the District Court pursuant to this section, regardless of which party appeals. Accordingly, a District Court does not have appellate jurisdiction to review a Justice's Court order suppressing evidence. St. v. Kesler, 228 M 242, 741 P2d 791, 44 St. Rep. 1490 (1987), followed in St. v. Yarns, 252 M 45, 826 P2d 543, 49 St. Rep. 132 (1992), and in St. v. Todd, 262 M 108, 863 P2d 423, 50 St. Rep. 1466 (1993).

Notice to Defendant: Giving notice of an intention to appeal under this section requires that the defendant receive notice. St. v. Province, 226 M 425, 735 P2d 1128, 44 St. Rep. 775 (1987), distinguished in St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307, 54 St. Rep. 246 (1997).

Appeal of Guilty Plea in Justice's or City Court: From the standpoint of reason, justice, and public policy, an appeal of a guilty plea in Justice's Court or City Court may be tried anew in District Court provided it is properly perfected. However, this holding does not give the District Court original jurisdiction of a DUI case in violation of 3-5-302. St. v. Waymire, 226 M 406, 736 P2d 106, 44 St. Rep. 759 (1987).

Necessity of Posting Bond: An appeal bond is not required to perfect an appeal from a Justice Court to a District Court in a criminal matter. St. v. Bush, 164 M 81, 518 P2d 1406 (1974), holding that an appeal bond is required, is expressly overruled. State ex rel. Abbitt v. Justice Court, 220 M 210, 714 P2d 140, 43 St. Rep. 300 (1986).

Timely Notice of Appeal to Wrong Court: Tecca was convicted in City Court, and his attorney filed a timely notice of appeal in City Court 5 days after judgment specifying that the appeal would be to Justice Court. The appeal should have been to District Court. On August 7, 11 working days after judgment, a correct notice of appeal was filed. However, since 46-17-311 requires that a notice of intent to appeal a judgment of a City Court or Justice Court be filed within 10 days of the judgment, the trial judge dismissed the appeal for failure to file a timely notice of appeal. The Supreme Court agreed with the trial judge that the August 7 notice was not timely but found that the original notice, though in error, was timely filed in the proper court. Noting a similar decision in Adair v. Justice Court, 213 M 466, 692 P2d 13, 41 St. Rep. 2241 (1984), the court reversed the trial judge, holding that where error occurs in a notice of appeal which is timely filed, the defendant should be granted 10 days from the date of remittitur to file a statutorily correct notice of appeal pursuant to 46-17-311. St. v. Tecca, 220 M 68, 713 P2d 541, 43 St. Rep. 180 (1986).

Appeal Perfected if, Inter Alia, Transmission of Record Requested: Defendant appealed a City Court D.U.I. conviction to District Court. The Supreme Court vacated District Court's dismissal of appeal and remanded for a determination of whether defendant had requested transmission of the record within the 30-day statutory period for perfecting appeal. The court rejected the District Court conclusion that regardless of when defendant initially requested transmission of the record, he had failed to perfect the appeal because he failed to see that the record was actually transmitted. This conclusion was erroneous in light of St. v. Main, 191 M 304, 623 P2d 1382, 38 St. Rep. 205 (1981), and St. v. Dubray, 201 M 327, 654 P2d 970, 39 St. Rep. 2142 (1982), followed in St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307, 54 St. Rep. 246 (1997). Billings v. Seiffert, 215 M 381, 697 P2d 1342, 42 St. Rep. 448 (1985).

Jurisdiction Over Appeals From Justices' Courts: The Supreme Court does not have appellate jurisdiction to review the judgments or orders of the Justices' Courts. Adair v. Lake County Justice Court, 213 M 466, 692 P2d 13, 41 St. Rep. 2241 (1984); State ex rel. Estes v. Justice Court, 129 M 136, 284 P2d 249 (1955).

When Appeal Perfected: Defendant was convicted in Justice's Court of driving under the influence of intoxicating liquor. Within 6 days after trial, defendant's attorney mailed a notice of appeal. Within 5 days, the Justice's Court signed the stay of execution but failed to transmit the record to District Court as the defendant had requested. Four months later the defendant learned that the record had not been transmitted when the County Attorney filed a motion to dismiss. The District Court ordered the appeal dismissed because the record had not been transmitted within 30 days of judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court ordered the appeal reinstated, holding that a defendant perfects on appeal from a Justice's Court to a District Court when he requests the Justice's Court to transmit the record and fulfills the other criteria of this section. To hold otherwise would be to hold that the appeals statutes are a trap for the unwary, rather than a device to assume timely review of a lower court judgment. A defendant has the right to expect a Justice's Court to timely honor his request. St. v. Dubray, 201 M 327, 654 P2d 970, 39 St. Rep. 2142 (1982), followed in St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307, 54 St. Rep. 246 (1997).

Effect of Failure to Transfer Record: Where after filing notice of appeal to District Court defendant failed to have record of Justice's Court proceedings transferred to the District Court within the statutory time limit, he did not perfect his appeal and thus waived his right to appeal. St. v. Crane, 196 M 305, 639 P2d 514, 39 St. Rep. 126 (1982).

District Court Not Appellate Court for City or Justice's Court:

A District Court may not sit as a court of review. Therefore, on appeal from a Justice's or City Court, the District Court must try a case de novo and may not remand it. Hardin v. Myers, 194 M 248, 633 P2d 677, 38 St. Rep. 1512 (1981).

The District Court does not, on appeal from a police court (now City Court), sit as a court of review, but it tries the cause de novo (see 2011 amendment). White Sulphur Springs v. Voise, 136 M 1, 343 P2d 855 (1959).

Burden of Appellant to Ensure Timely Appeal — Ineffective Counsel Not Reason to Excuse Untimely Appeal: Where the defendants were convicted in City Court of disorderly conduct on December 14 and judgment and sentence were orally pronounced in court on that date, the defendants' telephone call to the city magistrate on January 23 requesting the transmission of the City Court record could not prevent an untimely appeal, when the records were actually transmitted on January 28. The duty to perfect the appeal lies with the defendants. Their failure to ensure the timely transmission of the records mandates dismissal of the appeal. Nor should the defendants be entitled to an appeal because the appeal was not perfected due solely to the ineffectiveness of counsel. The decision to allow an appeal for such a reason rested, if at all, with the District Court. St. v. Main, 191 M 304, 623 P2d 1382, 38 St. Rep. 205 (1981).

Time for Appeal Not Dependent on Written Judgment or Decision on Appointment of Counsel: Where the defendants were convicted of disorderly conduct in City Court on December 14 and judgment and sentence were orally imposed on that date, the transmission of the City Court record to District Court on January 28 came too late to perfect an appeal and the District Court's dismissal of the appeal was therefore proper. The time allowable for transmission of the record on appeal is not dependent upon service of a written judgment when judgment has been pronounced orally in open court; nor, as the defendants claimed, is the time limit tolled during any time spent in determining whether the defendants are entitled to appointed counsel. Timely transmission of the record is in no way hampered by the preliminary inquiry into defendants' indigence. St. v. Main, 191 M 304, 623 P2d 1382, 38 St. Rep. 205 (1981).

State Not to Appeal Justice's Court Dismissal: When a criminal cause in Justice's Court was dismissed because a witness subpoenaed by both parties testified for the prosecution and failed to appear for the defendant, the State had no right to appeal because 46-20-103 applies only to appeals from District Court and 46-17-311 allows appeals from Justice's Court only for the defendant. (See 1985 amendment note.) St. v. Sanchez, 187 M 434, 610 P2d 162 (1980).

Duty to Perfect Appeal — Filing With Wrong Court: When the defendant inadvertently filed his notice of appeal with the wrong court, the District Court, he did not perfect his appeal in the manner required by law and the Justice of the Peace had no duty to transmit the record to the District Court. State ex rel. Ross v. Mallory, 184 M 29, 601 P2d 385 (1979).

Time for Appeal: The time for appeal from a Justice's Court conviction runs from the date of verbal pronouncement of judgment in open court, and written notice of appeal must be filed with the Justice's Court within the 10-day period. St. v. Mortenson, 175 M 403, 574 P2d 581 (1978), followed in St. v. Tweedy, 277 M 313, 922 P2d 1134, 53 St. Rep. 656 (1996).

Exclusive Remedy for New Trial: An appeal to the District Court for a trial de novo is the exclusive remedy for obtaining a new trial in Justice's Court proceedings. Forsythe v. Wenholz, 170 M 496, 554 P2d 1333 (1976), followed in Rickett v. Billings, 262 M 339, 864 P2d 762, 50 St. Rep. 1586 (1993), and affirming Hardin v. Myers, 194 M 248, 633 P2d 677 (1981).

Interlocutory Orders: Viewing this act as a whole, it is clear that the State may appeal from interlocutory orders; this section was meant only to define and delimit the defendant's right to appeal. (But see 1985 amendment note.) St. v. Bergum, 164 M 155, 520 P2d 653 (1974).

Mandamus: Since this section provides a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law, mandamus did not lie to compel a Justice of the Peace to honor an affidavit of disqualification. Bailey v. St., 163 M 380, 517 P2d 708 (1973).

Increased Sentence: The District Court may increase the sentence or punishment imposed by a Justice of the Peace after a trial de novo on a misdemeanor charge. St. v. Fissette, 159 M 501, 498 P2d 1208 (1972), following Colten v. Ky., 405 US 913, 32 L Ed 2d 584, 92 S Ct 1953 (1971).

Objection to Form of Undertaking: When the defendant sought to appeal the decision of the Justice of the Peace and his undertaking was not in proper form but was approved by the Justice, it was improper for the court to dismiss the appeal for insufficiency of the form of the undertaking when no objection to the form was made in the Justice's Court of original jurisdiction. Clark v. District Court, 142 M 56, 381 P2d 472 (1963); Reidelbach v. District Court, 142 M 52, 381 P2d 470 (1963).

Effect of Payment of Fine After Appeal: When the defendant was convicted in a police court (now City Court) of the violation of a town ordinance and appealed to the District Court and served notice of his appeal while in jail serving a sentence imposed for his nonpayment of the fine, the fact that the defendant had paid the fine before the hearing of the appeal did not effect an abandonment of his appeal. White Sulphur Springs v. Voise, 136 M 1, 343 P2d 855 (1959).

Dismissal for Want of Prosecution Void: When an appeal was taken to the District Court from a conviction in a police court (now City Court) for a liquor law violation but neither the city nor the defendant requested the cause be set for trial, the judge of the court could not order the appeal dismissed “for want of prosecution” without giving notice to the defendant. State ex rel. Healy v. District Court, 125 M 77, 230 P2d 763 (1951).

Amended Pleadings: On appeal from a Justice’s Court in a misdemeanor case, the case must be tried de novo in the District Court on the papers and files in the former, unless the latter court allows other or amended pleadings and each party has the benefit of all legal objections made in the Justice’s Court. St. v. Benson, 91 M 109, 5 P2d 1045 (1931).

No Right of Appeal by Cities: The defendant, charged with wrongfully obstructing an alley, was proceeded against under the former statutes governing criminal procedure in police courts (now City Courts), was convicted, and appealed to the District Court where the complaint was dismissed. The court held on appeal by the city that since the statute did not grant the right of appeal to cities in criminal causes tried in Justices’ Courts or police courts, the appeal did not lie. (See 1985 amendment note.) Miles City v. Drum, 60 M 451, 199 P 719 (1921).

Waiver of Certain Irregularities:

The result of an appeal from a judgment of a Justice of the Peace in a prosecution for a misdemeanor is to abrogate that judgment and to hold the defendant under the original warrant of arrest for a trial de novo in the District Court, and the defendant cannot complain, on habeas corpus, of any irregularity committed by the Justice in rendering the judgment. Hosoda v. Neville, 45 M 310, 123 P 20 (1912).

A party cannot, under the guise of an application for a trial de novo, insist that irregularities to which he made no objection shall be taken note of or that the judgment, which is abrogated by the appeal, be reversed on account of them. It is therefore immaterial, on the trial of the case appealed, whether the Justice lost jurisdiction by conducting the trial in part on a legal holiday or failed to comply with the statute in giving judgment or pronouncing sentence. In re Graye, 36 M 394, 93 P 66 (1907).

Since the District Court does not, on appeal from a Justice’s Court, sit as a court of review but tries the case de novo, any irregularities attending the rendition of the judgment in a case in which the Justice had jurisdiction of the offense charged and of the defendant are waived by taking the appeal. St. v. O’Brien, 35 M 482, 90 P 514 (1907), followed in Billings v. McCarvel, 262 M 96, 863 P2d 441, 50 St. Rep. 1460 (1993).

Record on Appeal: In the absence of a specific statutory provision on the subject, the original files, together with a copy of the docket minutes, constitute the record on appeal in a criminal case from a Justice’s to a District Court. In re Graye, 36 M 394, 93 P 66 (1907).

Part 4

Procedure in Municipal Court

Part Case Notes

Appeal Bond to Perfect Criminal Appeal: Because there is no statutory basis or court rule requiring an appeal bond to perfect an appeal in a criminal case from Municipal Court, the Municipal Court may not require one. Missoula v. Shea, 202 M 286, 661 P2d 410, 40 St. Rep. 91 (1983).

46-17-401. Applicability of district court rules.

Case Notes

Remand or Order to Lift Stay Unnecessary Upon Affirmation by Appellate Court — Supreme Court Jurisdiction of Municipal Court Appeal Affirmed but Remanded by District Court: A Municipal Court sentenced Costa for misdemeanor traffic offenses, then stayed imposition of sentence pending Costa’s appeal to District Court. The District Court affirmed judgment and remanded to the Municipal Court for imposition of sentence. The question then arose as to whether the Supreme Court had jurisdiction to address the District Court’s decision. The Supreme Court noted that the definition of remand is to send something back for further action; however, the Legislature did not intend to require an appellate court to formally remand in cases involving affirmed criminal judgments. In addition, it is unnecessary for an appellate court to direct that a stay pending appeal be lifted once a defendant has exhausted the right to appeal and the underlying judgment and sentence have been affirmed. Therefore, the District Court’s remand was premature, unnecessary, and of no immediate consequence and had no effect on the Municipal Court’s final judgment and sentence. The Municipal Court stayed Costa’s sentence pending appeal, which presumably encompassed an appeal to the Supreme Court, so because the District Court's remand was unnecessary, the Supreme Court had jurisdiction over Costa's appeal. Billings v. Costa, 2006 MT 181, 333 M 84, 140 P3d 1070 (2006).

46-17-402. Fees and fines — collection.

Compiler's Comments

2005 Amendment: Chapter 232 in (1) near middle after "provided in" inserted "61-8-726 and"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 515 in (2)(a) at beginning deleted "If a final judgment is entered for a fine and the fine is immediately due" and at end after "collection of" substituted "any final judgment that requires a payment to the municipal court" for "the fine"; in (2)(b) near beginning after "collect a" substituted "judgment" for "fine", near middle after "judgment" deleted "for the fine", and near end after "collection procedure" inserted "and other postjudgment remedies"; at end of (2)(c) after "collecting the" substituted "judgment" for "fine"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 63 in (1) inserted "except as provided in subsection (2)"; inserted (2)(a) authorizing municipal court to contract for collection of fine if final judgment entered and fine immediately due; inserted (2)(b) authorizing assignment to and collection of fine by private person or entity if retained by municipal court; inserted (2)(c) authorizing municipal court to pay private person or entity for fine collection after deduction of charges; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

46-17-403. Jury trial.

Case Notes

Municipal Court Criminal Defendants — Six-Person Jury: Under this section, a criminal defendant in Municipal Court is afforded the same jury trial rights as a defendant in Justice Court, including the right to only a six-person jury as provided to a Justice Court defendant under 46-17-201 and 46-17-311. Missoula v. Prinkki, 239 M 331, 779 P2d 921, 46 St. Rep. 1724 (1989).

46-17-404. Appeals.

Case Notes

Appellate Jurisdiction Over Municipal Court Order Properly Denied — Interests of Justice Not Furthered: The defendant was convicted in municipal court of disorderly conduct and ordered to pay a $100 fine and $135 in fees and surcharges. The defendant appealed to the District Court, which declined appellate jurisdiction because the amount of the fine was less than the statutory threshold of $200. The plaintiff appealed to the Supreme Court, which affirmed the District Court, concluding that the amount of the fine was less than $200 and that the interests of justice would not be furthered by allowing the defendant's appeal. Bozeman v. King, 2016 MT 300, 385 Mont. 376, 384 P.3d 481.

Appeal Bond to Perfect Criminal Appeal: Because there is no statutory basis or court rule requiring an appeal bond to perfect an appeal in a criminal case from Municipal Court, the Municipal Court may not require one. Missoula v. Shea, 202 M 286, 661 P2d 410, 40 St. Rep. 91 (1983).

CHAPTER 18 SENTENCE AND JUDGMENT

Chapter Commission Comments

Source of 1991 Commission Comments: The 1991 comments to this chapter were prepared by the Commission on Criminal Procedure appointed by the Supreme Court. The Commission's work extended over nearly a decade. The comments were prepared for proposed rules of criminal procedure. The Supreme Court determined that the proposed rules would be better suited to adoption by the Legislature. The Commission received assistance from the State Bar of Montana and the Montana County Attorneys' Association. The following were members of the Commission at various times: Robert L. Deschamps III, Chairman; Honorable Thomas A. Olson; Honorable Henry Loble; Honorable Leif B. Erickson; Professor James T. Ranney; John P. Connor; Daniel V. Donovan; Gary G. Doran; Harold Hanser; Joe L. Hegel; Ted O. Lympus; Marc F. Racicot; and Michael J. Sherwood. The Commission also received valuable assistance from its intern, Peter Carroll, and from Leslie Halligan, who compiled the Commission's work.

The Commission's work ultimately resulted in the enactment of Chapter 800, Laws of 1991. The commission comments were substantially rewritten by the Code Commissioner and his staff to reflect changes from the time the rules were initially proposed and to reflect the change from a rules format to a statute format. The Code Commissioner has substituted references to "statute" for "rule" when appropriate and has substituted MCA citations for references to proposed rules. The Code Commissioner has inserted "1987" in MCA references that originated with the Commission because that is the version of the MCA the Commission originally used. The annotator has also deleted references to "proposed" material that has been adopted. Bracketed material has been inserted to indicate changes made by the 1991 Legislature that were not based on the Commission's proposal. The Code Commissioner extends his thanks to John P. Connor and Michael J. Sherwood for their review of the revised comments.

Chapter Case Notes

Juvenile Sentence of Life Without Parole Reconsidered in Light of Miller and Montgomery — Evidence of Rehabilitation Excluded — Resentencing Vacated and Remanded: When he was 17 years old, the defendant murdered three people while he was burglarizing their home. He was tried as an adult and was sentenced to life without parole. Following the United States Supreme Court rulings in Miller v. Alabama, 567 U.S. 460 (2012), and Montgomery v. Louisiana, 577 U.S. 190 (2016), the defendant filed a petition for postconviction relief asserting his sentence was unconstitutional. During his resentencing hearing, the District Court disregarded substantial evidence of the defendant's rehabilitation in the nearly 30 years since the homicides and resentenced him to life without parole. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the District Court violated the defendant's constitutional rights by deeming him as "irreparably corrupt" without considering evidence of his rehabilitation. It vacated the District Court's sentencing and remanded the matter for the District Court to consider this evidence in resentencing. St. v. Keefe, 2021 MT 8, 403 Mont. 1, 478 P.3d 830. See also St. v. Keefe, 2022 MT 121, 409 Mont. 86, 512 P.3d 741.

Request for State Funds to Retain Independent Expert Denied — No Constitutional Violation When Independent Expert Appointed: When he was 17 years old, the defendant murdered three people while he was burglarizing their home. He was tried as an adult and sentenced to life without parole. Following the United States Supreme Court rulings in Miller v. Alabama, 567 U.S. 460 (2012), and Montgomery v. Louisiana, 577 U.S. 190 (2016), the defendant filed a petition for postconviction relief asserting his sentence was unconstitutional. The defendant was appointed a public defender and requested funds to procure his own expert on whether he was "irreparably corrupt". The District Court, however, had already appointed an independent expert and denied his motion for funds. After the District Court resentenced the defendant to life without parole, the defendant appealed, arguing that the District Court had violated his due process rights by not allowing him the funds to retain his own expert. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the independent expert's examination satisfied due process requirements. St. v. Keefe, 2021 MT 8, 403 Mont. 1, 478 P.3d 830. See also St. v. Keefe, 2022 MT 121, 409 Mont. 86, 512 P.3d 741.

Imposition of Child Custody Change in Criminal Sentence — Moot: After the defendant was convicted of assault on a minor and aggravated assault based on acts committed against her child, the District Court ordered as part of the defendant's criminal sentence that the child be temporarily placed with the father while civil dependency and neglect proceedings progressed against the defendant and stated in its judgment that it should be presumed that the father should have legal custody of the child unless the defendant could demonstrate otherwise. On appeal, the Supreme Court concluded that the defendant's appeal challenging the District Court's temporary placement of the child with the father was moot because the mother had regained custody of the child through the civil dependency and neglect proceedings. However, the District Court's statement regarding the presumption that the father should have custody of the child had no place in the judgment and was ordered stricken. St. v. MacDonald, 2013 MT 105, 370 Mont. 1, 299 P.3d 839.

Presumption of Punishment for Going to Trial Based on Difference Between Pretrial Offer and Actual Sentence — Remand: As set out in St. v. Baldwin, 192 M 521, 629 P2d 222 (1981), when a District Court becomes involved in plea negotiations and an offer is made, any difference in the sentencing after trial must point out the factors justifying an increased sentence, and failure to enumerate the factors leads to the presumption that a greater sentence has been imposed for a vindictive purpose. Here, when the District Court failed to justify having an 11-year sentence run consecutively rather than concurrently with another sentence, the Baldwin standard requiring an explanation for imposing a harsher sentence than that offered in plea negotiations was not met, constituting reversible error. The case was remanded for resentencing. St. v. Hall, 2003 MT 253, 317 M 356, 77 P3d 239 (2003).

Absence of Facts Indicating Unconstitutional Sentence — Maximum Sentence Affirmed: Brown cited St. v. Baldwin, 192 M 521, 629 P2d 222 (1981), and St. v. Tate, 196 M 248, 639 P2d 1149 (1982), in arguing that a disparity between his sentence for deliberate homicide and a plea bargain offered by the state indicated that his due process rights were violated. The Supreme Court distinguished Baldwin and Tate because in Brown's case, the District Court was not directly involved with the plea negotiation process. Rather, the District Court enumerated a lengthy list of factors that were considered in imposing the maximum sentence on Brown. Absent anything in the record to support Brown's claim that his sentence was unconstitutional, the Supreme Court affirmed the sentence. St. v. Brown, 2003 MT 166, 316 M 310, 71 P3d 1215 (2003).

Defendant's Affirmation of Correctness of Information in Presentence Investigation Constituting Waiver of Due Process Challenge: McLeod challenged the legality of his dangerous drug sentence on due process grounds because the sentencing court relied on a presentence investigation (PSI) report that indicated that McLeod had five previous felony drug convictions instead of the actual four previous convictions. A convicted defendant has a due process guarantee against a sentence predicated on misinformation. Here, McLeod was given proper notice of the information in the PSI, availed himself of the opportunity to extensively review the information, was represented by counsel at the time that the PSI was made known to him and reviewed the information with counsel, and was given repeated opportunities to rebut the information but chose instead to affirm the accuracy of the PSI. Thus, pursuant to St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976), McLeod was afforded the process due to a criminal defendant at sentencing. McLeod's affirmation of the correctness of the PSI constituted a waiver of a due process challenge, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. McLeod, 2002 MT 348, 313 M 358, 61 P3d 126 (2002).

Failure of District Court Judge to Abide by Plea Agreement Entered With Previous District Court Judge — Doubt Regarding Plea Resolved in Favor of New Trial: At a change of plea hearing in December 2000, Tweed pleaded guilty to two counts of sexual intercourse without consent pursuant to a plea agreement in which the state agreed to drop two counts of felony sexual assault and recommended 30-year concurrent sentences on each count with 20 years suspended. In March 2001, Tweed appeared for sentencing before a new District Court Judge. The new judge called the probation officer who conducted the presentence investigation, and pursuant to the probation officer's recommendations, the new judge rejected the terms of the plea agreement and sentenced Tweed to concurrent 30-year sentences with only 10 years suspended. Tweed moved to withdraw the guilty pleas, but the motion was denied, and Tweed appealed. The Supreme Court held that the District Court's contradictory statements gave credence to Tweed's claim that he held a mistaken understanding of the binding effect upon the court of the pretrial agreement's sentencing recommendations. In view of the irregularities in the interrogation at the change of plea hearing, any doubt about whether Tweed was precluded from entering a knowing, voluntary, and intelligent plea should be resolved in favor of a trial on the merits. The denial of Tweed's motion to withdraw the guilty pleas was an abuse of discretion, and the case was reversed and remanded for a new trial. St. v. Tweed, 2002 MT 286, 312 M 482, 59 P3d 1105 (2002).

Reliance of Sentencing Judge on Other Conviction Valid at Time of Sentencing but Later Found Invalid — Inability of Defendant to Address Vacation of Prior Convictions as Due Process Violation: In 1983, Bauer was charged with and convicted of two felonies in Silver Bow County and sentenced to terms in the state prison. Bauer challenged the convictions. About 8 years later, Bauer was charged with felony intimidation in Powell County and was sentenced to an additional 5 years in prison. Following the 1991 prison riots, Bauer was moved to Blaine County, where he was later charged with three felonies arising out of an incident with a female inmate at the Blaine County jail. The presentence investigation report (PSI) referred to the Silver Bow County convictions, and the sentencing court expressly referred to the PSI in sentencing Bauer. The court held that if Bauer was successful in challenging the 1983 convictions, the sentences for the Blaine County offenses would run from the date of judgment and sentence and Bauer would be credited with any time served from the date of filing of the information to the date of imposition of the Blaine County sentences. Bauer's 1983 sentences were subsequently voided based on newly discovered DNA evidence that exonerated Bauer. Bauer then sought postconviction relief on grounds that his due process rights had been violated when the sentencing court in Blaine County relied on the now incorrect information in the PSI regarding the Silver Bow County convictions. Under both the federal and state constitutions, a defendant is protected from a sentence predicated on misinformation about that defendant's criminal history and must be given an opportunity to explain, argue, and rebut any information, including presentencing information, that may lead to a deprivation of life, liberty, or property. Bauer could not be said to have been given that opportunity because the 1983 convictions were still valid at the time of sentencing in Blaine County, nor did the sentencing court have a full opportunity to consider the procedural and substantive consequences of the actual vacation of the 1983 convictions or the specific grounds upon which postconviction relief was granted by the Silver Bow County court. What was correct information at the time of sentencing became misinformation after the fact. Notwithstanding that the sentencing court specifically stated that it did not rely on the 1983 convictions, the Supreme Court reversed on grounds of fundamental fairness, refusing to allow the misinformation to go unchallenged before the District Court by denying Bauer the opportunity to be resentenced on the basis of materially accurate information. The case was remanded for resentencing before a new District Court Judge. Bauer v. St., 1999 MT 185, 295 M 306, 983 P2d 955, 56 St. Rep. 715 (1999), following St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976), St. v. Redding, 208 M 24, 675 P2d 974, 41 St. Rep. 147 (1984), and Bishop v. St., 254 M 100, 835 P2d 732, 49 St. Rep. 650 (1992).

Different Sentencing Judge — No Presumption of Vindictiveness When Sentence Increased on Remand: Due process rights on resentencing create a presumption of vindictiveness when a sentence is increased on remand. However, when a different judge performs resentencing, there is no presumption of vindictiveness; rather, the defense must show actual vindictiveness. St. v. Forsyth, 233 M 389, 761 P2d 363, 45 St. Rep. 1577 (1988).

Due Process at Sentencing — Protection of Community Versus Defendant's Liberty Interest: At the sentencing stage, due process requires that a convicted person's liberty interest and the risk of unjust deprivation of that interest be balanced against the state's interest in protecting the community. Due process must be observed and defendant's rights protected, but it is clear that his liberty interest does not rise to the level of an accused's at trial. St. v. Nichols, 222 M 71, 720 P2d 1157, 43 St. Rep. 1068 (1986), followed in St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298, 47 St. Rep. 454 (1990).

No Right to Second Psychiatric Examination: Defendant was convicted of aggravated kidnapping and deliberate homicide, pursuant to pleas of guilty, and was sentenced to death. Judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court. Subsequently, defendant filed a motion for an additional psychiatric evaluation based on the case of Ake v. Okla., 470 US 68, 84 L Ed 2d 53, 105 S Ct 1087 (1985), which was decided after arguments in defendant's case. The Supreme Court distinguished the facts of defendant's case from the facts in Ake and denied defendant's motion. The Supreme Court found that defendant had already been afforded his right to access to a competent psychiatrist for the preparation of a defense based on his mental condition and was not entitled to an additional psychiatric examination. The Ake decision lacks direct application to Montana's capital sentencing proceedings and defendant's case. St. v. Smith, 217 M 453, 705 P2d 1110, 42 St. Rep. 1348 (1985).

Capital Sentence Requested by Defendant — No Basis for Resentencing: Defendant pleaded guilty to two counts of aggravated kidnapping and two counts of deliberate homicide. Defendant requested the death penalty. After sentencing, defendant had second thoughts and on appeal sought a resentencing. The Supreme Court held there was no basis for resentencing because: (1) sentencing was not tainted by reliance on prior Canadian convictions obtained without counsel; (2) inclusion of juvenile offenses as adult offenses in presentence report was not error; (3) a court-ordered presentence interview was not violative of the fifth amendment; (4) recommendation for the death penalty in the presentence report was not improper; (5) no judicial error was committed in the extent of review of mitigating factors and no unconstitutional limit was placed on the court's consideration of mitigating circumstances; (6) no error was found in the court's denial of defendant's motion for additional psychiatric evaluation; (7) defendant was not required to be present at proceedings occurring after the verdict; (8) jury participation is not constitutionally required in capital sentencing procedures; (9) no indication was found that the trial court imposed the death penalty out of passion or prejudice; and (10) the sentence was not excessive or disproportionate. St. v. Smith, 217 M 461, 705 P2d 1087, 42 St. Rep. 463 (1985) (Smith I). A habeas corpus petition was conditionally granted in Smith v. McCormick, 917 F2d 1153 (9th Cir. 1990), a subsequent resentencing of death was reversed and remanded for preparation of a new presentence investigation, St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000 (1993) (Smith II), and following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

Jail Sentence for DUI Not Cruel and Unusual Punishment: The defendant, who has an extensive record of driving under the influence of alcohol, was convicted on three counts of driving under the influence (DUI) and sentenced to serve 10 months in the county jail. The defendant contends her sentence is cruel and unusual punishment and a denial of equal protection because it may be greater than would be served in the state prison for a more serious offense since county jail inmates are not entitled to statutory good time allowance or parole eligibility as are prison inmates. However, the sentence falls within the maximum authorized by statute and is not so disproportionate to the crime that it shocks the conscience and outrages the moral sense of the community or of justice. Therefore, the sentence imposed is not cruel and unusual punishment that would render it unconstitutional. St. v. Bruns, 213 M 372, 691 P2d 817, 41 St. Rep. 2178 (1984).

No Jury Finding of Previous Conviction Necessary for Increased Penalty: The defendant was convicted of carrying a concealed weapon, and after stipulating to his prior conviction and being sentenced to an increased penalty because of that conviction, argued on appeal that the District Court had no jurisdiction to sentence him to an increased penalty under subsection (2) of 45-8-316 because the jury had not found the fact of his previous felony. On appeal the Supreme Court held, under the rationale of St. v. Nelson, 178 M 280, 583 P2d 435 (1978), that the prerequisites for the heavier sentence were not an element of the crime and that no finding by the jury on the issue of the defendant's previous conviction was therefore necessary. St. v. Sanders, 208 M 283, 676 P2d 1312, 41 St. Rep. 338 (1984).

Out-of-Court Conference Between Sentencing Judge and Probation Officer — Denial of Due Process: The defendant was denied due process when the sentencing judge conferred with the presentence investigation officer behind closed doors where no opportunity was provided for argument, rebuttal, or explanation. St. v. Redding, 208 M 24, 675 P2d 974, 41 St. Rep. 147 (1984), distinguished in St. v. Pease, 233 M 65, 758 P2d 764, 45 St. Rep. 1296 (1988).

Rules of Evidence Not Applicable to Sentencing: The Montana Rules of Evidence do not apply to sentencing hearings. The court correctly used relaxed rules of evidence during the sentencing hearing. St. v. Holmes, 207 M 176, 674 P2d 1071, 40 St. Rep. 1973 (1983).

State Responsible for Medical Costs Incurred After Defendant Sentenced to State Prison — State as Defendant's Legal Custodian: At the time of defendant's sentencing, she was pregnant and her child was due to be born within a few weeks. She was sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment in state prison with 2 years suspended. Rather than ordering defendant's transfer to the state prison immediately upon sentencing, the District Court ordered that defendant remain in the county jail until the baby's birth so that defendant could be attended by her personal physician. In a dispute between the county and the state Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) concerning who bore the responsibility for defendant's medical costs, the Supreme Court ruled that the responsibility was that of the state. The Supreme Court reasoned that since once the District Court has imposed a valid sentence, it lacks jurisdiction to modify it, the defendant became the legal responsibility of the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) as soon as the judgment was filed. Wilkinson v. St., 205 M 237, 667 P2d 413, 40 St. Rep. 1239 (1983).

Disparity Between Sentence Offered in Plea Bargaining and Sentence Actually Rendered After Trial:

Because of the difficulty of distinguishing between situations where leniency is offered in exchange for a plea and situations where the defendant is punished for exercising his right to trial by jury, a sentencing court that becomes involved in the plea bargaining process and imposes a harsher sentence after trial than was offered in exchange for a guilty plea must specifically point out the factors that justify the increased sentence. (Citing St. v. Baldwin, 192 M 521, 629 P2d 222 (1981).) St. v. Tate, 196 M 248, 639 P2d 1149, 39 St. Rep. 69 (1982). Baldwin was distinguished in St. v. Smith, 276 M 434, 916 P2d 773, 53 St. Rep. 459 (1996).

To protect a criminal defendant's constitutional rights in plea bargaining situations and to help preserve public confidence in the judicial process, we today adopt ABA Standard 14-sec. 1.8(b). To implement that standard and to facilitate judicial review, a sentencing court that becomes involved in the plea bargaining process and imposes a harsher sentence after trial than was offered in exchange for a guilty plea must specifically point out the factors that justify the increased sentence. In this case, we cannot tell from the record why the trial court offered a very lenient sentence (45 days' jail time) in exchange for a plea of guilty. Nor can we tell why the court found imposition of a harsher sentence appropriate after jury trial (10 years' jail time). We have no assurance that the trial court did not increase the sentence in retaliation for defendant's insistence on a trial by jury. St. v. Baldwin, 192 M 521, 629 P2d 222, 38 St. Rep. 882 (1981), distinguished in St. v. Smith, 276 M 434, 916 P2d 773, 53 St. Rep. 459 (1996).

Defendant Sane at Time of Crime — Insane at Other Times: Defendant, convicted of aggravated assault, contended that sentencing a man suffering from severe mental illness to prison violates the constitutional ban against cruel and unusual punishment as well as 53-21-101. When a defendant is convicted and claims that he was suffering at the time of the crime from a mental disease or defect that rendered him incapable of conforming his conduct to the requirements of the law, the sentencing judge is to consider the relevant evidence of the defendant's disorder. If the judge finds the defendant did not suffer mental illness at the time of the crime, he is to be sentenced according to the guidelines in this chapter. If the finding is to the contrary, the defendant must be sentenced to Warm Springs. Despite the lack of provisions in Title 46, ch. 14, for sentencing a defendant who was sane at the time of the crime but may be insane at other times, Title 53, ch. 21, relating to treatment for mental illness, does not apply to criminal defendants. The defendant's claim that he is covered by Title 53, ch. 21, is in error. Without a finding of insanity followed by sentencing to a penal institution without provision for adequate treatment, defendant has suffered no statutory or constitutional violation. St. v. Mercer, 191 M 418, 625 P2d 44, 38 St. Rep. 312 (1981). See also St. v. Spell, 2017 MT 266, 389 Mont. 172, 404 P.3d 725.

Increase of Sentence After New Trial — Due Process: The defendant, who had been sentenced to 100 years' imprisonment for deliberate homicide, was not denied due process of law when, after a new trial on the same charge, he was sentenced to death. The due process clause is not offended by all possibilities of increased punishment upon retrial after appeal, but only those that pose a realistic likelihood of vindictiveness. When the District Court Judge was replaced for the new trial and sentencing and the new judge stated his reasons for imposing the death penalty with clarity, the threat of vindictiveness was not a realistic likelihood. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980).

Montana Criminal Justice Oversight Council: Sections 3 and 4, Ch. 390, L. 2017, as amended by sec. 9, Ch. 416, L. 2017, created a Montana criminal justice oversight council to review recommendations of the commission on sentencing provided for in Ch. 343, L. 2015, evaluate data, and submit and receive reports on criminal justice reforms.

Review of Sentencing Policies and Practices: Chapter 343, L. 2015, created a commission on sentencing to conduct an empirical study of the impact of current sentencing policies and practices on Montana's criminal justice system and submit a report with findings and recommendations to the 65th legislature. Chapter 343 was effective April 28, 2015, and terminates June 30, 2017.

Part Case Notes

No Action Required by District Court to Lift Stay on Sentence After Conviction Affirmed on Appeal — Execution of Sentence After 552 Days Erroneous: The defendant was convicted of first offense misdemeanor DUI and granted a stay of his sentence pending appeal. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, and the District Court issued a notice of remittitur to the parties. Five hundred fifty two days later, the state moved to lift the stay on the defendant's sentence. The District Court granted the motion and the defendant appealed, arguing that execution of the sentence after such a significant delay would violate Montana's sentencing policy as articulated in 46-18-101, 46-18-102, and 46-18-115, as well as his right to due process of the law. The Supreme Court declined to specifically address the defendant's arguments but found that no order from the District Court would have been necessary for the state to pursue the defendant's voluntary surrender or an order of commitment because the stay expired by its own terms after the defendant's appeal was no longer pending. However, because the defendant's 6-month sentence was long expired by the time the state acted, the sentence could no longer be executed. The Supreme Court reversed, lifting the stay and reimposing the defendant's sentence. St. v. Nelson, 2021 MT 83, 403 Mont. 538, 484 P.3d 266.

Speedy Trial Applies to Delay Before Disposition of Case — Due Process Applies to Delay Between Disposition and Sentencing: The right to a speedy trial applies from arrest to the date the case is disposed of by either the date of the beginning of a trial or a plea. The right to a speedy trial does not apply to sentencing; rather, due process protects a defendant from unreasonable delay in sentencing. St. v. Maloney, 2015 MT 227, 380 Mont. 244, 354 P.3d 611, following St. v. Betterman, 2015 MT 39, 378 Mont. 182, 342 P.3d 971. The United States Supreme Court affirmed Betterman, holding that the guarantee to a speedy trial does not apply after a defendant has been found guilty at trial or has pleaded guilty to criminal charges. Betterman v. Montana, 578 US 437, 194 L Ed 723, 136 S Ct 1609 (2016).

Sentencing Judge Aware of Other Conviction That Was Overturned on Appeal — No Error: As a result of his involvement in one incident, defendant was convicted at separate trials of criminal possession of dangerous drugs and of aggravated assault. His drug possession conviction was reversed on appeal. Prior to this reversal, he was sentenced on the aggravated assault charge. The sentencing judge alluded to the drug conviction. Defendant claimed, in an appeal of the aggravated assault conviction, that the District Court erred by considering a conviction that had later been overturned. The Supreme Court upheld the sentencing, stating that if it is obvious from the record that the judge did not rely on the infirm conviction and the sentence would not have been different had the judge disregarded the prior conviction, the Supreme Court will find no prejudice to the defendant. St. v. Van Haele, 207 M 162, 675 P2d 79, 40 St. Rep. 1964 (1983).

Sentencing Judge's Private Out-of-Court Contact — Violation of Defendant's Right to Due Process: Private out-of-court contact by the sentencing judge with defendant's former employer affected the sentencing process and defendant's right to due process. Defendant was entitled to be resentenced by a different judge. St. v. Baker, 205 M 244, 667 P2d 416, 40 St. Rep. 1244 (1983).

Plea Bargain Nonbinding on Court: Defendant was charged with two counts of felony theft in a welfare fraud case. In conjunction with a plea bargain, she pleaded guilty to both counts and the State recommended a 3-year suspended sentence. The District Court ordered defendant to serve 3 years in prison with all but 30 days suspended and ordered restitution. Defendant contended the court erred by not imposing the sentence recommended by the State. The Supreme Court, relying on St. v. Mann, 169 M 306, 546 P2d 515 (1976), said that where the defendant was informed by the court that the recommendation of the State is not binding upon it and defendant stated she understood, she is bound by the sentence. St. v. Gray, 204 M 153, 665 P2d 781, 40 St. Rep. 735 (1983).

Factors in Sentencing — Reference to Retracted Psychiatric Report: At presentence hearing psychiatrist testified that his prior psychiatric report diagnosing defendant as antisocial was inaccurate. The judge's order stated that the report had been considered in passing sentence. The mere reference to the retracted report was not sufficient grounds for reversal, as the judge heard the retraction by the psychiatrist and there was no indication that he did not abide by the retraction. St. v. Hubbard, 200 M 106, 649 P2d 1331, 39 St. Rep. 1608 (1982).

Sentencing Prerequisites — Reading of Entire Transcript: The fact that the judge sentencing defendant following negligent homicide conviction did not read the entire trial transcript prior to passing sentence did not mandate reversal. St. v. Hubbard, 200 M 106, 649 P2d 1331, 39 St. Rep. 1608 (1982).

State's Introduction of Testimony and Exhibits at Sentencing Hearing: Petitioner alleged that the State's introduction of testimony and exhibits at his sentencing breached the plea agreement in which the State agreed to make "no sentencing recommendation". In view of the fact that there is no positive point in law on the State's introduction of evidence at the sentencing, as here, the State requested in fairness that a more equitable solution than granting request to withdraw the plea would be to allow petitioner to be resentenced, pursuant to the express terms of the plea agreement without any testimony or evidence introduced by the State or any statement by the prosecutor, and the Supreme Court so ordered. Gardipee v. Blodgett, 193 M 314, 631 P2d 1270, 38 St. Rep. 909 (1981).

Commission Comments

This statement expresses the purpose of sentencing which is not merely to punish but is oriented toward rehabilitation. It recognizes the necessity of focusing attention on the particular offender and that in many cases the best method of dealing with a particular offender is not incarceration.

2005 Amendment: (Version effective July 1, 2006) Chapter 449 in (3)(h) in second sentence before "counsel" deleted "court-appointed" and inserted "assigned"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2006.

Saving Clause: Section 78, Ch. 449, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 581 in (2)(a) at end inserted "and to hold an offender accountable"; in (2)(b) after "public" inserted "reduce crime, and increase the public sense of safety"; in (2)(d) at end inserted "to provide rehabilitation and reintegration of offenders back into the community"; inserted (3)(i) providing that sentencing practices should promote and support restorative justice principles; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

1997 Amendments: Chapter 189 in (3)(a)(v), at end, substituted “a state prison” for “the state prison or the women’s correctional system” (voided by Ch. 474 amendment); and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 474 in first sentence in (1) and at beginning of (2), after “correctional”, inserted “and sentencing”; in second sentence in (1), after “crime”, deleted “and for the rehabilitation of the convicted”; in first sentence in (2), after “is to”, substituted language outlining state policy and (3) outlining sentencing principles for “protect society by preventing crime through punishment and rehabilitation of the convicted. The legislature finds that an individual is responsible for and must be held accountable for the individual’s actions, including, whenever possible, the restoration of all pecuniary losses sustained by a victim of the offense. Corrections laws and programs must be implemented to impress upon each individual the responsibility for obeying the law. To achieve this end, it is the policy of the state to assure that prosecution of criminal offenses occurs whenever probable cause exists and that punishment of the convicted is certain, timely, and consistent. Furthermore, it is the state’s policy that persons convicted of a crime be dealt with in accordance with their individual characteristics, circumstances, needs, and potentialities. Finally, it is the policy of the state to recognize that the interests of crime victims should be considered so that, to the extent possible, victims of crime may be protected from threat of future harm by the offender.

(3) (a) Sentences imposed upon those convicted of crime must be based primarily on the following:

- (i) the crime committed;
- (ii) the prospects of rehabilitation of the offender;
- (iii) the circumstances under which the crime was committed;
- (iv) the criminal history of the offender; and
- (v) consideration of alternatives to imprisonment of the offender in the state prison or the women’s correctional system.

(b) Dangerous offenders who habitually violate the law and victimize the public must be removed from society and correctively treated in custody for long terms, as needed. Other offenders must be dealt with by probation, suspended sentence, community corrections, community service, or fine whenever the disposition appears practicable and not detrimental to the needs of public safety and the welfare of the individual. Whenever possible, sentences for offenders must include restitution to the victim, payment of costs as provided in 46-18-232, and payment of costs of court-appointed counsel as provided in 46-8-113.

(4) It is also the policy of the state that alternatives to imprisonment, such as community corrections, should be used whenever appropriate for nonviolent felony offenders in order to provide them opportunities to gain work experience, to learn life skills, to obtain education and training, or to participate in other activities that will reduce recidivism and enable offenders to become productive members of society”; and made minor changes in style.

1995 Amendments: Chapter 125 in (2), at end of second sentence, inserted phrase relating to restoration of pecuniary losses by victim and inserted last sentence relating to interests and protection of crime victims.

Chapter 546 in (3)(a)(v) substituted “women’s correctional system” for “women’s correctional center”; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Severability: Section 42, Ch. 125, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 10 in (3)(a)(v) substituted reference to the Women’s Correctional Center for reference to a women’s correctional facility; and made minor changes in style.

1991 Amendment: Inserted (3)(a)(v) concerning sentencing alternatives; in (3)(b), near middle of first sentence after “suspended sentence”, inserted “community corrections, community service”; inserted (4) concerning alternative sentencing for nonviolent felony offenders; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

1983 Amendment: Substituted a new, three-subsection policy relating to protection of society; acceptance of responsibility for one’s actions; certain, timely, and consistent punishment; individual treatment in fashioning punishments; what sentences must be primarily based on; and payment of restitution or costs for former text that read: “This chapter shall be liberally construed to the end that persons convicted of a crime shall be dealt with in accordance with their individual characteristics, circumstances, needs, and potentialities; that dangerous offenders shall be correctively treated in custody for long terms as needed; and that other offenders shall be dealt with by probation, suspended sentence, or fine whenever such disposition appears practicable and not detrimental to the needs of public safety and the welfare of the individual.”

CASES UNDER CURRENT LAW

Adequate Definition of Security for Jury — Willful Conduct Standard Applicable to Securities Act Violations — Omission of Investment Prospectus Not Fraudulent at Time — Securities Restitution Properly Awarded: The defendant, a pastor, was approached by the plaintiff, a member of his congregation, about investing money. The defendant convinced the plaintiff to purchase stock in the defendant's Mexico-domiciled company. Ultimately, the investment promises never materialized and the defendant was convicted of failure to register as a securities salesperson, failure to register a security, and fraudulent practices under the Securities Act of Montana. On appeal, the defendant argued that the term "security" was not adequately or specifically defined for the jury, that the "willful" standard was inappropriate to attach to the charges, that the conviction of fraudulent practices was improper because neither the statute nor administrative rule required an investment prospectus at the time of the violation, and that the award of restitution was improper. The Supreme Court held that the evidence showed that the jury reasonably concluded that the defendant had sold a security because the shares in the company constituted a stock, that the Legislature specifically included a willful standard for Securities Act violations, that the fraudulent practices conviction was improper because failure to provide a prospectus was not part of the statute at the time, and that the award of restitution was proper because the loss stemmed directly from the defendant's conduct. St. v. Himes, 2015 MT 91, 378 Mont. 419, 345 P.3d 297.

Sentencing Not Included in Right to Speedy Trial — Sentencing Delay Possible Violation of Due Process if Purposeful or Oppressive: Fourteen months elapsed between the defendant's pleading guilty and being sentenced. Prior to sentencing, the defendant filed a motion to dismiss, claiming that the delay in sentencing violated his right to due process, which the District Court denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The court concluded that the constitutional right to a speedy trial does not extend from conviction to sentencing and that a sentencing delay that is either sufficiently purposeful or oppressive may constitute a due process violation but that neither factor was substantial or demonstrable in this case. St. v. Betterman, 2015 MT 39, 378 Mont. 182, 342 P.3d 971. See also St. v. Maloney, 2015 MT 227, 380 Mont. 244, 354 P.3d 611.

No Improper Negative Inference Based on Defendant's Denial of Guilt: Although mentioning a lack of remorse in sentencing, the District Court discussed several other factors supporting the defendant's sentence. In addition, the record established affirmative evidence of the defendant's lack of remorse; therefore, the trial court did not improperly draw a negative inference based on the defendant's denial of guilt. St. v. Champagne, 2013 MT 190, 371 Mont. 35, 305 P.3d 61.

Restitution Costs — Specified Amount Required: A District Court imposed unspecified restitution costs, recognizing that a child victim of sexual assault may need additional and ongoing treatment. The Supreme Court remanded, requiring the restitution costs be in a specified amount. St. v. Champagne, 2013 MT 190, 371 Mont. 35, 305 P.3d 61.

Affirmative Evidence of Defendant's Lack of Remorse Sufficient Justification for Sentence Enhancement: When the defendant's lack of remorse was a main theme during the trial and was discussed at length during the sentencing hearing, the judge's conclusion that the defendant demonstrated no remorse for her actions that resulted in the death of another motorist was based on competent evidence and was not improper. St. v. Bekemans, 2013 MT 11, 368 Mont. 235, 293 P.3d 843.

District Court Failed to Reference Lack of Remorse In Record — Sentence Illegal: After the defendant was convicted of assault with a weapon, the District Court sentenced him to 20 years at Montana State Prison with no restriction on parole, based in part on the defendant's lack of remorse for the stabbing. Relying on St. v. Duncan, 2008 MT 148, 343 Mont. 220, 183 P.3d 111, the Supreme Court reversed the sentence and remanded for correction because in its sentence pronouncement, the District Court did not affirmatively point to any evidence in the record to support the finding of lack of remorse. St. v. Briscoe, 2012 MT 152, 365 Mont. 383, 282 P.3d 657.

Consideration of Aggravating and Mitigating Factors — Compliance With Sentencing Policies: Defendant appealed his sentence for aggravated assault, arguing the District Court neglected to follow sentencing policies by failing to account for his mental illness and his attempts to seek mental health treatment. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding the District Court followed the law and appropriately considered the aggravating and mitigating factors in the case, namely the defendant's considerable criminal record and his mental illness. St. v. Habets, 2011 MT 275, 362 Mont. 406, 264 P.3d 1139.

Prosecutor's Arguments During Sentencing Likening Defendant to an Animal — Alleged Violation of Defendant's Right to Dignity — No Right to Resentencing: The defendant was charged with attempted deliberate homicide for a bar fight. At trial, it was alleged the defendant had continued to punch the victim in the face 15 to 20 times after the victim had fallen to the ground and was motionless. The defendant was acquitted of attempted deliberate homicide and convicted of aggravated assault. During the sentencing hearing, the prosecutor referred to the "savage nature" of the beating, stating that "Some animals need to be caged" and describing the defendant's actions as "inhuman." The District Court sentenced the defendant to the maximum sentence of 20 years. In his appeal to the Supreme Court, the defendant argued that the prosecutor's comments violated his constitutional right to dignity and he should be resentenced. The Supreme Court disagreed because the defendant did not demonstrate that the prosecutor's comments, as offensive as they may have been, played any part in the District Court's sentence, which was within sentencing guidelines. St. v. Kingman, 2011 MT 269, 362 Mont. 330, 264 P.3d 1104.

Sentence Affirmed — No Improper Consideration of Defendant's Refusal to Admit Guilt: The defendant argued that the District Court's imposition of sentence violated the defendant's right against self-incrimination because two witnesses for the state testified during sentencing that the defendant continued to deny molesting the victim. The Supreme Court concluded that the record did not support the defendant's argument that the sentence was improperly based upon the defendant's exercise of the right against self-incrimination and refusal to take responsibility for the crime, noting the state's witnesses did not suggest that the defendant be punished for not admitting to the crime but, instead, testified that the defendant's denial posed risks to the victim and barriers to treatment. St. v. Howard, 2011 MT 246, 362 Mont. 196, 265 P.3d 606.

No Error in Consideration of Prior Public Service at Sentencing: The burden was on the defendant to provide legal authority or an argument that the sentencing court did not sentence the defendant in a neutral manner with respect to social or economic status. The defendant failed to provide any authority for his position, and thus his argument failed. St. v. Morris, 2010 MT 259, 358 Mont. 307, 245 P.3d 512.

Full Restitution for Theft Without Consideration of Offender's Ability to Pay — No Error: Following conviction for theft by common scheme, Brownback was ordered to pay restitution in full. Brownback appealed on grounds that the sentencing court erred by failing to consider Brownback's ability to pay restitution. The Supreme Court disagreed. The former provision requiring a sentencing court to consider an offender's ability to pay was removed from the restitution statutes in 2003 and was replaced by the mandate that District Courts require an offender to pay full restitution. Therefore, the sentencing court did not err in requiring Brownback to pay full restitution without considering the ability to pay. St. v. Brownback, 2010 MT 96, 356 Mont. 190, 232 P.3d 385.

State as Victim of Crime — Restitution Owed: Brownback's mother engaged in a 6-year scheme to embezzle money from the state and then pass the money on to Brownback to support his gambling addiction. An investigation into his mother's embezzlement led to charges against Brownback for theft by common scheme. Following conviction, Brownback was ordered to pay nearly $1 million in restitution, including $739,312 to the state for the money his mother embezzled and passed on to him. Brownback contested the restitution award on grounds that he did not know that the money he received from his mother was embezzled from the state. The Supreme Court affirmed the restitution award. But for Brownback's continuing course of conduct, the state would not have lost $739,312. The causation standard for restitution was therefore satisfied, and because the state was a victim that suffered pecuniary loss, the state was entitled to full restitution. Even though Brownback thought the money was coming from his stepfather rather than the state, Brownback knew all along that he was obtaining unauthorized control over the property of the owner, so Brownback's ignorance that the money was embezzled from the state did not negate the mental state for theft. A person may not steal property from a stranger with impunity, so Brownback's mistake as to the identity of the source of the money did not affect the causal relationship. St. v. Brownback, 2010 MT 96, 356 Mont. 190, 232 P.3d 385, distinguishing St. v. Breeding, 2008 MT 162, 343 Mont. 323, 184 P.3d 313.

Remand Appropriate Remedy for Partially Illegal Sentence: In order to reconcile disparate past decisions regarding the appropriate remedy for a partially illegal sentence, the Supreme Court adopted a rule that when a portion of a sentence is illegal, the best remedy is to remand the case to the District Court to correct the illegal provision unless, under the particular circumstances of the case, the illegal portion of the sentence cannot be corrected. In those instances, the case will be remanded with instructions to strike the illegal conditions. St. v. Heafner, 2010 MT 87, 356 Mont. 128, 231 P.3d 1087, followed in St. v. Ring, 2014 MT 49, 374 Mont. 109, 321 P.3d 800, and Kalispell v. Salsgiver, 2019 MT 126, 396 Mont. 57, 443 P.3d 504. See also St. v. Boyd, 2021 MT 323, 407 Mont. 1, 501 P.3d 409.

Failure of Defendant to Admit Incest — Sentence Not Considered More Harsh Given Relevant Sentencing Factors: Bullman consistently maintained that he was not guilty of incest with his stepdaughter because he was never married to her mother. Because Bullman refused to admit guilt and was thus ineligible for community-based treatment, he asserted that he was sentenced more harshly by being sentenced to prison. The Supreme Court examined the record and disagreed. The sentencing court was aware of the prohibition against sentencing a defendant to prison because the defendant does not admit guilt, but the court also considered numerous other relevant factors in sentencing Bullman to prison in addition to the expert opinion that Bullman was not a candidate for community-based treatment, including: (1) the significant impact of the crime on the victim; (2) the need to protect society; (3) Bullman's need for appropriate treatment; (4) Bullman's criminal history; and (5) Bullman's long history of substance abuse. Given these sentencing factors, the Supreme Court could not conclude that Bullman was sentenced to prison for failure to admit guilt, and the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Bullman, 2009 MT 37, 349 M 228, 203 P3d 768 (2009).

Forty-Year Sentence for Two Counts of Vehicular Homicide Legal and Affirmed: Following conviction for two counts of vehicular homicide while under the influence, Baker was sentenced to 15 years suspended on the first count and 25 years with 5 years suspended on the second count. Baker contended that the 40-year sentence violated Montana's correctional and sentencing policies because the length of the sentence was not understandable, commensurate with punishment imposed on other persons committing the same offense, or neutral with respect to Baker's race. The Supreme Court concluded that the sentence was well within the statutory parameters as to length and therefore legal. Baker's sentence was affirmed. St. v. Baker, 2008 MT 396, 347 M 159, 197 P3d 1001 (2008).

No Error in Treating Retribution as Component of Punishment: Rickman asserted that the sentencing court improperly considered retribution as a factor in sentencing Rickman to life with no parole eligibility for 55 years for deliberate homicide under the felony-murder rule. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that retribution has repeatedly been held to be a component of punishment. It was appropriate for the sentencing court to consider that the victim was innocent and to consider the impact of the homicide on the victim's family. The judgment and commitment of the sentencing judge indicated that retribution was only the third basis for the sentence, and in light of Rickman's minimal potential for rehabilitation and Rickman's significant threat to the public, the sentencing court's use of the word "retribution" comported with state sentencing policies and procedures. Rickman's sentence was affirmed. St. v. Rickman, 2008 MT 142, 343 M 120, 183 P3d 49 (2008). See also St. v. Kirkbride, 2008 MT 178, 343 M 409, 185 P3d 340 (2008).

Partial Parole Restrictions Affirmed: Rickman was sentenced to life with no parole eligibility for 55 years for deliberate homicide under the felony-murder rule. Rickman appealed the sentence on grounds that the sentencing court had no authority to restrict parole eligibility for only part of the sentence. Noting that challenges to partial parole restriction have been upheld since at least 1988, the Supreme Court disagreed with Rickman's assertion. A sentencing court has discretion to impose parole restrictions, and if a sentencing court has discretion to impose a restriction of no parole eligibility, then a sentencing court can likewise impose a restriction of limited parole eligibility. St. v. Rickman, 2008 MT 142, 343 M 120, 183 P3d 49 (2008). See also St. v. Kirkbride, 2008 MT 178, 343 M 409, 185 P3d 340 (2008), and St. v. Bullman, 2009 MT 37, 349 M 228, 203 P3d 768 (2009).

Negligent Homicide Considered Crime of Violence — Consideration of Sentencing Alternatives to Prison Not Required: English asserted that because negligent homicide is not a crime of violence, the trial court erred by failing to consider sentencing alternatives to prison pursuant to subsection (3)(f) of this section when sentencing English to 20 years in prison for negligent homicide. The Supreme Court found the argument unpersuasive. Under 46-18-104, a crime in which the offender causes serious bodily injury or death to a person other than the offender is defined as a violent crime. English negligently caused the death of another person, and the trial court did not err in ruling that the negligent homicide was a crime of violence or by failing to consider sentencing alternatives to prison. St. v. English, 2006 MT 177, 333 M 23, 140 P3d 454 (2006).

Sentence for Negligent Homicide Not Considered “Trial Tax” in Violation of Due Process: English contended that a sentence of 20 years with 10 suspended for negligent homicide constituted a “trial tax” imposed for taking the case to trial rather than pleading guilty, in view of the disparity between his sentence and cases cited by the trial court in which defendants pleaded guilty or nolo contendere. The Supreme Court disagreed. The trial court focused on the aggravating circumstances in English’s case, not on the sentences imposed in prior negligent homicide cases, and there was no indication that the trial court imposed a “trial tax” on English for proceeding to trial. There may be appropriate differences between sentences imposed on defendants who have pleaded guilty and those who have proceeded to trial for the same offense. The sentence was within statutory parameters, did not violate English’s due process rights, and was affirmed. St. v. English, 2006 MT 177, 333 M 23, 140 P3d 454 (2006).

Lack of Remorse Not Sole Sentence Enhancement Factor — Incest Sentence Affirmed: Defendant contended that the sentencing court erred in augmenting a sentence for incest simply because defendant did not show remorse or admit guilt. The Supreme Court noted that St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002), prohibits enhancement of a sentence solely because a defendant is not remorseful or refuses to be accountable for the defendant’s conduct. However, in this case, the sentencing court did not rely solely on defendant’s attitude in enhancing the incest sentence but also considered defendant’s risk of reoffending, risk to society, prospects for rehabilitation, character, background, history, and mental and physical functioning. Thus, Shreves was distinguishable, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. J.C., 2004 MT 75, 320 M 411, 87 P3d 501 (2004).

Challenge to Equity of Sentence Properly With Sentence Review Division, Not Supreme Court: A challenge to the equity of a sentence, as opposed to the legality of a sentence, properly lies with the Sentence Review Division, not the Supreme Court, which does not review a sentence on appeal for mere inequity or disparity. In this case, defendant cloaked an equity challenge in the vestiges of a constitutional argument in seeking Supreme Court review, but the court declined to address it, leaving the matter to the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Legg, 2004 MT 26, 319 M 362, 84 P3d 648 (2004), following St. v. DeSalvo, 273 M 343, 903 P2d 202 (1995), and followed in St. v. Baker, 2008 MT 396, 347 M 159, 197 P3d 1001 (2008).

Failure to Pay Debts Noted in Sentencing — Poverty and Social Status Not Improperly Considered: The District Court listed numerous reasons for sentencing Nolan for criminal endangerment and resisting arrest, including the violence of the offenses at issue, Nolan’s 25 traffic-related convictions, his 2 prior felony convictions involving violence, and the numerous opportunities previously given to Nolan to be a responsible, law-abiding citizen. One of the court’s additional considerations was that Nolan did not pay his debts, including child support, while employed. Nolan contended that the court’s consideration of his poverty as a sentencing criteria was an unconstitutional infringement on his due process rights. However, failure to pay debts does not generally equate with poverty, and because indigency or poverty was not the touchstone for imposing the maximum allowable punishment, the District Court did not improperly rely on Nolan’s poverty in sentencing Nolan to less than the maximum penalty allowed. Nolan’s contention that the sentencing court relied on his social status was also unfounded, even though testimony was given regarding the number of Nolan’s children who were born out of wedlock. Nolan did not object to the inquiries when they were made, and Nolan opened the door to the inquiries by presenting both witness testimony and his own statement regarding being a good father and loving his children. Nolan’s due process rights were not violated through mention of his failure to pay bills and father children out of wedlock, and the sentences were affirmed. St. v. Nolan, 2003 MT 13, 314 M 47, 62 P3d 1118 (2003), distinguishing St. v. Farrell, 207 M 483, 676 P2d 168 (1984), and St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000).

Sentence Based on Refusal to Admit Guilt Violative of Right Against Self-Incrimination: Shreves was convicted of deliberate homicide and sentenced to 100 years in prison, with no parole for 60 years. At trial, Shreves chose to testify on his own behalf and assert his innocence, and at sentencing, Shreves chose not to testify, but his counsel indicated that Shreves maintained his innocence. The District Court imposed the sentence based in significant part on Shreves’ failure to show remorse or responsibility. Shreves appealed on grounds that it was improper to hold his refusal to admit to the crime against him in determining the sentence. The state contended that the sentencing court properly considered the lack of remorse as a factor relevant to Shreves’ rehabilitation and the danger presented to the community and argued that the lack of remorse was based on trial testimony and evidence. The Supreme Court considered whether Shreves adequately invoked the right to maintain silence, the scope of the oral sentence that controlled over the subsequent written sentence as it related to the entire sentence, and the District Court’s decision to base its sentence in large part on Shreves' refusal to admit to the crime. Although lack of remorse can be considered as a sentencing factor, a sentence that is based on a refusal to admit guilt cannot be upheld. Here, the Supreme Court was unable to find a sentencing distinction between punishing Shreves for remaining silent and the proper consideration of Shreves' failure to show remorse. A sentencing court may not draw a negative inference of lack of remorse from a defendant's silence at sentencing when the defendant has maintained innocence throughout the proceedings. Shreves was improperly penalized for maintaining his innocence pursuant to the constitutional right to remain silent. The sentence was therefore illegal. Shreves' conviction was reversed, and the case was remanded for resentencing. St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002), distinguished in St. v. J.C., 2004 MT 75, 320 M 411, 87 P3d 501 (2004), and St. v. Burkhart, 2004 MT 372, 325 M 27, 103 P3d 1037 (2004). See also St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979 (1991), St. v. Kelly, 265 M 298, 876 P2d 641 (1994), St. v. Fuller, 276 M 155, 915 P2d 809 (1996), St. v. Rennaker, 2007 MT 10, 335 M 274, 150 P3d 960 (2007), and St. v. Garcia, 2011 MT 130, 360 Mont. 537, 254 P.3d 589.

Mental Disease Not Affecting Ability to Appreciate Criminality of Behavior — Prison Sentence, Rather Than Hospitalization, Appropriate: Smith contended that the District Court erred in concluding that he did not suffer from a mental disease or defect that rendered him unable to appreciate the criminality of his behavior or to conform it to the requirements of law, pursuant to 46-14-311 and 46-14-312, and that because of his personality disorder, he should have been sentenced to the state hospital rather than the state prison for felony assault and assault on a peace officer in order to satisfy state principles of prevention and reformation in light of his unique and particular posture as a mentally ill person. However, even assuming that Smith had a mental disease or defect, the District Court found that Smith's mental condition did not have the effect of rendering him unable to appreciate the criminality of his behavior or to conform it to the requirements of law. Smith failed to satisfy this additional element of 46-14-311, so hospitalization was not required under 46-14-312. St. v. Smith, 2000 MT 57, 299 M 6, 997 P2d 768, 57 St. Rep. 272 (2000).

Incorrect Sentences for Operating Vehicle Without Insurance and Accident Involving Damage to Vehicle Reversed: Clark was charged on two occasions with multiple misdemeanor traffic offenses. The District Court properly based its sentencing on the factors in this section, but incorrectly applied the 1995 version of 61-6-304 in sentencing Clark to 6 months in the county jail for operating a vehicle without valid liability insurance when the 1993 version of the statute in effect at the time that the crime was committed allowed a maximum sentence of 10 days. The court also sentenced Clark to 10 days' imprisonment and fined him $100 for a conviction under the 1995 version of 61-7-118 related to an accident involving damage to a vehicle, but the 1993 version in effect at the time that the crime was committed allowed for the imposition of imprisonment or a fine, but not both, upon a first conviction. These sentencing errors constituted reversible error as a matter of law, and the Supreme Court remanded for resentencing consistent with the applicable statutes. St. v. Clark, 2000 MT 40, 298 M 300, 997 P2d 107, 57 St. Rep. 185 (2000).

Similar Purposes of Adult and Youth Sentencing Statutes Regarding Public Safety and Rehabilitation: In its transfer order, the Youth Court concluded that adult sentencing policies are similar to the sentencing purposes of the Montana Youth Court Act in that both are designed to ensure rehabilitation, accountability, and protection of the community. Spina contended that the conclusion was a misstatement of the law because the declaration of purpose in the Montana Youth Court Act does not promote accountability. The Supreme Court held that, although not identical, the statutes have similar purposes, including holding individuals accountable for their actions through the imposition of restitutionary measures. St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421, 56 St. Rep. 467 (1999).

Prison Murder — Death Sentence Not Imposed Under Influence of Passion, Prejudice, or Arbitrary Factors: Johnson was convicted of killing another prison inmate and contended on appeal that the death sentence was imposed under the influence of passion, prejudice, or other arbitrary factors because the District Court predicated its sentence on Montana's correctional policy, as set forth in this section, but that the policy does not expressly provide for death as punishment for any crime. The Supreme Court agreed that the statute does not expressly discuss death as a punishment for criminal conduct, but noted that, being a general declaration of state correctional policy, the statute also does not discuss most of the sentencing options allowed by law. Notwithstanding the fact that the death sentence has been affirmed as constitutional, the District Court's findings reflected its consideration of the general statutory principles that a sentence be based primarily on the crime committed, the prospects of rehabilitation, the circumstances under which the crime was committed, and the offender's criminal history. The circumstances of this crime, coupled with Johnson's long history of assaultive and predatory behavior both in and out of prison, were reflected in the court's analysis and showed that the court carefully and dispassionately considered all the evidence before it concluded that the death penalty was appropriate. St. v. Johnson, 1998 MT 289, 291 M 501, 969 P2d 925, 55 St. Rep. 1186 (1998).

Application of Repealed Dangerous Offender Law to Offender Who Committed Crime Before Repeal and Was Sentenced After Repeal: The rule that the sentencing law in effect at the time a crime is committed governs the sentence to be imposed applies to situations in which that law is amended after the crime is committed but before the sentence is imposed and in which the law still exists when the sentence is imposed. It is the law as it read prior to the amendment that governs the sentence. This rule does not apply to a situation in which a sentencing law in effect when a crime is committed is repealed before imposition of sentence. In this case, a dangerous offender statute in effect when Wilson committed his crimes was repealed before the judge sentenced him for the crimes, yet the judge used it to designate Wilson as a dangerous offender, thus increasing the punishment. In this type of situation, when the effect of the repeal is to lessen, not to increase, punishment and the repealer has no saving clause, the law in effect at the time of sentencing applies. Because the dangerous offender statute had been repealed before sentencing, it was not in effect at the time of sentencing and did not apply to the sentence. St. v. Wilson, 279 M 34, 926 P2d 712, 53 St. Rep. 1034 (1996).

Dangerous Offender Determination — Record Found to Show "Articulated Reasons": Hofman pleaded guilty to aggravated assault, felony assault (now assault with a weapon), misdemeanor assault, and criminal mischief. At the time of sentencing, the District Court designated Hofman a dangerous offender (See 1995 repeal of 46-18-404). Citing St. v. Ford, 218 M 215, 707 P2d 16 (1985), Hofman alleged that the District Court record lacked "articulated reasons" for the designation as dangerous offender. The Supreme Court reviewed the record and noted that the District Court Judge referred to facts demonstrating Hofman's propensity for violence and pointed out that Hofman had been given numerous opportunities to change. The Supreme Court held that the District Court adequately stated the reasons for the designation. St. v. Hofman, 275 M 455, 913 P2d 1256, 53 St. Rep. 223 (1996).

Alternative Sentencing for Nonviolent Offenders a Consideration, Not a Presumption: Stevens asserted that state law created a presumption that nonviolent felony offenders be alternatively sentenced rather than imprisoned and that the trial court's statement that the state had placed special emphasis on punishing sex offenders when the victims were under 16 years of age was contrary to the policy of alternative sentencing. The Supreme Court held that the record indicated that the trial court had considered alternative sentencing and found it inappropriate because of the nature of the crime and that the sentencing order was not error. St. v. Stevens, 273 M 452, 904 P2d 590, 52 St. Rep. 1078 (1995).

Prisoner Rehabilitation Not State Obligation: The plaintiffs sought recovery in tort from the state on the basis that the state was negligent in releasing a nonrehabilitated prisoner who killed their child. The Supreme Court held that the state is not a guarantor of its rehabilitation facilities and that the court would not impose that obligation on the state. VanLuchene v. St., 244 M 397, 797 P2d 932, 47 St. Rep. 1609 (1990), followed in King v. St., 259 M 393, 856 P2d 954, 50 St. Rep. 848 (1993).

Consecutive Terms Allowable for Sexual Assault: The District Court did not err in sentencing defendant to two consecutive terms upon conviction of sexual assault when the factors in this section were considered and the sentence fell within the legal limits of 45-5-502. St. v. Gilpin, 232 M 56, 756 P2d 445, 45 St. Rep. 863 (1988).

Inability to Pay Restitution — Not Violative of Equal Protection in Light of State Correctional Policy and Previous Offenses: A defendant convicted of felony theft was sentenced to 5 years in the state prison with 2 years suspended and, in addition, was ordered to pay restitution. The defendant asserted on appeal that he was sentenced to a prison term because of his indigency, in violation of his right to equal protection. However, the District Judge specifically noted the prison term was necessary to protect the property of others and that the defendant's criminal record contained three previous misdemeanor thefts. The Supreme Court found these to be sufficient reasons to support incarceration and upheld the state's correctional policy outlined in 46-18-101. The court noted that the sentence was well within the parameters of punishment for felony theft in 45-6-301. Finding no abuse of discretion or violation of the defendant's constitutional rights, the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Carroll, 220 M 466, 716 P2d 212, 43 St. Rep. 531 (1986).

Sentence of 100 Years — Based on Prevention of Future Crimes: On conviction of deliberate homicide the defendant received the maximum allowable sentence, 100 years, and was determined ineligible for designation as a nondangerous offender, or for parole. On appeal, he argued the sentence was not based on any credible evidence presented at the sentencing hearing or contained in the presentence report, but was motivated by the trial court's desire for vengeance on behalf of the victim's family. The court indicated it imposed the sentence because it believed defendant should be removed from society. The Supreme Court held that the sentence did not violate Art. II, sec. 28, Mont. Const., which requires that "laws for the punishment of crime shall be founded on the principles of prevention and reformation" (amended in 1998 to read "prevention, reformation, public safety, and restitution for victims"), nor did it violate 46-18-101, which provides that the policy behind sentencing is the rehabilitation, if possible, of convicts. Article II, sec. 28, Mont. Const., allows a trial court in its discretion to base a sentence on the principle of prevention of future crimes. This includes the power to remove a person from society, as the court found necessary in this case. Also, the sentence is within the permissible statutory range, and in the absence of clear abuse of discretion is properly reviewed by the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985), followed in St. v. Valcourt, 254 M 174, 835 P2d 753, 49 St. Rep. 686 (1992).

Constitutional Requirement Satisfied by Sentence Founded on Prevention and Reformation: The defendant, who has an extensive record of driving under the influence of alcohol, was convicted on three counts of driving under the influence (DUI). She was sentenced to serve time in the county jail. The defendant contends her sentence violates the constitution as it does not provide for her rehabilitation. Article II, sec. 28, Mont. Const., requires that laws for punishment of crime be founded on the principles of prevention and reformation (amended in 1998 to read "prevention, reformation, public safety, and restitution for victims"). The defendant's sentence furthers the prevention principle through her incarceration, addresses the reformation principle through ordering her to abstain from the use of alcohol, and provides the avoidance of further incarceration as an incentive to reform. Thus, the constitutional requirement is satisfied. St. v. Bruns, 213 M 372, 691 P2d 817, 41 St. Rep. 2178 (1984).

No Proof Erroneous Information Considered by Sentencing Court: The defendants were sentenced to lengthy prison terms for deliberate homicide. They contend the sentencing judge considered information from a psychiatrist that is not directly reflected in the record, but the record does not support their contention. The comments concerning the doctor's report were made by defense counsel during oral presentation to the sentencing court. The defendants have failed to show that any information furnished by the psychiatrist was considered improperly by the court; thus they have failed to show any erroneous information was considered by the court in passing sentence. St. v. Hintz, 213 M 364, 691 P2d 814, 41 St. Rep. 2172 (1984).

Objection to Sentence for Punishment Rather Than Prevention and Reformation — Lack of Proof: Objection that sentence was for punishment rather than for prevention of further crime and reformation of defendant was clearly without merit, as there was no evidence or authority cited by appellant to establish that the sentence would not deter him or others from future wrongful conduct or that the sentence would not lead to reformation. St. v. Stroud, 210 M 58, 683 P2d 459, 41 St. Rep. 919 (1984).

Mention of "Setting an Example" at Sentencing — Not Error Viewed in Context: Although the trial court did mention "setting an example" when imposing sentence, that is not a reason for remanding for resentencing as a violation of Art. II, sec. 28, Mont. Const., because the judge's use of the presentencing report and his reasons for the length of the sentence indicate no impropriety in the sentencing. St. v. DeSilva, 209 M 169, 679 P2d 1237, 41 St. Rep. 620 (1984).

Consideration of Indigency in Sentencing — Violation of Due Process: Defendant was convicted of theft of public assistance funds in violation of 45-6-301 and sentenced to the maximum term of imprisonment, 10 years. The sentence was then suspended on the conditions that defendant seek alcohol treatment, make restitution of the funds, and pay the fees of his court-appointed attorney. The Supreme Court ruled that if the reason for defendant's receiving the maximum sentence was that he is indigent and will therefore make restitution slowly, the sentence is a violation of his right to due process. The court remanded the case for reconsideration of the sentence in view of the opinion. St. v. Farrell, 207 M 483, 676 P2d 168, 41 St. Rep. 91 (1984), followed in St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000).

Timing of Sentencing Required to Bring Defendant Within Operation of Statute: Where the defendant was convicted of two counts of negligent homicide following a previous conviction for burglary within 5 years prior to the negligent homicide convictions, the District Court did not err in sentencing the defendant under the persistent felony offender statute. The defendant's contention that he is not "presently being sentenced for a second felony" until after the court has determined to sentence him to a term of imprisonment for more than 1 year is a hypertechnical construction of the statute intended to avoid the clear intention of the Legislature. The defendant's case is covered by the legislative mandate (deleted by a 1983 amendment) that the chapter be liberally construed to the end that dangerous offenders be correctively treated in custody for long terms as needed. St. v. Ballard, 202 M 81, 655 P2d 986, 39 St. Rep. 2342 (1982).

Discretion of Court — Different Sentences for Co-Offenders: On appellate review, undermining the legality of a sentence requires a showing that the judge abused his discretion in the sentencing process. There was no abuse of discretion where defendant and another were separately convicted of the same burglary, the other person was offered and accepted a bargain for a 3-year deferred sentence, and defendant was offered a bargain for a 10-year sentence with 5 years suspended, refused it, and was tried, convicted, and sentenced to 10 years. There was a strong possibility that his alibi defense was frivolous, and he had a prior felony record. St. v. White, 200 M 123, 650 P2d 765, 39 St. Rep. 1619 (1982).

Codefendants — Disparate Sentences — Suspension Versus Twenty Years: Defendant, a 28-year-old male with a history of involvement with weapons, and his codefendant, a 58-year-old alcoholic with no record of violence, were each convicted of two counts of kidnapping and two counts of assault in regard to two girls 12 and 14 years old. Defendant was sentenced to two consecutive 10-year prison sentences on the kidnapping convictions and to 6 months on each assault charge, to run concurrently with each other and with the kidnapping sentences. Codefendant, defendant's natural father, received a 10-year sentence, all of which was suspended on the condition that he commit himself to alcohol treatment at a state institution and remain a law-abiding citizen. The Supreme Court ruled that there was no denial of equal protection as claimed by defendant. St. v. Herrera, 197 M 462, 643 P2d 588, 39 St. Rep. 731 (1982).

Dangerous Offender Determination — Use of Defective Information: After defendant and his father kidnapped two minor girls and took them to the father's house, father told defendant to "go get the gun" and defendant did so and placed it between the two men on the couch where they were sitting. The girls were not threatened with the gun. The trial judge told defendant that "the reason you're designated a dangerous offender is that's about the fourth gun incident you were in". Review of the record on appeal showed: (1) a possible misapprehension of defendant's actual criminal background and apparent confusion as to the crimes involved; (2) no convincing evidence that this was defendant's fourth gun incident; and (3) an indication that one of the prior convictions considered by the judge was constitutionally defective because defendant did not have counsel. The sentencing court cannot rely upon a previous criminal record in sentencing if that record contains constitutionally infirm convictions. Defendant had a right to have his sentence based upon substantially correct information and was entitled to a rehearing on his designation as a dangerous offender. St. v. Herrera, 197 M 462, 643 P2d 588, 39 St. Rep. 731 (1982).

Partially Disabled Defendant — Excessive Sentence: Ordinarily a sentence is not cruel and unusual punishment if it is within the maximum established by statute, and review properly lies with the Sentence Review Division. The fact that defendant is partially disabled does not automatically render him incapable of harming other persons or society, and the facts here are sufficient to justify the designation of dangerous offender. St. v. Austad, 197 M 70, 641 P2d 1373, 39 St. Rep. 356 (1982).

Reasonable Notice as to Witness — Remoteness of Evidence: The State, during sentencing, intentionally surprised the defendant by testimony of two women with whom the defendant had allegedly had sexual contact without consent some 10 years earlier. The court ordered resentencing because of the State's denial of reasonable notice. The defendant did not waive his right to complain when he did not request a continuance at the time of sentencing. The question of admissibility of such evidence as having a bearing on the sentencing and as to whether it is remote and uncorroborated was left to the reasonable discretion of the trial court. St. v. Price, 191 M-1, 622 P2d 160, 37 St. Rep. 1926 (1980).

Presentencing Hearing — Cross-Examination: An in-chambers interview with the victim in order to determine her feelings as to an appropriate sentence, where defendant was absent, defense counsel was denied cross-examination, and no opportunity was afforded the defense to refute the information, violated defendant's right to be sentenced under circumstances free from misinformation. Sentence was vacated and the case remanded for resentencing. St. v. Higley, 190 M 412, 621 P2d 1043, 37 St. Rep. 1942 (1980).

Constitutionality of Death Sentence: Under the law at the time of the crime, which has since been amended and then repealed, there was discretion in the procedures for imposing the death sentence. The statutes were held to have met the three general criteria requisite to a valid death penalty statutory scheme: (1) at least one statutory aggravating circumstance before a death sentence may be considered; (2) allowance for consideration of mitigating circumstances relating to the individual defendant; and (3) prompt judicial review. The Montana statutory scheme afforded the defendant the procedural safeguards necessary to protect his substantive right to be sentenced without arbitrariness or caprice. St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428 (1980).

CASES UNDER FORMER "NONDANGEROUS OFFENDER" DESIGNATION LAW

Designation as Dangerous Offender Supported by Record: Collier was arrested and charged with solicitation of deliberate homicide, which was reduced to criminal endangerment by a plea bargain. At the District Court level and on appeal, Collier challenged her designation as a dangerous offender for purposes of parole eligibility. The Supreme Court reviewed the findings of fact made by the District Court and noted that the District Court had made findings concerning her lack of remorse, the fact that she did not act with strong provocation, and the possibility of her committing the crime again. Because of these findings, the Supreme Court upheld the designation as a dangerous offender. St. v. Collier, 277 M 46, 919 P2d 376, 53 St. Rep. 534 (1996).

Error in Determining Offender Status When Statute Not in Effect: As set out in St. v. Stevens, 273 M 452, 904 P2d 590 (1995), the law in effect at the time of the commission of a crime, rather than the law at the time of sentencing, controls as to the possible sentence. Finley committed an offense on August 20, 1989. At that time, 46-18-404 (now repealed) did not grant a District Court the authority to determine dangerous or nondangerous offender status. The amendment that instituted that authority took effect October 1, 1989. Thus, the District Court had no authority to determine Finley's status, and its designation of Finley's offender status was reversible error. St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep. 310 (1996), followed in Chandler v. Mahoney, 2000 MT 294, 302 M 309, 18 P3d 312, 57 St. Rep. 1247 (2000).

Designation Upheld: In a prosecution for kidnapping and assault, the District Court articulated numerous reasons for designating each defendant as a dangerous offender. These reasons included a chemical dependency problem, continuing to drink and engage in unlawful acts despite treatment, numerous misdemeanor convictions and a juvenile record, lack of remorse, disrespect for and a defiance of the law and its officers, a failure to recognize that the unlawful actions were wrong, and a finding that the defendant posed a threat to the public and the victims. When the District Court clearly articulated its reasons in support of its determination that the defendants presented a danger to society and the victims and its reasons were fully supported by the record, the court did not abuse its discretion when it designated the defendants dangerous offenders (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) for the purposes of parole. St. v. Eichenlaub, 272 M 332, 901 P2d 90, 52 St. Rep. 786 (1995).

Dangerousness to Others as Basis for Designation as Dangerous Offender: Henrich was convicted of several crimes stemming from the sexual abuse of his daughters and was designated a dangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404). Henrich appealed the designation, claiming that there was insufficient evidence of his dangerousness. The Supreme Court found that in making the designation, the District Court considered the evidence at trial, the presentence investigation report, and the sentencing hearing. The District Court found that Henrich was a danger to his daughters. Because dangerousness to others may serve as a basis for the designation, the Supreme Court upheld the designation. St. v. Henrich, 268 M 258, 886 P2d 402, 51 St. Rep. 1275 (1994).

No Statutory Requirement of Dangerous Offender Designation — Court's Discretion: The provisions of 46-18-404 (now repealed) are mandatory only when the circumstances require the court to sentence one as a nondangerous offender. If a defendant satisfies only one of the prerequisites of this section for designation as nondangerous, then the court may in its discretion designate the defendant either dangerous or nondangerous. The court must exercise its discretion, and when the court refused to do so because it erroneously interpreted statute and concluded that it had no discretion, its designation of the defendant as dangerous must be reversed. St. v. Lorenz, 267 M 186, 883 P2d 98, 51 St. Rep. 1027 (1994).

Failure to Articulate Reasons for Dangerous Offender Designation as Warranting Remand: The District Court designated defendant as a dangerous offender for parole purposes but failed to articulate why defendant represented a substantial danger to other persons or to society. Under the rationale of St. v. Morrison, 257 M 282, 848 P2d 514 (1993), the Supreme Court remanded for additional articulation of the District Court's reasons for a dangerous or nondangerous designation. St. v. Wing, 264 M 215, 870 P2d 1368, 51 St. Rep. 223 (1994), on remand, reversed and remanded for further proceedings in St. v. Lorenz, 267 M 186, 883 P2d 98, 51 St. Rep. 1027 (1994).

Defendant to Be Sentenced Under Statute Existing at Time of Original Sentencing: Suiste argued that the District Court had violated the ban against ex post facto legislation by designating him as a dangerous offender when it revoked his suspended sentence for a crime that he was originally convicted of in 1979. By so doing, Suiste argued that the court was subjecting him to a harsher penalty than he could have received at the time that he committed the offense. The Supreme Court held that the defendant was entitled to be sentenced under the statute in effect at the time of the original sentencing. St. v. Suiste, 261 M 251, 862 P2d 399, 50 St. Rep. 1309 (1993).

Convicted Felon Designated Nondangerous Offender for Purposes of Parole Eligibility Not Automatically Entitled to Bail Pending Appeal: Prior to his conviction for deliberate homicide, Moore was allowed bail, and following conviction, he was designated a nondangerous offender for purposes of parole eligibility. After conviction, Moore was denied bail pending appeal. Moore petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus, claiming that he is entitled to bail pending appeal as a matter of law pursuant to 46-18-404 (now repealed). The Supreme Court found that the criteria for admitting a defendant to bail pending appeal and the criteria for designating the defendant a nondangerous offender are not the same. Under 46-18-404(1)(b) (now repealed) the trial court is required to determine whether the defendant constitutes a "substantial danger to other persons or society", while under 46-9-107, the trial court may not allow bail pending appeal unless it finds that the defendant "is not likely to flee". The Supreme Court held that it could therefore be appropriate to designate a defendant such as Moore a nondangerous offender for the purposes of parole eligibility but also be appropriate to deny him bail pending appeal. Moore v. McCormick, 260 M 305, 858 P2d 1254, 50 St. Rep. 1054 (1993).

Dangerous Offender Designation Consistent With Defendant's Actions and Prior Record: Defendant asserted error in being designated a dangerous offender because the District Court miscounted his felony convictions. However, the court's misinterpretation of defendant's criminal record was not reversible error, and the dangerous offender designation was appropriate given defendant's five felony convictions and his obvious threat to society, evidenced by his longstanding serious drug problem and his current offenses, including a high-speed chase through downtown Billings while under the influence of drugs, which resulted in property damage and injuries to innocent persons. St. v. Willson, 250 M 241, 818 P2d 1199, 48 St. Rep. 907 (1991).

Designation as Dangerous Offender Not Error: It was not error to designate defendant as a dangerous offender after he was convicted of aggravated kidnapping, aggravated assault, felony assault (now assault with a weapon), and resisting arrest. Defendant had beaten his common-law wife over a period of at least 2 hours. St. v. Brady, 249 M 290, 816 P2d 413, 48 St. Rep. 667 (1991).

Nature of Crime Sufficient to Designate Person as Dangerous Offender — Reasons Required to Be in Findings: The defendant argued that the trial court erred in designating him a dangerous offender because he had never been convicted of a previous crime. The Supreme Court held that the vicious nature of the offense was sufficient to allow the trial court to designate the defendant a dangerous offender but remanded the case because the trial court is required to state in its findings the reasons for the designation. St. v. Belmarez, 248 M 378, 812 P2d 341, 48 St. Rep. 472 (1991), followed in St. v. Morrison, 257 M 282, 848 P2d 514, 50 St. Rep. 270 (1993), and St. v. Evans, 272 M 58, 899 P2d 1073, 52 St. Rep. 593 (1995).

Designation as Extremely Dangerous Person — Limitation of Eligibility of Parole: In its reasons for sentence, the District Court characterized defendant as "shrewd, self-serving, deceitful, extremely dangerous, a high risk for escape and for future crimes". This designation was sufficient to take defendant out of the category of nondangerous offender and to warrant limiting his eligibility for parole for 25 years. St. v. Evans, 247 M 218, 806 P2d 512, 48 St. Rep. 170 (1991).

Defendant Designated Dangerous Offender — No Felony Convictions in Previous Five Years: The defendant appealed his sentencing as a dangerous offender on the basis that his prior felony convictions were of a nonviolent nature and occurred more than 5 years prior to his conviction. The Supreme Court held that the lower court had not abused its discretion in characterizing the defendant as a dangerous offender due to the serious nature of the present crime that the defendant had committed. St. v. Mazurkiewicz, 245 M 172, 799 P2d 1066, 47 St. Rep. 1962 (1990).

Dangerous Offender Designation With No Previous Convictions: The defender argued that the lower court had erred in designating him a dangerous offender for selling drugs when he had no previous convictions. The Supreme Court affirmed the decision on the basis that the lower court had found that the defendant had been involved in the operation for a long period of time on a large scale and therefore represented a substantial danger to society. St. v. Baldwin, 242 M 176, 789 P2d 1215, 47 St. Rep. 614 (1990).

Separate Crime Not Created by Dangerous Offender Provision — Due Process Considerations: Defendant argued that the restriction of parole eligibility under 46-18-404 (now repealed) was a distinct crime separate from the underlying offense or was an element of the underlying offense and as such the prosecution must charge dangerous offender status in the information or indictment and prove it beyond a reasonable doubt. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that the dangerous offender status does not create a separate crime or element of a crime but rather is part of a sentencing scheme that does not circumvent due process. While federal due process imposes some limits beyond which states may not go, application of the reasonable doubt standard has always depended on how state legislatures choose to define a crime. St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298, 47 St. Rep. 454 (1990), followed in St. v. Byers, 261 M 17, 861 P2d 860, 50 St. Rep. 1162 (1993), St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994), and St. v. Henrich, 268 M 258, 886 P2d 402, 51 St. Rep. 1275 (1994). Byers was overruled in part in St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995). See also McMillan v. Pa., 477 US 79, 91 L Ed 2d 67, 106 S Ct 2411 (1986), and Patterson v. N.Y., 432 US 197, 53 L Ed 2d 281, 97 S Ct 2319 (1977).

Facts Supporting Dangerous Offender Status:

The sentencing court satisfied the articulation requirements of 46-18-404 (now repealed) when, among other factors, it considered: (1) the presentence report; (2) the defendant's prior criminal history; (3) the inability of defendant to live in the community for more than 3 years without being convicted of felony drug possession and felony assault (now assault with a weapon); and (4) the violence of the crimes and the danger to the victim. St. v. Hawkins, 239 M 404, 781 P2d 259, 46 St. Rep. 1786 (1989).

Designation as a dangerous offender was proper upon finding that defendant: (1) admitted daily use of "lots of cocaine" prior to arrest; (2) had intense anger for any kind of authority; (3) had a long history of misdemeanor arrests; (4) threatened to harm several witnesses or their families; and (5) committed a serious crime while still on parole. St. v. Smith, 232 M 156, 755 P2d 569, 45 St. Rep. 955 (1988).

Sufficiency of Reasons When Set Out in First Portion of Judgment: Although the list of findings articulating defendant a dangerous offender was set out in the first portion of a sentence and the dangerous offender designation in the latter portion, it was all part of the same judgment and therefore sufficient to meet the articulated reasons requirement. St. v. McPherson, 236 M 484, 771 P2d 120, 46 St. Rep. 525 (1989).

Consideration of Persistent Criminal Conduct in Designation as Dangerous Offender: The District Court properly exercised its discretion in designating defendant a dangerous offender after considering defendant's persistence in criminal conduct and the failure of earlier discipline to deter or reform him. St. v. Buckman, 236 M 37, 768 P2d 1361, 46 St. Rep. 163 (1989). See also St. v. Nichols, 222 M 71, 720 P2d 1157, 43 St. Rep. 1068 (1986).

Statutory Conditions Mandatory Before Nondangerous Designation Required: Both conditions outlined in 46-18-404 (1) (now repealed) must be met before a court is required to designate an offender as nondangerous: (1) lack of a felony conviction in the preceding 5 years; and (2) a finding that defendant does not present a substantial danger to society. St. v. Miller, 231 M 497, 757 P2d 1275, 45 St. Rep. 790 (1988).

Lengthy Sentence for Nondangerous Offender: Defendant pleaded guilty to charges of felony aggravated burglary and felony attempted mitigated deliberate homicide pursuant to 45-6-204 and 45-4-103. He was designated a nondangerous offender but sentenced to 30 concurrent years. The sentence is proper as it is within the legal limits set forth in the applicable statutes. The court considered the required factors listed in this statute in setting sentence. St. v. Almanza, 229 M 383, 746 P2d 1089, 44 St. Rep. 2064 (1987), followed in St. v. Losson, 262 M 342, 865 P2d 255, 50 St. Rep. 1588 (1993).

Questionable Presentence Report — Substantial Support for Dangerous Offender Designation: Defendant contended he was improperly designated a dangerous offender due to hearsay and inaccuracies in the presentence report, but the trial court did not appear to rely on any particular offense or incident, emphasizing instead the brutality of the assault, subsequent witness tampering, and a general inability to conform to the law. Even without the questionable presentence report, there was substantial support for the designation. St. v. Bingman, 229 M 101, 745 P2d 342, 44 St. Rep. 1813 (1987).

Reasons for Finding Set Forth by Court: The trial court adequately articulated its reasons for finding defendant a dangerous offender when it stated it had reviewed the presentence report, found the crime committed was particularly vicious, determined that the victims did not provoke defendant, and found that defendant's history and the facts of the case indicate he represents a substantial danger to society. St. v. Bell, 225 M 83, 731 P2d 336, 44 St. Rep. 56 (1987).

Defendant on Bail Designated Dangerous — Use of Juvenile Offenses in Sentencing: It was not an abuse of discretion to designate as a dangerous offender a defendant who argued on appeal that releasing him on bail after conviction and prior to sentencing was an implicit finding that he was not dangerous to society and that juvenile convictions were considered. The judge properly considered matters arising between conviction and sentencing in determining the dangerous offender designation, and evidence of juvenile offenses is prohibited only when the defendant was less than 18 when the offense for which he is currently being sentenced was committed. Defendant was 19 at that time. St. v. Nichols, 222 M 71, 720 P2d 1157, 43 St. Rep. 1068 (1986).

Right to Notice That State Will Seek Dangerous Offender Designation: Because 46-18-404 (now repealed) states the substantive criteria upon which a nondangerous offender designation must be based, no notice other than notice of the sentencing hearing is needed to comport with due process and it is not a denial of due process that the state is not required to give notice that it will seek application of a dangerous offender designation and to state the factual basis for the requested designation. The statutes governing sentencing provide ample notice of matters that may come up at the sentencing hearing. These statutes, along with notice of the hearing date, the full disclosure of presentencing information in open court, and defendant's ability to propound evidence, confront witnesses, and participate in the hearing, provide a full panoply of due process safeguards for defendant's liberty interest. St. v. Nichols, 222 M 71, 720 P2d 1157, 43 St. Rep. 1068 (1986).

Term "Substantial Danger" Not Void for Vagueness: As used in 46-18-404 (now repealed) requiring a court to find that a convicted person is a substantial danger to other persons or society before the court may designate him a dangerous offender, the term "substantial danger" is not so loose and uncertain that a court's discretion in defining the term is unfettered. The term does not violate due process for vagueness. St. v. Nichols, 222 M 71, 720 P2d 1157, 43 St. Rep. 1068 (1986).

No Collateral Estoppel and Due Process Bars to Sentencing: Defendant argued that collateral estoppel and due process barred his status as both a persistent felony offender and dangerous offender because the designations served to sentence him twice for the same offense. The court found no merit to the argument. St. v. Campbell, 219 M 194, 711 P2d 1357, 42 St. Rep. 1948 (1985).

Prison's Custody Classification as Alleged Violation of Plea Bargaining Agreement — Withdrawal of Plea Denied: Under a plea bargain agreement, defendant was sentenced to 10 years as a nondangerous offender without parole. Upon entering prison, he was held in close custody for 24 months under prison rules calling for dangerous offenders and those sentenced without parole to serve 24 months in close custody prior to being considered for transfer to lower, more amenable custody levels. The prosecution, defense counsel, defendant, and judge were all unaware of those rules. Defendant was not entitled to withdraw his plea on the ground he was kept in close custody for 24 months in violation of his plea agreement. There was no violation of the agreement, nor was he entitled to the additional good time credits he would have received had he not been held so long in close custody. Prison officials take many factors into account in making custody reclassifications, and there was no guarantee he would have been held in close custody only for the time he claimed he should have been upon entry to the prison. St. v. Mesler, 210 M 92, 682 P2d 714, 41 St. Rep. 939 (1984).

Dangerous Offender Determination — Use of Defective Information: After defendant and his father kidnapped two minor girls and took them to the father's house, father told defendant to "go get the gun" and defendant did so and placed it between the two men on the couch where they were sitting. The girls were not threatened with the gun. The trial judge told defendant that "the reason you're designated a dangerous offender is that's about the fourth gun incident you were in". Review of the record on appeal showed: (1) a possible misapprehension of defendant's actual criminal background and apparent confusion as to the crimes involved; (2) no convincing evidence that this was defendant's fourth gun incident; and (3) an indication that one of the prior convictions considered by the judge was constitutionally defective because defendant did not have counsel. The sentencing court cannot rely upon a previous criminal record in sentencing if that record contains constitutionally infirm convictions. Defendant had a right to have his sentence based upon substantially correct information and was entitled to a rehearing on his designation as a dangerous offender. St. v. Herrera, 197 M 462, 643 P2d 588, 39 St. Rep. 731 (1982).

"Dangerous Offender" Designation — Findings Required — Mere Recitation of 46-18-404 (Now Repealed) Insufficient:

On appeal from his conviction for sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault, the defendant alleged error in his designation as a "dangerous offender" for purposes of parole because the designation was conclusory. In the McFadden case, the Supreme Court held that a court must articulate its reasons for the designation and that a mere recitation of the statutory language was insufficient. The reason articulated in this case was that the defendant represented a substantial danger to other persons in society in the opinion of the court. That was found to be a mere recitation of 46-18-404 (now repealed). Because the record of the case revealed substantial evidence which could have led the District Judge to designate the defendant "dangerous", the case was remanded for findings to support the conclusion. Without having the reasons articulated in the judgment, it could not be determined whether there was an abuse of discretion by the judge. St. v. Camitsch, 192 M 124, 626 P2d 1250, 38 St. Rep. 563 (1981), following In re McFadden, 185 M 220, 605 P2d 599, 37 St. Rep. 55 (1980).

Under 46-18-404 (now repealed), an individual may be designated a dangerous offender if, in the discretion of the sentencing court, he is determined to represent a substantial danger to other persons or society; however, more than a mere recital of the statutory language is required. The sentencing court must articulate its reasons underlying its determination. The record revealed that the District Court never found that petitioner represented a substantial danger to other persons or society but rather concluded that petitioner was not able to be rehabilitated because he had not been truthful with the court and designated him a dangerous offender on that basis. The designation was not supported by substantial credible evidence. In re McFadden, 185 M 220, 605 P2d 599, 37 St. Rep. 55 (1980).

Delay in Determination as Nondangerous: Delay of 5 months from conviction until defendant was declared "nondangerous" because the judge wanted a psychological evaluation of the defendant did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. Nor was the time taken unreasonable, in that it was in the interest of justice to obtain more information about the offender. St. v. Higley, 190 M 412, 621 P2d 1043, 37 St. Rep. 1942 (1980).

Dangerous Offender Designation — Prior Guilty Plea — With Conviction After Current Conviction: Defendant was convicted of robbery and designated a dangerous offender. The felony burglary conviction upon which the defendant's dangerous offender designation was based was not a conviction for these purposes because the burglary conviction did not occur until some time after he was found to be a dangerous offender. The fact that the defendant had pleaded guilty to burglary prior to the time of his designation as a dangerous offender was of no consequence because 46-18-404 (now repealed) required a felony conviction within the 5 years preceding the commission of the offense for which the defendant was being sentenced. St. v. Fisher, 190 M 295, 620 P2d 1215, 37 St. Rep. 1988 (1980).

Designation of Convict as Nondangerous Offender When Court Fails to Designate as Dangerous: In appealing his conviction for robbery, the defendant claimed that the trial court erred in determining that it was required as a matter of law to designate the defendant as a dangerous offender for purposes of parole eligibility. The Supreme Court agreed that the sentencing court was not statutorily required to designate him as a dangerous offender and thus could have designated him as nondangerous. The Supreme Court, in remanding for resentencing, specifically noted 46-18-404 (3) (now repealed), which covers the case when a trial court does not make a designation of dangerousness. To declare a defendant ineligible for parole eligibility, the sentencing court is statutorily required to designate him as dangerous for that purpose as a part of the sentence. When a court fails to do so, 46-18-404 (now repealed) declares that the defendant is to be designated as a nondangerous offender for purposes of parole eligibility. St. v. Dahl, 190 M 207, 620 P2d 361, 37 St. Rep. 1852 (1980), followed in St. v. Buckman, 236 M 37, 768 P2d 1361, 46 St. Rep. 163 (1989), and St. v. Lorenz, 267 M 186, 883 P2d 98, 51 St. Rep. 1027 (1994).

Parole Eligibility — Ex Post Facto Application: Defendant committed a crime in 1975 for which he was tried and convicted in 1979. In sentencing defendant, the trial court declared him a dangerous offender under 46-18-404 (now repealed), and declared him ineligible for parole under 46-18-202. Both of these statutes became effective July 1, 1977. Application of a law which eliminates or delays a defendant's parole eligibility after the criminal offense has been committed is ex post facto as applied to that defendant and is therefore unconstitutional. St. v. Beachman, 189 M 400, 616 P2d 337 (1980).

Jurisdiction to Designate Dangerous Offenders: At a previous hearing on the State's petition to revoke defendant's probation, the trial court not only revoked his probation but erroneously designated him as a dangerous offender for purposes of parole eligibility, which function is reserved to the sentencing court. Neither 46-18-404(1) (now repealed) nor 46-18-203 gave the District Court authority to determine at the revocation hearing that the defendant was a dangerous offender for purposes of parole. In fact, when the sentencing court placed defendant on probation and suspended the 10-year sentence, the effect was to determine that defendant did not represent a substantial danger to society. Smith v. St., 186 M 52, 606 P2d 153 (1980).

Designation Mandatory: Under former law, designation of an offender as nondangerous for purposes of parole eligibility was mandatory if either of the conditions of 46-18-404(1) (now repealed) were met. Grifaldo v. St., 182 M 287, 596 P2d 847 (1979).

1983 Amendment: Inserted (3)(b) requiring the judge to clearly state his reasons for the sentence.

Case Notes

Condition of Written Sentence Inconsistent With Oral Pronouncement — Written Judgment Increasing Sentence Invalid: The Supreme Court reversed a written sentence requiring the defendant to attend self-help meetings when the oral sentence had allowed the probation officer the discretion to determine whether or not the defendant was to attend self-help meetings, the District Court had explicitly stated that it was making the modification at the oral pronouncement, and the District Court had noted its intention to alter the language. St. v. Pulst, 2015 MT 184, 379 Mont. 494, 351 P.3d 687.

Sentencing Not Included in Right to Speedy Trial — Sentencing Delay Possible Violation of Due Process if Purposeful or Oppressive: Fourteen months elapsed between the defendant’s pleading guilty and being sentenced. Prior to sentencing, the defendant filed a motion to dismiss, claiming that the delay in sentencing violated his right to due process, which the District Court denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The court concluded that the constitutional right to a speedy trial does not extend from conviction to sentencing and that a sentencing delay that is either sufficiently purposeful or oppressive may constitute a due process violation but that neither factor was substantial or demonstrable in this case. St. v. Betterman, 2015 MT 39, 378 Mont. 182, 342 P.3d 971. See also St. v. Maloney, 2015 MT 227, 380 Mont. 244, 354 P.3d 611.

What Constitutes Similarly Situated Case for Purposes of Retroactive Application of New Rule — Issue Required to Be Raised in Trial Court: As a general principle, in order for a case to be similarly situated for purposes of retroactive application of a newly announced rule, the issue addressed by the new rule should be raised by the movant at the trial court level and properly preserved for appeal. The only exception would be a challenge under the common-law plain error doctrine or if unique circumstances apply, such as those in St. v. Carter, 2005 MT 87, 326 M 427, 114 P3d 1001 (2005). Here, Foster-DeBerry contended that the new rule regarding suppression of telephone and transmission recordings announced in St. v. Goetz & St. v. Hamper, 2008 MT 296, 345 M 421, 191 P3d 489 (2008), should retroactively apply to Foster-DeBerry’s case, which was pending when the Goetz-Hamper rule was announced. However, Foster-DeBerry never filed a motion to suppress or raised the legal issues addressed in Goetz-Hamper in trial court, and thus did not preserve the issue for appeal, so Foster-DeBerry was not entitled to retroactive application of the Goetz-Hamper rule. Further, Foster-DeBerry did not argue for application of the plain error doctrine, so the Supreme Court declined to apply it. St. v. Foster-DeBerry, 2008

MT 397, 347 M 164, 197 P3d 1004 (2008), following Griffith v. Kentucky, 479 US 314 (1987), and St. v. Zivcic, 598 NW2d 565 (Wis. Ct. App. 1999).

Due Process Requirements of Written Statement for Revoking Deferred Sentence — Record of Factfinding and Basis of Review Adequate: The District Court revoked Baird's deferred sentence, but Baird asserted that his due process rights were violated because the court failed to advise him of the reasons for the revocation in a written statement as required in this section and Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 US 778 (1973). The Supreme Court found Baird's reliance of this section and Gagnon to be misplaced. Rather, the sentencing court's memorandum combined with the hearing transcript may provide the necessary written statement explaining the evidence relied on and the reason for the revocation decision. Due process is achieved when the oral and written record support accurate factfinding and appellate review. In Baird's case, when read as a whole, the oral and written records provided an adequate basis for review and were adequate to determine that the District Court's decision to revoke the sentence was based on permissible grounds supported by the evidence. Thus, Gagnon and its progeny were adequately addressed, and Baird's sentence revocation was affirmed. St. v. Baird, 2006 MT 266, 334 M 185, 145 P3d 995 (2006). See also Black v. Romano, 471 US 606 (1985), and St. v. Richardson, 2000 MT 72, 299 M 102, 997 P2d 786 (2000).

Adoption of Sentence Recommended in Presentence Investigation Report, With Variations — No Error in Disparity Between Oral and Written Sentence: As set out in St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), the oral pronouncement of sentence is the legally effective sentence, and the written judgment and commitment serves as evidence of the sentence orally pronounced. Wiedrich contended that because his written sentence contained terms and conditions that were not orally pronounced, the extra conditions were invalid and should be removed from the sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed. The transcript revealed that the sentencing court clearly adopted the sentence recommended in the presentence investigation report, with some variations—a fact that Wiedrich and his counsel were fully aware of—and the Supreme Court therefore declined to remand for resentencing. St. v. Wiedrich, 2005 MT 127, 327 M 214, 112 P3d 1054 (2005).

Addition of Written Sentencing Conditions Not Enunciated Orally at Hearing — Johnson Applied: Drube failed to complete a sex offender program, so the District Court revoked his suspended sentence and sentenced him to a 9-year term, with commitment to the Department of Corrections for the first 5 years and the remainder to be served at the state prison. The court specified that the prison portion of the sentence be suspended as long as Drube met sentencing conditions, including completion of a long-term aftercare program. Drube appealed the sentence on grounds that the court imposed a condition on the sentence that was impossible to fulfill and because the written revocation and sentencing order differed from the oral sentence enunciated at the sentencing hearing. Reviewing the sentence for legality, the Supreme Court affirmed. Drube presented nothing establishing that it would be impossible to complete the sex offender program within the reinstated 5-year commitment to the Department. Arguing that eight written conditions added to the suspended sentence by written order should be stricken, Drube cited St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), for the proposition that when written and oral sentences differ, the oral order prevails. The Supreme Court agreed with the general rule in Lane, but noted that the rule is not absolute. Under St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480 (2000), when deciding whether a subsequent written sentencing order is unlawful because it contains conditions not enunciated orally, the court first determines whether a defendant was afforded the opportunity to respond to the inclusion upon sufficient notice at hearing and second whether the portion of the written sentence substantively increases the defendant's loss of liberty and sacrifice of property. Here, all the conditions in the 2002 written revocation and sentencing order were contained either in Drube's original sentence or in a 2001 revocation and sentencing order and thus were not new or unknown to Drube, who had the opportunity to respond to the conditions placed on the sentence, nor did Drube present any argument that the eight conditions substantively increased the loss of liberty or sacrifice of property. Thus, the 2002 sentencing order was not rendered unlawful by the addition of conditions not imposed orally at the sentencing hearing. St. v. Drube, 2003 MT 138, 316 M 156, 69 P3d 1182 (2003).

Extensive Statements of Sentencing Reasons Not Required: Flanagan contended that the District Court erred by giving inadequate reasons for imposing a 10-year suspended sentence for sexual assault. The Supreme Court disagreed. As established in St. v. Goulet, 277 M 308, 921 P2d 1245 (1996), extensive statements of sentencing reasons are not required. Here, the District Court stated that it suspended Flanagan's entire sentence because of mitigating circumstances, including Flanagan's age of 75 years, significant health problems, amenability to community treatment, and the fact that a 10-year supervision period could effectively extend for the remainder of Flanagan's natural life. This adequately satisfied the statutory requirements for a statement of sentencing reasons. St. v. Flanagan, 2003 MT 123, 316 M 1, 68 P3d 796 (2003).

Suspended Sentence Properly Revoked — Remand for Entry of Findings to Support Resentence: The District Court revoked Anderson's suspended sentence and resentenced him to 10 years with 6 years suspended. Anderson appealed on grounds that his failure to comply with sentencing conditions requiring him to maintain employment and perform community service did not rise to a level to support revocation, and that the sentencing judge failed to clearly state the reasons for the sentence. The Supreme Court noted that a single violation of the terms of a suspended sentence is sufficient to support revocation of a suspended sentence. Anderson admitted that he had performed only 4 hours of the required 100 hours of community service since the original sentence was imposed, and had paid only $275 of a total of $1,805 due in restitution. Anderson also had a significant criminal history, was convicted of three additional felonies since beginning probation, and failed to comply with a number of terms and conditions of the suspended sentence. Thus, revocation of Anderson's suspended sentence was not an abuse of discretion. However, the sentencing court's stated reason for resentencing Anderson, namely that it was the state's recommendation, neither informed Anderson of the reasons underlying the sentence nor provided guidance for review. Therefore, the case was remanded for resentencing, and the entry of findings was to be sufficient to support the sentence. St. v. Anderson, 2002 MT 92, 309 M 352, 46 P3d 625 (2002), distinguishing St. v. Lundquist, 251 M 329, 825 P2d 204 (1992).

Question Whether Parole Denied for Failure to Satisfy Additional Treatment Conditions — Remand: Ringewold pleaded guilty to two counts of felony assault and was sentenced to a total of 14 years' commitment to the Department of Corrections. The next day, Ringewold was placed in the state hospital. The placement order allowed Ringewold to petition for a conditional release from the hospital, but did not specify any conditions. About 17 months later, Ringewold petitioned for release from the hospital. The state agreed that a hearing on the petition was proper, but argued that if it was found that Ringewold no longer suffered from a mental disease or defect that presented a risk to Ringewold or others, it was appropriate to remand Ringewold to the Department. The District Court ordered an independent mental evaluation, but it was never performed. Ringewold then filed another petition for release, but about the same time, the hospital staff determined that Ringewold would no longer benefit from active inpatient treatment and transferred him to the state prison pursuant to 46-14-312. At the request of counsel, Ringewold was transferred back to the state hospital, with the state conceding that hospital placement was proper and that Ringewold should be allowed to petition for release pursuant to 46-14-312. About 4 months later, the Department Director sought an order transferring Ringewold back to the prison on grounds that Ringewold continued to suffer from a dangerous mental disorder but would no longer benefit from active inpatient treatment for the disorder. At a conditional release hearing about 9 months later, the District Court orally resentenced Ringewold to 8 years in prison. The court specified that the total sentence not exceed more than the original sentence, but the court also conditioned Ringewold's parole on completion of an anger management course, moral reconnection therapy, and chemical dependence treatment. In a written amended judgment about 1 month later, the District Court reimposed the original 14-year sentence and restated the parole conditions. Ringewold appealed. The Supreme Court held that under St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), the oral pronouncement of sentence was legally effective and constituted final judgment. However, it was not possible to determine from the record whether the additional conditions added to the sentence improperly lengthened Ringewold's sentence, so the case was remanded for supplementation of the factual record to determine if Ringewold was being denied consideration for parole because of failure to satisfy the additional treatment conditions and, if so, to strike the conditions from the amended judgment, because under those circumstances, the practical effect of the conditions would be to lengthen the sentence in violation of 46-14-312. St. v. Ringewold, 2001 MT 185, 306 M 229, 32 P3d 729 (2001).

Failure to Credit Inmate With Time Served Before Sentencing in Written Judgment After Allowing Credit in Oral Pronouncement of Sentence: At the sentencing hearing, Horton inquired as to whether he would get credit for time served between arrest and sentencing. The judge responded that credit would be granted automatically. However, in the written judgment entered 2 days later, the judge denied credit for time served because Horton was being held on a probation violation. Under 46-18-403, Horton was entitled to credit for each day of incarceration prior to or after sentencing, and pursuant to St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), the court's oral pronouncement controlled over the written judgment. Thus, the Supreme Court directed that the provision in the written judgment denying Horton credit for time served be stricken. St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001).

Conditions Imposed in Written Judgment and Sentence Different From Those Imposed in Oral Sentence — Lane, Waters, and Simpson Reviewed — Test to Determine Which New Conditions Lawful or Unlawful — Payment of Restitution and Costs: Johnson was sentenced orally for writing bad checks and later contended that four of the conditions imposed in the written judgment and sentence by the District Court were unlawful under St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), because they were not announced orally when she was sentenced in open court. The Supreme Court reviewed its decisions in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142 (1999), and St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361 (1999), and reasoned that a written sentence would be held unlawful only if it substantively increased the defendant's loss of liberty or the defendant's sacrifice of property. Under this test, the Supreme Court held that two of the four penalties not mentioned by the District Court in its oral pronouncement of Johnson's sentence were unlawful, those being the restitution ordered to the Missoula County jail of money expended for Johnson's medical care and the requirement that Johnson pay for the costs of her prosecution in District Court. The Supreme Court held that the other two parts of the written sentence, the requirement that Johnson make restitution from money earned in prison and the imposition of certain "civil" restrictions as conditions of Johnson's suspended sentence, such as the requirement that Johnson stay out of gambling casinos, were lawfully imposed because they did not increase the amount of money that Johnson was ordered to pay or increase Johnson's deprivation of liberty in addition to those penalties imposed orally. The requirement for payment from prison earnings only specified where the money was to come from, and the "civil" restrictions were largely mentioned by the District Court at Johnson's sentencing hearing. St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000), followed in St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

Extra Conditions in Sentencing Order Not Mentioned in Oral Sentence Stricken: The District Court that sentenced Waters imposed two extra conditions in the sentencing order that were not contained in the plea agreement or presentence investigation or contained in the oral sentence: (1) payment of supervision fees; and (2) submission to Texas authorities. Pursuant to St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), the oral pronouncement controls. Thus, Waters contended that only the conditions contained in the oral sentence could be imposed. The Supreme Court clarified Lane, noting that Waters was on notice of the conditions in the plea agreement and presentence investigation and that those terms applied despite the ambiguous sentencing conditions that were imposed orally. However, the court remanded for an amendment of the written sentence to strike the submission to Texas authorities, which was never mentioned, and to strike the payment of supervision fees as well, unless it was determined that payment of the fees would not impose a significant hardship on Waters, pursuant to 46-23-1031. St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999), followed in St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000), and St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

Retroactive Applicability of Judicial Rule Regarding Oral Pronouncement of Sentence: Retroactivity is a threshold matter that compels the evenhanded application of a new rule for the conduct of criminal prosecutions to all similarly situated cases that are pending on direct appeal or not yet final. Therefore, all defendants whose cases meet those criteria are entitled to the retroactive application of a new judicial rule of criminal procedure. This standard applies irrespective of whether the new judicial rule constitutes a clear break from existing precedent and without regard to whether the rule was available to the District Court at the time that it ruled. Thus in the present case, the rule in St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), that oral pronouncement of sentence controls over the written sentence for purposes of finality applied retroactively to Waters' appeal, even though the District Court did not have the Lane rule at the time of sentencing. St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999), following St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260 (1995), and St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999), overruling St. v. Redding, 208 M 24, 675 P2d 974, 41 St. Rep. 147 (1984), Peterson v. Mont. Bank of Bozeman, N.A., 212 M 37, 687 P2d 673 (1984), and their progeny, and followed in St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361, 56 St. Rep. 1032 (1999). See also Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288, 103 L Ed 2d 334, 109 S Ct 1060 (1989).

Oral Pronouncement as Legally Effective Sentence — Correction of Error in Written Judgment by Nunc Pro Tunc Order — Due Process and Double Jeopardy Rights Not Violated: The oral pronouncement of sentence is the legally effective sentence. The written judgment and commitment serves as evidence of the sentence orally pronounced. In the event of a conflict between the oral and written sentence, the oral controls. The sentencing court may correct an error in a written judgment and commitment by a nunc pro tunc order, pursuant to 46-18-117 (now repealed), to accurately reflect what was orally pronounced at the sentencing hearing. Absent evidence of a tangible detriment or concrete injury to defendant, a clarifying nunc pro tunc order does not jeopardize a defendant's due process rights or constitute double jeopardy. St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), overruling St. v. Enfinger, 222 M 438, 722 P2d 1170 (1986), St. v. Wirtala, 231 M 264, 752 P2d 177 (1988), St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915 P2d 184 (1996), to the extent that those cases held that the written judgment and commitment, rather than the oral pronouncement of sentence, was to be considered the final, valid order, and followed and applied retroactively in St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361, 56 St. Rep. 1032 (1999). The Supreme Court amended former Rule 5, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), to reflect the Lane decision in In re Amending Rule 5 of the Mont. Rules of Appellate Procedure, 55 St. Rep. 1267 (1998). The Lane rule was applied retroactively in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999). Lane was also followed in St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001), and *St. v. Court's Reference to Aryan Nations at Sentencing Held Not Denial of Freedom of Religion or Speech: Finney pleaded guilty to charges of burglary and theft and was sentenced to a total term of 50 years. In a written statement prepared for the presentence investigation, Finney made references to the Aryan Nations organization and also appeared at the sentencing hearing with the words "white power" tattooed across his forehead. Finney petitioned for postconviction relief, alleging that the District Court had violated his rights of freedom of religion and speech by considering his membership in the Aryan Nations for purposes of sentencing. The Supreme Court reviewed the federal court cases cited by Finney, noting that those cases also indicated that if there was an otherwise legitimate reason for references to constitutionally protected membership in similar organizations, it was not error for those references to be made during the course of the trial. The Supreme Court pointed out that Finney's sentence was within the range of sentences allowed for the crimes Finney had committed and that the references made in Finney's case were limited references to those organizations made because Finney brought up the subject himself by his words or actions, were made by the prosecutor in order to clarify Finney's past criminal behavior, or were limited to comments by the court on those words or actions. The Supreme Court held that for these reasons, the District Court did not deny Finney his constitutional rights and there was no plain error. St. v. Finney, 281 M 58, 931 P2d 1300, 54 St. Rep. 58 (1997).

Recommendation of Prosecutor and Probation Officer Adequate Statement of Sentencing Reason—No Improper Reliance on Pending Charge in Sentencing: The District Court's statements both orally and in its written sentence that Goulet's sentence was imposed at the recommendation of the prosecutor and the probation officer, plus the court's consideration of Goulet's prior record and long history of contact with the legal system, were sufficient statements of sentencing reasons to comply with St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298 (1980). Further, in the present case, nothing in the record indicated that the sentencing court improperly relied on a pending deliberate homicide charge against Goulet in sentencing him for escape. St. v. Goulet, 277 M 308, 921 P2d 1245, 53 St. Rep. 739 (1996), following St. v. Johnson, 221 M 503, 719 P2d 1248 (1986), St. v. Petroff, 232 M 20, 757 P2d 759 (1988), and St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298 (1990).

Variance Between Oral and Written Sentence Held Harmless Error: Graveley was convicted of solicitation to commit deliberate homicide. At the sentencing hearing, the District Court announced Graveley's sentence of 40 years in the custody of the Department of Corrections, with the first 10 years in a prison environment. The District Court's written judgment omitted the reference to the first 10 years. The Supreme Court held that a review of the oral record showed that the District Court intended the reference to 10 years to mean a minimum of 10 years and that because under the written judgment Graveley would be eligible for a supervised release program earlier than under the oral pronouncement, Graveley was not prejudiced by the written judgment. The Supreme Court held that absent a finding that a sentence is erroneous or illegal, the District Court could not alter its sentence. However, the difference in this case between the oral pronouncement and written judgment was harmless error. St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915 P2d 184, 53 St. Rep. 239 (1996).

Evidence Viewed in Light Most Favorable to Prosecution: The trial court found the defendant guilty despite expert testimony favoring the defendant. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that a conviction may not be overturned if the evidence presented, when viewed in the light most favorable to the prosecution, would permit a rational trier of fact to find the essential elements necessary to establish the offense. St. v. Holman, 241 M 238, 786 P2d 667, 47 St. Rep. 256 (1990).

Failure to Articulate Reasons for Sentence as Dangerous Offender — Harmless Error: Any failure to articulate the reasons for declaring defendant a dangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) in pronouncing sentence constituted harmless error when the reasons were apparent in the transcript of the sentencing hearing. St. v. Smith, 232 M 156, 755 P2d 569, 45 St. Rep. 955 (1988).

Claim of Reliance on Incorrect Information in Sentencing — Sentencing Court Presumed Correct: Defendant contended the District Court wrongly assumed he had two prior probation violations and relied on this incorrect information in sentencing. Although a defendant has a right to a sentence based on substantially correct information, the Supreme Court will not strain at worst-case assumptions to find a mistake on review. Rather than finding two previous probation violations, the District Court correctly recognized defendant's two prior chances to avoid a more severe penalty. The sentencing court was presumed correct and judgment affirmed. St. v. Petroff, 232 M 20, 757 P2d 759, 45 St. Rep. 833 (1988).

Effect of Judge's Belief That Defendant Was Guilty of Charge for Which Acquitted: The judge did not abuse his discretion when he said that defendant was morally if not equally legally responsible for the death of a person defendant's father killed but that he could not sentence defendant for that. The judge then gave defendant the maximum sentence for each of the crimes of which he was convicted. Defendant was not convicted of homicide, and the judge's statement showed that the judge did not base the sentences on the homicide charge. St. v. Nichols, 222 M 71, 720 P2d 1157, 43 St. Rep. 1068 (1986).

Capital Sentence Requested by Defendant — No Basis for Resentencing: Defendant pleaded guilty to two counts of aggravated kidnapping and two counts of deliberate homicide. Defendant requested the death penalty. After sentencing, defendant had second thoughts and on appeal sought a resentencing. The Supreme Court held there was no basis for resentencing because: (1) sentencing was not tainted by reliance on prior Canadian convictions obtained without counsel; (2) inclusion of juvenile offenses as adult offenses in presentence report was not error; (3) a court-ordered presentence interview was not violative of the fifth amendment; (4) recommendation for the death penalty in the presentence report was not improper; (5) no judicial error was committed in the extent of review of mitigating factors and no unconstitutional limit was placed on the court's consideration of mitigating circumstances; (6) no error was found in the court's denial of defendant's motion for additional psychiatric evaluation; (7) defendant was not required to be present at proceedings occurring after the verdict; (8) jury participation is not constitutionally required in capital sentencing procedures; (9) no indication was found that the trial court imposed the death penalty out of passion or prejudice; and (10) the sentence was not excessive or disproportionate. St. v. Smith, 217 M 461, 705 P2d 1087, 42 St. Rep. 463 (1985) (Smith I). A habeas corpus petition was conditionally granted in Smith v. McCormick, 917 P2d 1153 (9th Cir. 1990), a subsequent resentencing of death was reversed and remanded for preparation of a new presentence investigation, St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000 (1993) (Smith II), and following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

Failure to Set Forth Detailed Findings Harmless Error: The two defendants pleaded guilty to deliberate homicide, and the sentencing court, after making limited findings, sentenced each defendant to 100 years in prison. When the reason for a sentence is apparent from the record, the failure of the sentencing court to set forth detailed findings or reasons for the sentence imposed does not result in prejudice to the defendant and thus is harmless error, as no substantial right of the defendant was denied. St. v. Hintz, 213 M 364, 691 P2d 814, 41 St. Rep. 2172 (1984).

No Proof Erroneous Information Considered by Sentencing Court: The defendants were sentenced to lengthy prison terms for deliberate homicide. They contend the sentencing judge considered information from a psychiatrist that is not directly reflected in the record, but the record does not support their contention. The comments concerning the doctor's report were made by defense counsel during oral presentation to the sentencing court. The defendants have failed to show that any information furnished by the psychiatrist was considered improperly by the court; thus they have failed to show any erroneous information was considered by the court in passing sentence. St. v. Hintz, 213 M 364, 691 P2d 814, 41 St. Rep. 2172 (1984).

Failure to State Reasons for Sentence — Challenge to Revocation of Suspended Sentence: After the defendant was given a suspended prison sentence and ordered to pay restitution, the State moved to revoke the suspension because the defendant failed to make restitution. The defendant opposed the motion to revoke by arguing that the original sentence was invalid because the sentencing court failed to state the reason for the sentence, in violation of the requirements established in St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298, 37 St. Rep. 673 (1980). [A 1983 amendment required the judge to state reasons for the sentence.] On appeal, the Supreme Court held: (1) that despite the failure of the sentencing court to state its reasons, the sentencing court imposed exactly the sentence requested by the defendant; (2) that the reason for the sentence was apparent from the record; (3) that no prejudice resulted from the court's failure to state its reasons; and (4) that no purpose would be served in vacating the sentence or denying the petition to revoke. St. v. Carson, 208 M 320, 677 P2d 587, 41 St. Rep. 369 (1984).

Imposition of Sentence Without Stated Basis for Decision — Earlier Decision Prospective Only: The District Court did not abuse its discretion by imposing a sentence and judgment [prior to the 1983 amendment of this section] without first articulating the basis for its decision. Although St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298 (1980), does require a court to articulate the basis upon which its sentencing discretion is exercised, that case was decided after the appellant was sentenced and thus does not apply. St. v. Garrido, 190 M 525, 621 P2d 1105, 38 St. Rep. 78 (1981), followed in St. v. Hintz, 213 M 364, 691 P2d 814, 41 St. Rep. 2172 (1984).

Delay in Determination as Nondangerous: Delay of 5 months from conviction until defendant was declared "nondangerous" because the judge wanted a psychological evaluation of the defendant did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. Nor was the time taken unreasonable, in that it was in the interest of justice to obtain more information about the offender. St. v. Higley, 190 M 412, 621 P2d 1043, 37 St. Rep. 1942 (1980).

Waiver of Postponement of Sentencing Date:

A defendant convicted in a Justice's Court of driving a vehicle on a highway while under the influence of intoxicating liquor waived postponement of the sentencing date when there was a stipulation to the sentencing date. Wilson v. Brodie, 148 M 235, 419 P2d 306 (1966).

When a person accused in a Justice's Court of a misdemeanor is convicted and the Justice immediately proceeds, upon the return of the verdict, to pronounce sentence without any objection from the defendant, his silence is a waiver of his right to a postponement of judgment. Hosoda v. Neville, 45 M 310, 123 P 20 (1912).

Delay in Sentencing Due to Motions of Defendant: While ordinarily the trial court in a criminal case should pass judgment without delay other than that provided by statute, in the absence of a statute declaring that sentence must be pronounced at the same term of court at which the verdict of guilty was returned, when the verdict was returned on Nov. 18, 1938, and sentence was not pronounced until Jan. 19, 1939, the delay being caused by the defendant's motions in arrest of judgment and for a new trial and the hearings thereof, the complaint may not be made that the court lost jurisdiction or that the judgment was not pronounced in the trial term. St. v. Heaston, 109 M 303, 97 P2d 330 (1939).

Source: Model Sentencing Act, section 12.

There are only about 10 states which allow the jury to fix sentence as well as the verdict. Montana is among the states allowing the jury to fix sentence. (See [sections] 94-7411 and 94-7415 [repealed]). The intention of the above section is to eliminate the possibility of the jury assessing punishment. The jury has none of the information concerning the defendant that could be made available to a judge by a presentence investigation and in addition the jury lacks the training and experience of a judge.

Case Notes

Parole Officer's Sentence Recommendation Not Violation of Prosecutor's Plea Agreement: The defendant argued that the parole officer's sentence recommendation in the presentencing report was a violation of his plea agreement with the prosecutor and that he should have been allowed to withdraw his guilty plea. The Supreme Court held that the sentencing recommendation was provided for by statute, was merely one factor that the trial judge could consider, and was not a breach of the prosecutor's agreement. St. v. Milinovich, 248 M 373, 812 P2d 338, 48 St. Rep. 470 (1991), followed in St. v. Yother, 253 M 128, 831 P2d 1347, 49 St. Rep. 387 (1992). Yother was followed in St. v. Sanders, 1999 MT 136, 294 M 539, 982 P2d 1015, 56 St. Rep. 551 (1999).

Judgment Containing Reasons for Sentence Sufficient — Oral and Written Reasoning Not Required: The rationale set out in St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298 (1980), acknowledging a defendant's right to be informed of the reasons underlying punishment, does not impose a duty on a District Court to set forth its reasoning orally in open court and in writing. It was sufficient when the reasons underlying a sentence were clearly stated in the judgment. St. v. Petroff, 232

M 20, 757 P2d 759, 45 St. Rep. 833 (1988). See also St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298, 47 St. Rep. 454 (1990).

Jury Not to Consider Sentence: District Court properly refused to give and avoided prejudicial error by refusing to give defendant's requested instruction that there is a mandatory 2-year sentence for each verdict of guilty of kidnapping which may not be suspended or deferred by the court. Sentencing is solely for the court, and the jury is not to consider possible punishment upon conviction. St. v. Herrera, 197 M 462, 643 P2d 588, 39 St. Rep. 731 (1982).

Failure to Include Reasons for Sentence — Abuse of Discretion: Failure of trial court to specify the reasons behind the determination of the defendant's sentence is an abuse of discretion. It is not enough that the sentence be within the statutory maximum. The defendant is entitled to know why the sentencing judge chose the particular sentence involved. St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298 (1980), cited in St. v. Johnson, 221 M 503, 719 P2d 1248, 43 St. Rep. 1010 (1986).

Sentencing Guidelines: A criminal statute need not contain sentencing guidelines. St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298 (1980).

Correction of Error: An error made by the trial court in the imposition of a sentence for a crime may be corrected by it. In re Lewis, 51 M 539, 154 P 713 (1916).

2013 Amendment: Chapter 177 inserted definition of restorative justice. Amendment effective April 12, 2013.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 177, L. 2013, provided: "WHEREAS, the Law and Justice Interim Committee examined the efficacy of restorative justice principles and practices within the criminal justice system as requested by Senate Joint Resolution No. 29 from the 2011 legislative session; and

WHEREAS, the Committee found that some Montana judges are referring offenders to restorative justice programs; and

WHEREAS, restorative justice programs depend on victim volunteers who incur training, travel, and per diem expenses; and

WHEREAS, offenders should be held accountable for their offenses by helping cover the cost of restorative justice opportunities."

2013 Code Commissioner Correction: The reference to 2-15-2013 was rendered inaccurate by the amendment of that section in Chapter 237, L. 2013. The former language of subsection (3) of that section read: "(3) (a) For the purposes of 2-15-2012, 2-15-2014, and this section, the term "restorative justice" means the philosophy of promoting and supporting practices, policies, and programs that focus on repairing the harm of crime, strengthening communities around the state, emphasizing accountability, and providing alternatives to incarceration for offenders who are at low risk for violence.

(b) Restorative justice is intended to improve the ability of the justice system to meet the needs of victims, to encourage community and victim participation in the criminal justice process, to reduce crime and increase the public sense of safety, to hold offenders accountable, and to provide rehabilitation and reintegration of offenders back into the community.

(c) Restorative justice programs include but are not limited to victim-offender meetings, family group conferencing, sentencing circles, use of victim and community impact statements, restitution programs, constructive community service, victim awareness education, victim empathy programs, school expulsion alternatives, peer mediation, diversion programs, and community panels."

2001 Amendment: Chapter 509 in definition of crime of violence deleted former (c) that read: "(c) any sexual offense in which the offender causes bodily injury to the victim or uses threat, intimidation, or force against the victim”, inserted (a)(iii) including certain offenses under 45-5-502, 45-5-503, and 45-5-507, and inserted (b) exempting certain offenses under 45-5-503; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 395 in (3) inserted “or nolo contendere”; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

1991 Amendment: Section 7(2), Ch. 794, L. 1991, a coordination instruction, provided: “If this bill and House Bill No. 272 are both passed and approved, then the definition of “community corrections” or “community corrections facility or program” contained in [section 1(1) of this act] [46-18-104(1)] is amended to read: “(1) “Community corrections” or “community corrections facility or program” means a community corrections facility or program as defined in [section 3 of House Bill No. 272] [53-30-303].” House Bill No. 272 was passed and approved as Ch. 554, L. 1991.

Effective Date: Section 8, Ch. 794, L. 1991, provided: “[This act] is effective July 1, 1991.”

Case Notes

Negligent Homicide Considered Crime of Violence — Consideration of Sentencing Alternatives to Prison Not Required: English asserted that because negligent homicide is not a crime of violence, the trial court erred by failing to consider sentencing alternatives to prison pursuant to 46-18-101(3)(f) when sentencing English to 20 years in prison for negligent homicide. The Supreme Court found the argument unpersuasive. Under this section, a crime in which the offender causes serious bodily injury or death to a person other than the offender is defined as a violent crime. English negligently caused the death of another person, and the trial court did not err in ruling that the negligent homicide was a crime of violence or by failing to consider sentencing alternatives to prison. St. v. English, 2006 MT 177, 333 M 23, 140 P3d 454 (2006).

Use of Weapon by Person in Group Robbery but No Evidence That Defendant Used Weapon — Sentence as Violent Offender Reversed: Ferguson was one of a group of persons that attempted a robbery. It was uncontested that someone in the group brandished a knife, but testimony was conflicting whether it was Ferguson. Nevertheless, the trial court enhanced Ferguson’s sentence because he was part of a crime of violence when a knife was used. However, the mere finding that someone in the group used a knife did not rise to the level of a finding that Ferguson used a knife. Thus, the Supreme Court reversed that part of Ferguson’s sentence and remanded for sentencing Ferguson as a nonviolent offender. St. v. Ferguson, 2005 MT 343, 330 M 103, 126 P3d 463 (2005).

No Evidence That Corporal Punishment Caused Mental Health Condition of Victim — Violent Felony Offender Designation Reversed: The sentencing court determined that Mason’s excessive use of force in punishing a child with a belt constituted a violent offense and caused the child to develop a serious mental health condition, so Mason was designated a violent felony offender. However, the state produced no evidence that Mason caused the child’s mental health condition or that the belt was used in a manner capable of producing death. Because the belt was not a deadly weapon, Mason’s conduct did not satisfy the definition of crime of violence in this section. The violent felony offender designation was reversed. St. v. Mason, 2003 MT 371, 319 M 117, 82 P3d 903 (2003).

Error in Refusing to Classify Defendant as First-Time, Nonviolent Offender Following Conviction for Criminal Endangerment: Hocevar was convicted of criminal endangerment, which required a finding that her conduct created a substantial risk of death or serious bodily injury. The District Court refused Hocevar’s request to be treated as a first-time, nonviolent felony offender because she committed a crime of violence. However, the definition of crime of violence in this section means a crime in which an offender causes a serious bodily injury or death. Given the various options that were available to the jury, it could not be determined on appeal whether the jury found that Hocevar actually caused a substantial risk of death or merely caused a risk of serious permanent disfigurement or protracted loss or impairment of the function or process of a bodily member or organ. In light of the uncertainty, the District Court committed reversible error in concluding that Hocevar committed an act of violence and in refusing to classify Hocevar as a first-time, nonviolent felony offender. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000).

Misdemeanor Offender Not Entitled to Consideration of Mandatory Sentencing Requirement Applicable to Nonviolent Felony Offenders: Renee was sentenced to incarceration for three misdemeanor violations. On appeal, Renee contended that because the misdemeanors were nonviolent offenses, the District Court erred in not complying with 46-18-201 by considering alternatives to sentencing for Renee’s nonviolent offenses. However, the plain language of subsection (3) of this section applies only to defendants who commit a particular kind of felony that is nonviolent. Therefore, a misdemeanor offender is not entitled to have a sentencing court consider the mandatory sentencing requirements of 46-18-201 and 46-18-225, which apply only to felony offenders. St. v. Renee, 1999 MT 135, 294 M 527, 983 P2d 893, 56 St. Rep. 545 (1999).

Nonviolent Felony Offenders Not Similarly Situated With Misdemeanor Offenders — No Equal Protection Violation in Different Felony and Misdemeanor Sentencing Schemes: Renee contended that Montana's nonviolent felony offender sentencing statutes violated his equal protection rights to physical liberty as a misdemeanor offender because both kinds of offenders may be subject to imprisonment, thus both felony and misdemeanor offenders are similarly situated classes dealt with unequally under the law. The Supreme Court disagreed. Relying on Tigner v. Tex., 310 US 141, 84 L Ed 1124, 60 S Ct 879 (1940), the court found that the constitution does not require that things that are different in fact or opinion be treated in law as though they were the same. Misdemeanor and felony offenders are not similarly situated because of differences in the quality and duration of punishment, as well as the long-term effects on an individual's liberty interest brought about by a felony conviction as compared to that for a misdemeanor conviction. Renee failed to make the necessary threshold showing that misdemeanor and nonviolent felony offenders are similarly situated, so the equal protection challenge failed. St. v. Renee, 1999 MT 135, 294 M 527, 983 P2d 893, 56 St. Rep. 545 (1999), distinguishing In re S.L.M., 287 M 23, 951 P2d 1365, 54 St. Rep. 1480 (1997).

Threat of Confinement to Extract Sexual Favors Held Crime of Violence: Anderson was convicted of various offenses involving sex with his stepdaughter. The District Court held in a sentencing proceeding that Anderson committed a "crime of violence". The District Court's holding was based upon testimony taken in a mental examination of Anderson that Anderson had threatened his stepdaughter with confinement to her room unless she had sex with him. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that Anderson's act of menacing his stepdaughter with confinement unless she had sex with him constituted a "crime of violence". St. v. Anderson, 282 M 41, 934 P2d 1037, 54 St. Rep. 232 (1997).

Violence and Use of Shotgun During Robbery Not Proved — Violent Offender Designation Not in Order: The state's assertions that defendant was charged with robbery and that the victim alleged in the presentence investigation that defendant used a shotgun did not make defendant a violent offender. Defendant pleaded guilty to a robbery charge, not including violence, and the victim's allegation was unproved. St. v. Pence, 273 M 223, 902 P2d 41, 52 St. Rep. 937 (1995).

Unless the court makes that finding, a defendant convicted of any offense not enumerated in subsection (1) that may result in incarceration for 1 year or more may not be sentenced before a written presentence investigation report by a probation and parole officer is presented to and considered by the district court”; and made minor changes in style. chapter 23, part 5"; in (3) at end of second sentence after "under" substituted "53-1-203(5)" for "53-1-203(4)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 11, 2007.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 517 inserted (3) relating to the payment of the fee by defendant. Amendment effective July 1, 2005.

Chapter 493 in (1) in third sentence in three places substituted references to defendant for references to offender; in (2) near end of second sentence after "probation" inserted "and parole" and at end substituted last sentence regarding presentence investigation for former sentence that read: "The district court may, in its discretion, order a presentence investigation for a defendant convicted of a misdemeanor"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 1, 2001.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 10, Ch. 493, L. 2001, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to offenders who are under the custody or supervision of the department of corrections on [the effective date of this act]." Effective May 1, 2001.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 189 in (1), in third sentence after "45-5-625", substituted "or 45-5-627" for "involving a victim who was less than 16 years of age when the offense was committed", after "include" inserted "a psychosexual", and after "considering" substituted "the risk the offender presents to the community" for "community safety", in fourth sentence, after "completed by a", substituted "sex offender therapist who is a member of the Montana sex offender treatment association or has comparable credentials acceptable to the professional and occupational licensing bureau of the department of commerce" for "person who is determined to be qualified under guidelines established by the department of corrections", and inserted fifth sentence regarding availability of the evaluation; in (2) inserted first sentence concerning presentence report; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

1995 Amendments: Chapter 482 in version effective July 1, 1997, in (1), at end of third sentence, inserted "unless the defendant was sentenced under 46-18-219"; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 546 in (1), in fourth sentence, substituted "department of corrections" for "department of corrections and human services". Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Coordination Instruction — Effective Dates: Section 21, Ch. 482, L. 1995, provided: "(1) If House Bill No. 357 and [this act] [Senate Bill No. 66] are both passed and approved:

(a) [sections 1 through 18] of [this act] are effective July 1, 1997; and

(b) the sentencing commission shall include recommendations for implementing the public policy contained in [sections 1 through 18] of [this act].

(2) [Sections 19, 20, and this section] [enacted as codification and coordination instructions] are effective July 1, 1995.

(3) If House Bill No. 357 is not passed and approved, then this section is void." House Bill No. 357 was approved March 31, 1995, as Ch. 306, L. 1995. Therefore, the amendments to 46-18-111, enacted as sec. 12 of Senate Bill No. 66, are effective July 1, 1997.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendments: Chapter 262 at beginning of third sentence of (1) inserted "If the defendant was convicted of an offense under 45-5-502, 45-5-503, 45-5-504, 45-5-505, 45-5-507, or 45-5-625 against a victim who was less than 16 years of age when the offense was committed" and near beginning of sixth sentence, before "court", inserted "district" and near end substituted "supreme court administrator" for "department of commerce"; and near beginning of (2), before "court", inserted "district". Pursuant to sec. 2, Ch. 347, L. 1993, a coordination instruction: in (1) changed "against a victim" to "involving a victim" and changed "supreme court administrator" to "county or the state, or both"; and in (2), near beginning of first sentence before "court", deleted "district".

Chapter 347 in (1), in second sentence after "court", substituted "shall consider the presentence investigation report prior to sentencing" for "may, in its discretion, order a presentence investigation for a defendant convicted of a misdemeanor", at beginning of third sentence inserted "If the defendant was convicted of an offense under 45-5-502, 45-5-503, 45-5-504, 45-5-505, 45-5-507, or 45-5-625 involving a victim who was less than 16 years of age when the offense was committed" and at end, after "treatment", inserted "of the offender in the least restrictive environment, considering community safety and offender needs", at beginning of fourth sentence inserted "The evaluation must be completed" and after "person" inserted "who is determined to be", and near end of sixth sentence substituted “county or the state, or both” for “department of commerce”; and substituted (2) requiring a presentence investigation report prior to sentencing for certain offenses for former language that read: “If the court finds that the record contains information sufficient to enable the meaningful exercise of discretion during sentencing, the defendant may waive a presentence investigation and report. Both the finding and the defendant’s waiver must be made in open court on the record.” Amendment effective April 16, 1993.

Coordination: Section 2, Ch. 347, L. 1993, provided: “If Senate Bill No. 125 is passed and approved and if it amends 46-18-111 by:

(1) inserting in subsection (1) the words “against a victim”, then the word “against” is changed to “involved”;

(2) substituting in subsection (1) the words “supreme court administrator” for the words “department of commerce”, then the words “supreme court administrator” are changed to “county or the state, or both,”;

(3) inserting the word “district” before the word “court” near the beginning of the first sentence of subsection (2), then the word “district” is stricken.”

Senate Bill No. 125 was passed and approved as Ch. 262, L. 1993, and amended 46-18-111 in the manner indicated. The Code Commissioner subsequently revised the Ch. 262 version as directed, with the following exception: in subsection (1), “against a victim” was changed, pursuant to the Code Commissioner’s authority in sec. 84, Ch. 10, L. 1993, to “involving a victim” to accurately reflect the amendment in Ch. 347, L. 1993.

1991 Amendments — Instructions to Code Commissioner: The Code Commissioner changed “department of institutions” to “department of corrections and human services”, pursuant to sec. 1, Ch. 262, L. 1991, directing the Code Commissioner to make the change wherever necessary in the Montana Code Annotated. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Chapter 800 substituted present language concerning presentence investigation and allowing waiver of investigation for former text that read: “No defendant convicted of an offense under 45-5-502 through 45-5-505, 45-5-507, or 45-5-625 against a victim who was less than 16 years old when the offense was committed may be sentenced or otherwise disposed of before a written report of investigation by a probation officer is presented to and considered by the court. The investigation must include an evaluation of the defendant and a recommendation as to treatment by a person qualified by professional experience. No defendant convicted of any other offense that may result in commitment for 1 year or more in the state prison may be sentenced or otherwise disposed of before a written report of investigation by a probation officer is presented to and considered by the court unless the court deems such report unnecessary. The court may, in its discretion, order a presentence investigation for a defendant convicted of any lesser crime or offense”.

Coordination Instruction — Amendment Void: Section 2, Ch. 192, L. 1991, provided: “If Senate Bill No. 51 is passed and approved and if it includes a section amending 46-18-111, then 46-18-111 is amended by the insertion of the following language at the end of subsection (1) of 46-18-111 and [section 1 of this act] [amending 46-18-111] is void:

“The investigation must include an evaluation of the defendant and a recommendation as to treatment by a person qualified under guidelines established by the department of institutions [now department of corrections]. All costs related to the evaluation must be paid by the defendant. If the defendant is determined by the court to be indigent, all costs related to the evaluation are the responsibility of the district court and must be paid by the department of commerce under Title 3, chapter 5, part 9.” Senate Bill No. 51 was approved May 23, 1991, as Ch. 800, L. 1991, and included an amendment to 46-18-111. Therefore, the amendment to 46-18-111 contained in sec. 1, Ch. 192, L. 1991, is void. Amendment contained in coordination instruction effective July 1, 1991.

1985 Amendment: In first sentence substituted “an offense under 45-5-502 through 45-5-505, 45-5-507, or 45-5-625 against a victim who was less than 16 years old when the offense was committed may” for “a crime which may result in commitment for 1 year or more in the state prison shall”, inserted second and third sentences requiring written report by probation officer to include an evaluation and a treatment recommendation and requiring the court to consider the report if it is possible defendant could be sent to the State Prison for a year or more, and transferred “unless the court deems such report unnecessary” to end of third sentence from end of first sentence.

Case Notes

Order on Fees Reversed — District Court Misapprehended Effect of Evidence When Conducting Ability-to-Pay Analysis — Undisputed Evidence That Defendant Could Not Pay — Illegal to Impose Certain Fees in Sentencing Conditions. St. v. Dowd, 2023 MT 170, 413 Mont. 245, 535 P.3d 645.

Court's Failure to Consider Defendant's Ability to Pay Jury Costs and Other Fees — Financial Assessments Stricken. St. v. Oliver, 2022 MT 104, 408 Mont. 519, 510 P.3d 1218.

Psychosexual Evaluation as Condition of Probation for Misdemeanor Sexual Assault Not Prohibited — Condition Reasonable Given Offender and Offense: The defendant pleaded guilty to two counts of misdemeanor sexual assault, for which he received a deferred sentence. As a condition of probation, the Municipal Court required the defendant to obtain a psychosexual evaluation. The defendant objected, arguing that the court lacked authority to order a psychosexual evaluation under 46-18-111 and that this condition of probation was unreasonable. The District Court affirmed the Municipal Court's sentencing, and the defendant appealed. The Supreme Court concluded that 46-18-111 did not proscribe a court from requiring a psychosexual evaluation as a condition of probation and that, given the offender and the offense, the evaluation was a reasonable condition. City of Bozeman v. Cantu, 2013 MT 40, 369 Mont. 81, 296 P.3d 461.

No New Presentence Investigation or Psychosexual Evaluation Required for Probation Revocation: Claassen, a level 1 sexual offender, violated the terms of his probation through the possession of child pornography. At his probation revocation hearing, the court elevated Claassen's offender status to level 3 without ordering a new presentence investigation or a psychosexual evaluation as required by 46-18-111 and 46-23-509. Because a parole violation is an administrative proceeding concerning the violation of the conditions of probation and not of the underlying offense, the court could properly sentence Claassen under 46-18-203 without a presentence investigation or a psychosexual evaluation. St. v. Claassen, 2012 MT 313, 367 Mont. 478, 291 P.3d 1176.

Sentencing Court's Consideration of Defendant's Background Information, Including Self-Reported Incidents of Sexual Contact With Children — No Error: While in sexual offender treatment, Hill admitted sexual contact with 12 or 13 other children. The District Court subsequently considered the self-reported acts in a psychosexual evaluation, which Hill maintained was a violation of the right against self-incrimination. The Supreme Court disagreed. In a classic penalty situation where an accused cannot elect to exercise the right to remain silent because of the possibility of substantial penalties if the person chooses not to speak, the state is prevented from using the compelled statements in later criminal proceedings. However, Hill was not in a classic penalty situation, but rather in a classic plea bargain situation. By consent decree, the state offered Hill treatment in exchange for an admission of misdemeanor assault and an agreement to undergo treatment. Hill was not faced with penalties by refusing to reveal prior sexual contacts, and the consent decree was never revoked even though Hill violated it. Absent a classic penalty situation, Hill's right against self-incrimination was not violated by the District Court's consideration of Hill's character, history, mental and physical condition, and background, including the self-reported acts in the psychosexual evaluation. St. v. Hill, 2009 MT 134, 350 M 296, 207 P.3d 307 (2009). See also St. v. Fuller, 276 M 155, 915 P.2d 809 (1996), and In re R.L.H., 2005 MT 177, 327 M 520, 116 P.3d 791 (2005).

No Error in Ordering Second Psychosexual Evaluation in Incest Case to Provide Updated Information for Risk Assessment: Having been convicted of eight counts of incest, the state requested that an independent second psychosexual evaluation be performed on Hamilton based on changed circumstances and because Hamilton's chosen evaluator opined that Hamilton could be designated a tier 1 low risk to reoffend. The District Court agreed and ordered a second evaluation with an independent evaluator, but Hamilton declined to participate. Without interviewing Hamilton personally, the second evaluator recommended a tier 2 risk designation, which the sentencing court applied. Hamilton appealed on grounds that there were no legal grounds for the state to seek a second evaluation because the first evaluation met the statutory requirements. The Supreme Court held that this section does not, by its plain language, provide that only one evaluator may be involved or that only one psychosexual evaluation report may be issued. Because of concerns that Hamilton's first evaluation was not independently conducted and that some of the factors in the first risk assessment had changed, the District Court did not abuse its discretion by ordering a second updated evaluation based on accurate information. St. v. Hamilton, 2007 MT 223, 339 M 92, 167 P.3d 906 (2007).

No Error in Requiring Completion of Sexual Offender Course as Condition of Suspended Sentence for Burglary Conviction When Sexual Action Taken During Burglary: Following

Marshall's conviction for burglary, the sentencing court imposed a 6-year deferred sentence with a number of conditions, including a requirement that Marshall complete a sexual offender course. Marshall argued that the court lacked authority to require the course because burglary was not a sexual crime. Nevertheless, the sentencing court designated Marshall as a level 1 sexual offender and required completion of the course, so Marshall appealed. The Supreme Court held that the condition was reasonably related to the crime because there was a nexus between sex offender treatment and the circumstances of the burglary. The presentence report revealed that during the burglary, Marshall became aroused after going through a woman's underwear drawer, took some underwear from the drawer, and masturbated on the woman's bed. Because the underlying factual situation included sexual actions taken by Marshall during the burglary, the sentencing court was not precluded from imposing sexual offender treatment as a condition designed to rehabilitate Marshall and to protect society, even though Marshall was not convicted of a sexual crime. St. v. Marshall, 2007 MT 218, 339 M 50, 170 P3d 923 (2007).

No Sentencing Error Based on Investigator's Alleged Bias in Preparing Accurate Presentence Report: Bar-Jonah contended that the trial court erred by not granting a motion to strike a presentence investigation (PSI) report prepared by an investigator who Bar-Jonah contended was biased and presented an incomplete report by failing to contact Bar-Jonah's family when preparing the social history. The Supreme Court noted that family contact is not statutorily required or implied, but that the report must be based on substantially correct information (see St. v. McPherson, 236 M 484, 771 P2d 120 (1989)). In this case, the trial court based its sentence on a PSI prepared by Bar-Jonah's probation officer, on psychological evaluations conducted by Bar-Jonah's own psychologists, and on a sexual offender report prepared by another doctor. These documents adequately substantiated the trial court's rationale that the documents were within the purview of substantially correct information. Additionally, Bar-Jonah was provided a copy of the report and the opportunity to rebut the information but failed to meet the burden of showing that the information was materially inaccurate or prejudicial to warrant overturning the sentence. The sentence was affirmed. St. v. Bar-Jonah, 2004 MT 344, 324 M 278, 102 P3d 1229 (2004).

Community Risk by Sex Offender — Sentencing Court Consideration of Information in Presentence Report Unrelated to Crime Charged Not Erroneous: Legg pleaded not guilty to felony sexual assault of a 9-year-old girl. The initial mental examination revealed that Legg was severely depressed but competent to understand the charges and appreciate the consequences of possible incarceration. Legg's counsel then requested a psychosexual evaluation of Legg. The analyst categorized Legg as a low-level offender and suggested that community placement and outpatient sexual offender treatment would be appropriate. Legg then entered a plea bargain wherein the state agreed to recommend sentencing in accordance with the evaluations. Legg pleaded guilty, and the District Court ordered a presentence investigation (PSI). The investigator discovered information that Legg had not revealed previously, including the fact that Legg was permanently prohibited from contact with his ex-wife and children and that there were other secondary victims of Legg's sexual abuse. The analyst who performed Legg's psychosexual evaluation then reclassified Legg as a moderate risk offender and recommended confinement rather than community placement because the risk was too great to treat Legg as an outpatient. Legg filed a motion in limine to exclude any evidence from the PSI from persons other than the victim, her family, or her therapists. The motion was not ruled upon, so the challenged evidence was not excluded. The state recommended a 30-year sentence with 25 years suspended, and Legg consented to the recommendation. However, after hearing from the victim's family, doctor, and counselor and from the analyst, the court sentenced Legg to 50 years with none suspended. Legg appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Consideration of all materials in the PSI was required under this section, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in doing so. Further, the statements by the sentencing court that the 50-year sentence was both to punish Legg and to protect society from Legg in the future were a sufficient explanation of the reasons for the sentence, as required under 46-18-115. St. v. Legg, 2004 MT 26, 319 M 362, 84 P3d 648 (2004).

No Requirement That Sentencing Court Consider and Rule on Each Treatment Recommendation in Presentence Report: Defendant contended that the sentencing court erred by failing to consider sentencing recommendations in a presentence investigation (PSI) report in the least restrictive environment, arguing that the court must review and analyze each PSI recommendation for sentence so that a defendant may receive treatment in the least restrictive environment. However, defendant provided no authority that a sentencing court must itemize each piece of evidence presented and either accept or reject it. In this case, the court did not explicitly state that it considered each PSI recommendation, but the court did question the analyst who prepared the report and considered the recommendations of the County Attorney and defense counsel before sentencing and thus adequately considered the PSI recommendations. Judgment was affirmed. St. v. Legg, 2004 MT 26, 319 M 362, 84 P3d 648 (2004).

Defendant's Affirmation of Correctness of Information in Presentence Investigation Constituting Waiver of Due Process Challenge: McLeod challenged the legality of his dangerous drug sentence on due process grounds because the sentencing court relied on a presentence investigation (PSI) report that indicated that McLeod had five previous felony drug convictions instead of the actual four previous convictions. A convicted defendant has a due process guarantee against a sentence predicated on misinformation. Here, McLeod was given proper notice of the information in the PSI, availed himself of the opportunity to extensively review the information, was represented by counsel at the time that the PSI was made known to him and reviewed the information with counsel, and was given repeated opportunities to rebut the information but chose instead to affirm the accuracy of the PSI. Thus, pursuant to St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976), McLeod was afforded the process due to a criminal defendant at sentencing. McLeod's affirmation of the correctness of the PSI constituted a waiver of a due process challenge, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. McLeod, 2002 MT 348, 313 M 358, 61 P3d 126 (2002).

Failure to Object to Conduct of Psychological Evaluation or to Continuation of Sentencing Hearing — Waiver of Right to Consideration on Appeal: Osterloth was convicted of felony sexual assault and was required to undergo a sexual offender evaluation by a therapist of his choice at county expense. His scheduled sentencing was continued to allow the evaluation. On appeal, Osterloth contended that the District Court erred by sentencing him without an evaluation prepared by a qualified therapist, pursuant to this section, and by continuing sentencing instead of conducting a sentencing hearing without delay, as required in 46-18-115. The Supreme Court noted that under 46-20-104, it is precluded from considering an alleged error unless a timely objection was made or the criteria of 46-20-701 are met. Osterloth did not object to the evaluation being conducted by his own evaluator or to the sentencing continuation, nor did he assert that he could satisfy any of the requirements of 46-20-701. Thus, Osterloth waived the right to have the Supreme Court consider these alleged errors on appeal. St. v. Osterloth, 2000 MT 129, 299 M 517, 1 P3d 946, 57 St. Rep. 533 (2000).

Reliance of Sentencing Judge on Other Conviction Valid at Time of Sentencing but Later Found Invalid — Inability of Defendant to Address Vacation of Prior Convictions as Due Process Violation: In 1983, Bauer was charged with and convicted of two felonies in Silver Bow County and sentenced to terms in the state prison. Bauer challenged the convictions. About 8 years later, Bauer was charged with felony intimidation in Powell County and was sentenced to an additional 5 years in prison. Following the 1991 prison riots, Bauer was moved to Blaine County, where he was later charged with three felonies arising out of an incident with a female inmate at the Blaine County jail. The presentence investigation report (PSI) referred to the Silver Bow County convictions, and the sentencing court expressly referred to the PSI in sentencing Bauer. The court held that if Bauer was successful in challenging the 1983 convictions, the sentences for the Blaine County offenses would run from the date of judgment and sentence and Bauer would be credited with any time served from the date of filing of the information to the date of imposition of the Blaine County sentences. Bauer's 1983 sentences were subsequently voided based on newly discovered DNA evidence that exonerated Bauer. Bauer then sought postconviction relief on grounds that his due process rights had been violated when the sentencing court in Blaine County relied on the now incorrect information in the PSI regarding the Silver Bow County convictions. Under both the federal and state constitutions, a defendant is protected from a sentence predicated on misinformation about that defendant's criminal history and must be given an opportunity to explain, argue, and rebut any information, including presentencing information, that may lead to a deprivation of life, liberty, or property. Bauer could not be said to have been given that opportunity because the 1983 convictions were still valid at the time of sentencing in Blaine County, nor did the sentencing court have a full opportunity to consider the procedural and substantive consequences of the actual vacation of the 1983 convictions or the specific grounds upon which postconviction relief was granted by the Silver Bow County court. What was correct information at the time of sentencing became misinformation after the fact. Notwithstanding that the sentencing court specifically stated that it did not rely on the 1983 convictions, the Supreme Court reversed on grounds of fundamental fairness, refusing to allow the misinformation to go unchallenged before the District Court by denying Bauer the opportunity to be resentenced on the basis of materially accurate information. The case was remanded for resentencing before a new District Court Judge. Bauer v. St., 1999 MT 185, 295 M

306, 983 P2d 955, 56 St. Rep. 715 (1999), following St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976), St. v. Redding, 208 M 24, 675 P2d 974, 41 St. Rep. 147 (1984), and Bishop v. St., 254 M 100, 835 P2d 732, 49 St. Rep. 650 (1992).

Denial by Defendant of Sexual Crimes — Sentence Proper Absent Sex Offender Evaluation: Prior to sentencing McQuiston for convictions of incest and sexual intercourse without consent, the District Court ordered a presentence investigation report and ordered McQuiston to undergo a sex offender evaluation. No sex offender evaluation had been prepared at the time of sentencing, and McQuiston alleged error in imposing a sentence without the completed evaluation. Even though the evaluation was not mandatory because the victim was 19 years old when the offenses were committed, the record was clear that McQuiston denied the crimes and that sex offender treatment would be ineffective. Therefore, the court did not abuse its discretion in sentencing McQuiston without considering a sex offender evaluation. St. v. McQuiston, 277 M 397, 922 P2d 519, 53 St. Rep. 729 (1996).

Sentencing Without Consideration of Presentence Report — Reversible Error: The District Court's refusal to continue sentencing in order to allow inclusion in the presentencing investigation of a sex offender evaluation that had not been completed prior to the sentencing hearing, as required by this section, constituted reversible error warranting remand for resentencing in order that the report be considered. St. v. Alexander, 265 M 192, 875 P2d 345, 51 St. Rep. 474 (1994), followed in St. v. Barnhart, 283 M 518, 942 P2d 718, 54 St. Rep. 772 (1997).

Order and Waiver of Presentence Investigation Report: Absent certain circumstances, this section places an affirmative duty on the District Court to order a presentence investigation report in felony cases. A defendant is not under any obligation to request the report. The circumstances under which the court may decline to order the report require a finding by the court and a waiver by the defendant. Absent a finding and waiver, ordering the report as required by statute did not constitute error. The report must be official, be prepared by a probation officer, and contain the information mandated by 46-18-112. St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000, 50 St. Rep. 1388 (1993) (Smith II). Following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

No Requirement for Consideration of Prior Convictions: When defendant was sentenced for felony assault (now assault with a weapon) conviction and for sexual assault and incest conviction at the same sentencing hearing, the District Court was not required to wait until the convictions for felony assault (now assault with a weapon) were affirmed on appeal before considering them for the purpose of sentencing defendant for the sexual assault and incest convictions. St. v. Sor-Lokken, 247 M 343, 805 P2d 1367, 48 St. Rep. 142 (1991).

Consideration of Polygraph Test in Mental Health Evaluations — No Error in Sentencing: Defendant presented the sentencing court with three evaluations that were conducted at his request and submitted by him in support of his recommendation for sentencing. On appeal, he complained that the court improperly considered the report of a lie detector test referred to in two of the evaluations. The judge was not required to consider the evaluations, but under the relaxed standards of evidence in a sentencing situation, he was free to do so. Polygraph information is inadmissible as evidence at trial; however, the Montana Rules of Evidence do not apply to sentencing hearings. Defendant invited consideration of the evaluations and could not complain on appeal that it was in the record. Therefore, the court did not err in considering the evidence of the polygraph test at sentencing. St. v. McPherson, 236 M 484, 771 P2d 120, 46 St. Rep. 525 (1989).

Information Additional to That in Presentence Report Presented at Sentencing Hearing — No Due Process Violation: The presentence investigation report submitted to the District Court showed that defendant had had his parole on another conviction revoked for carrying a concealed weapon. At the sentencing hearing the court, over defendant's objection, received into evidence a written report and additional testimony by defendant's former parole officer about the reasons that parole was revoked. Defendant's due process rights were not violated by this procedure. He was represented by a lawyer at the sentencing hearing, had the opportunity to cross-examine the witness regarding the new material, had the opportunity to rebut the new material, and could have called for a continuance in order to call his own rebuttal witnesses. St. v. Elliott, 221 M 174, 717 P2d 572, 43 St. Rep. 723 (1986).

Habitual Traffic Offender — Presentence Investigation Proper: The sentencing judge did not err in ordering a presentence investigation of a defendant convicted of operating a motor vehicle while designated a habitual traffic offender. The judge, in his discretion, may order a presentence investigation when the potential penalty is less than 1 year in prison. (See 2001 amendment.) St. v. Grant, 217 M 357, 704 P2d 1064, 42 St. Rep. 1248 (1985).

Capital Sentence Requested by Defendant — No Basis for Resentencing: Defendant pleaded guilty to two counts of aggravated kidnapping and two counts of deliberate homicide. Defendant requested the death penalty. After sentencing, defendant had second thoughts and on appeal sought a resentencing. The Supreme Court held there was no basis for resentencing because: (1) sentencing was not tainted by reliance on prior Canadian convictions obtained without counsel; (2) inclusion of juvenile offenses as adult offenses in presentence report was not error; (3) a court-ordered presentence interview was not violative of the fifth amendment; (4) recommendation for the death penalty in the presentence report was not improper; (5) no judicial error was committed in the extent of review of mitigating factors and no unconstitutional limit was placed on the court's consideration of mitigating circumstances; (6) no error was found in the court's denial of defendant's motion for additional psychiatric evaluation; (7) defendant was not required to be present at proceedings occurring after the verdict; (8) jury participation is not constitutionally required in capital sentencing procedures; (9) no indication was found that the trial court imposed the death penalty out of passion or prejudice; and (10) the sentence was not excessive or disproportionate. St. v. Smith, 217 M 461, 705 P2d 1087, 42 St. Rep. 463 (1985) (Smith I). A habeas corpus petition was conditionally granted in Smith v. McCormick, 917 F2d 1153 (9th Cir. 1990), a subsequent resentencing of death was reversed and remanded for preparation of a new presentence investigation, St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000 (1993) (Smith II), and following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

No Error in Trial Court's Failure to Order Presentence Investigation Report: The two defendants, both 19 years of age, pleaded guilty to deliberate homicide. Without a presentence report, the District Court sentenced each defendant to 100 years in prison. When, as in this case, the sentencing court is fully apprised of the defendants' backgrounds and any mitigating factors, it is not error for the court to sentence the defendants without ordering a presentence investigation. The statute gives the trial court discretion to conclude that a report is unnecessary. In the present case, counsel for the defendants were asked if there was any reason for postponing sentencing and they stated there was no reason, which suggests a waiver by counsel of any presentence report. St. v. Hintz, 213 M 364, 691 P2d 814, 41 St. Rep. 2172 (1984).

Judge's Off-Record Meeting With Probation Officer — Defense and Defendant Absent — No Due Process Violation — Inaccuracy in Sentence Report or Prejudice Not Shown: The rule in St. v. Redding, 208 M 24, 675 P2d 974, 41 St. Rep. 147 (1984), that an off-the-record private meeting between the sentencing judge and the probation officer without the presence of defendant or his counsel violates due process is to be applied prospectively only, unless, with respect to a sentence rendered prior to the date of the decision in Redding, appellant alleges and shows inaccuracies in the presentence report or prejudice arising from its use by the judge. St. v. Stroud, 210 M 58, 683 P2d 459, 41 St. Rep. 919 (1984).

Presentence Report Recommendation Not Binding on Judge: A presentence report recommended that a convicted robber receive a sentence of 15 years. The trial judge imposed a sentence of 30 years, detailing the reasons for the sentence. The sentence was proper since there is no requirement that the sentencing judge adopt the recommendation of a presentence report or that he state reasons for any discrepancy between the recommended sentence and the one actually imposed. He need only state the reasons why the sentence is imposed. St. v. Stephens, 198 M 140, 645 P2d 387, 39 St. Rep. 822 (1982), followed in St. v. McPherson, 236 M 484, 771 P2d 120, 46 St. Rep. 525 (1989), McPherson was cited in St. v. Long, 274 M 228, 907 P2d 945, 52 St. Rep. 1204 (1995).

Due Process — Sentencing Without Newly Prepared Report: The sentencing of the defendant without a presentence investigation when the court was familiar with the defendant and his crimes and had before it, among other things, a presentence report prepared in another trial of the defendant and a letter written by a victim in the case to another judge in another matter did not constitute a denial of due process when the defendant had seen a copy of the presentence report and had been furnished with a copy of the letter and had the opportunity to mitigate their effect, if any, but did not. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Persistent Felony Offender: Although the State proved the defendant's status as a persistent felony offender by means of a prior felony conviction pending appeal, the need for a presentence investigation report was not thereby eliminated. St. v. Radi, 176 M 451, 578 P2d 1169 (1978).

Private Interviews by Sentencing Judge: A sentencing judge may not conduct his own presentence investigation by privately interviewing persons he believes to know more than they told at trial. By doing this, he becomes a fact gatherer as well as a fact finder, and thereby subjects a defendant to an impossible burden. St. v. Stewart, 175 M 286, 573 P2d 1138 (1977), followed in St. v. Baker, 205 M 244, 667 P2d 416, 40 St. Rep. 1244 (1983).

Improper Matter Considered in Sentencing: A court cannot rely upon a prior felony conviction in sentencing if the defendant was not represented by counsel. When improper matters are brought before the sentencing court and are not disclosed and explained at the sentencing hearing, a defendant has a right to be resentenced. Ryan v. Crist, 172 M 411, 563 P2d 1145 (1977).

Reading Juvenile Record Into Record: The trial court did not err in considering and reading into the record in open court prior events of an 18-year-old defendant's life as disclosed by his juvenile record under a former statute directing the judge to have a written report by the probation officer or parole officer and to consider the same before sentencing a defendant, since the defendant did not object to the reading into the record and since after reading into the record the judge asked "Is there any legal excuse why judgment and sentence of court should not be pronounced against you?" St. v. Manning, 149 M 517, 429 P2d 625 (1967).

Unsigned, Privately Submitted Report of Investigator: When the trial judge requested a presentence investigation, unsworn representations and recommendations set forth in the investigator's unsigned report privately offered to and privately received and adopted by the trial judge were not evidence. Kuhl v. District Court, 139 M 536, 366 P2d 347 (1961).

Case Notes

Plea-Bargained Sentence Actually Recommended — Plea Agreement Not Undermined by Prosecutor's Other Conduct: Upon reviewing the prosecutor's conduct in response to the defendant's claim that the prosecutor undermined the plea agreement, the Supreme Court held: (1) introducing the testimony of the defendant's victim was allowable because she had a right to testify under 46-18-115(4)(a); (2) the recommendation by the probation officer for a $5,000 fine was allowable because he had prepared the presentence investigation; (3) the prosecutor's summation did not undercut the plea agreement just because the prosecutor argued against the defendant's suggestion for a 5-year sentence. The defendant had agreed to a sentence of 30 years, 20 suspended, as part of the plea agreement, and the prosecutor recommended a sentence of exactly that length. St. v. McDowell, 2011 MT 75, 360 Mont. 83, 253 P.3d 812.

No Error in Denial of Motion to Continue Sentencing Hearing for Further Review and Challenge of Accuracy of Presentence Investigation Report: Morrison was convicted of felony partner or family member assault, a sixth offense, misdemeanor criminal mischief, and misdemeanor disorderly conduct. A charge of felony aggravated burglary was dismissed. Two days before sentencing, Morrison received the presentence investigation report. The following day, concerned that the report recited facts relevant to the dismissed felony aggravated burglary charge, Morrison moved for a continuance of the sentencing hearing in order to investigate and contest those provisions of the report. At sentencing, the District Court entertained Morrison's arguments concerning the accuracy of the "circumstances of the offense" section of the report and decided to strike that section, stating that the court would not rely on that information for sentencing. The motion for continuance was denied. The court also offered to allow Morrison to question the author of the report regarding the accuracy of the section of the report detailing Morrison's criminal history, but Morrison declined the offer and elected to proceed with sentencing. Following sentencing, Morrison appealed on grounds that the District Court erred by denying the motion for continuance. The Supreme Court disagreed. By striking the questioned section of the report, the sentencing court removed any reference to disputed information in the report, and by declining the chance to question the accuracy of the report, Morrison waived any objection to proceeding to sentencing. The District Court did not abuse its discretion by denying the continuance motion, and Morrison's sentence was affirmed. St. v. Morrison, 2009 MT 397, 353 M 407, 220 P3d 659 (2009).

Sentencing Court's Consideration of Defendant's Background Information, Including Self-Reported Incidents of Sexual Contact With Children — No Error: While in sexual offender treatment, Hill admitted sexual contact with 12 or 13 other children. The District Court subsequently considered the self-reported acts in a psychosexual evaluation, which Hill maintained was a violation of the right against self-incrimination. The Supreme Court disagreed. In a classic penalty situation where an accused cannot elect to exercise the right to remain silent because of the possibility of substantial penalties if the person chooses not to speak, the state is prevented from using the compelled statements in later criminal proceedings. However, Hill was not in a classic penalty situation, but rather in a classic plea bargain situation. By consent decree, the state offered Hill treatment in exchange for an admission of misdemeanor assault and an agreement to undergo treatment. Hill was not faced with penalties by refusing to reveal prior sexual contacts, and the consent decree was never revoked even though Hill violated it. Absent a classic penalty situation, Hill's right against self-incrimination was not violated by the District Court's consideration of Hill's character, history, mental and physical condition, and background, including the self-reported acts in the psychosexual evaluation. St. v. Hill, 2009 MT 134, 350 M 296, 207 P3d 307 (2009). See also St. v. Fuller, 276 M 155, 915 P2d 809 (1996), and In re R.L.H., 2005 MT 177, 327 M 520, 116 P3d 791 (2005).

Sufficient Accurate Information to Support Sentence for Distribution of Methamphetamine: Harper was sentenced to 20 years in prison with 10 years suspended and fined $12,000 after pleading guilty to possession of dangerous drugs with intent to distribute. Harper appealed on grounds that the sentencing court based the sentence on inaccurate and insufficient evidence that Harper was the center of the drug operation. Harper had a right to be sentenced based on correct evidence, but also had the affirmative duty to show, beyond mere unsupported contentions, that the alleged misinformation was materially inaccurate and to present information establishing inaccuracies in the presentence investigation report. In this case, the sentencing court did nothing more than consider relevant information relating to the nature and circumstances of the possession of drugs found during the search of Harper's home, including unrefuted information that Harper was at the center of a methamphetamine distribution business conducted from the home. Information in the presentence investigation report simply underscored Harper's involvement in drug distribution and supported that charge to which Harper pleaded guilty. The information was properly before the sentencing court, and the court did not err in imposing a sentence within the statutory parameters. The sentence was affirmed. St. v. Harper, 2006 MT 259, 334 M 138, 144 P3d 826 (2006), followed in St. v. Walker, 2007 MT 205, 338 M 529, 167 P3d 879 (2007), with respect to defendant's affirmative duty to show, beyond mere unsupported contentions, that alleged misinformation in a presentence investigation report was materially inaccurate and to present information establishing inaccuracies in the presentence investigation report.

No Sentencing Error Based on Investigator's Alleged Bias in Preparing Accurate Presentence Report: Bar-Jonah contended that the trial court erred by not granting a motion to strike a presentence investigation (PSI) report prepared by an investigator who Bar-Jonah contended was biased and presented an incomplete report by failing to contact Bar-Jonah's family when preparing the social history. The Supreme Court noted that family contact is not statutorily required or implied, but that the report must be based on substantially correct information (see St. v. McPherson, 236 M 484, 771 P2d 120 (1989)). In this case, the trial court based its sentence on a PSI prepared by Bar-Jonah's probation officer, on psychological evaluations conducted by Bar-Jonah's own psychologists, and on a sexual offender report prepared by another doctor. These documents adequately substantiated the trial court's rationale that the documents were within the purview of substantially correct information. Additionally, Bar-Jonah was provided a copy of the report and the opportunity to rebut the information but failed to meet the burden of showing that the information was materially inaccurate or prejudicial to warrant overturning the sentence. The sentence was affirmed. St. v. Bar-Jonah, 2004 MT 344, 324 M 278, 102 P3d 1229 (2004).

Community Risk by Sex Offender — Sentencing Court Consideration of Information in Presentence Report Unrelated to Crime Charged Not Erroneous: Legg pleaded not guilty to felony sexual assault of a 9-year-old girl. The initial mental examination revealed that Legg was severely depressed but competent to understand the charges and appreciate the consequences of possible incarceration. Legg's counsel then requested a psychosexual evaluation of Legg. The analyst categorized Legg as a low-level offender and suggested that community placement and outpatient sexual offender treatment would be appropriate. Legg then entered a plea bargain wherein the state agreed to recommend sentencing in accordance with the evaluations. Legg pleaded guilty, and the District Court ordered a presentence investigation (PSI). The investigator discovered information that Legg had not revealed previously, including the fact that Legg was permanently prohibited from contact with his ex-wife and children and that there were other secondary victims of Legg's sexual abuse. The analyst who performed Legg's psychosexual evaluation then reclassified Legg as a moderate risk offender and recommended confinement rather than community placement because the risk was too great to treat Legg as an outpatient. Legg filed a motion in limine to exclude any evidence from the PSI from persons other than the victim, her family, or her therapists. The motion was not ruled upon, so the challenged evidence was not excluded. The state recommended a 30-year sentence with 25 years suspended, and Legg consented to the recommendation. However, after hearing from the victim's family, doctor, and counselor and from the analyst, the court sentenced Legg to 50 years with none suspended. Legg appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Consideration of all materials in the PSI was required under 46-18-111, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in doing so. Further, the statements by the sentencing court that the 50-year sentence was both to punish Legg and to protect society from Legg in the future were a sufficient explanation of the reasons for the sentence, as required under 46-18-115. St. v. Legg, 2004 MT 26, 319 M 362, 84 P3d 648 (2004).

Consideration at Sentencing of Alleged Crimes Dismissed by Plea Bargain Not Violative of Due Process: At sentencing, the District Court considered allegations of other crimes for which Mason had been initially charged but that had been dismissed by plea agreement. Mason contended that consideration of statements related to unproved conduct violated the right to due process. The Supreme Court noted that due process protects a defendant from being sentenced based on misinformation and requires that a defendant be given an opportunity to rebut any information that may lead to deprivation of life, liberty, or property, but does not protect against all misinformation unless the sentence is premised on materially false misinformation. The court also noted that St. v. Collier, 277 M 46, 919 P2d 376 (1996), allows a sentencing court to consider any evidence that has probative force, including other acts that have been dismissed by plea agreement, as in St. v. Baldwin, 192 M 521, 629 P2d 222 (1981). Nothing in Mason's plea agreement prevented the state from presenting the facts of the case during the sentencing hearing, and in fact, that inquiry is required as part of the presentence investigation report under this section. Mason failed to show that the sentencing court relied on misinformation and thus was not entitled to resentencing on due process grounds. Further, the plea agreement required relinquishment of Mason's parental rights, so the sentencing court properly considered evidence of the danger Mason posed to the other children in order to approve that portion of the agreement. St. v. Mason, 2003 MT 371, 319 M 117, 82 P3d 903 (2003), followed in St. v. Ferguson, 2005 MT 343, 330 M 103, 126 P3d 463 (2005), and St. v. Phillips, 2007 MT 117, 337 M 248, 159 P3d 1078 (2007).

Defendant's Affirmation of Correctness of Information in Presentence Investigation Constituting Waiver of Due Process Challenge: McLeod challenged the legality of his dangerous drug sentence on due process grounds because the sentencing court relied on a presentence investigation (PSI) report that indicated that McLeod had five previous felony drug convictions instead of the actual four previous convictions. A convicted defendant has a due process guarantee against a sentence predicated on misinformation. Here, McLeod was given proper notice of the information in the PSI, availed himself of the opportunity to extensively review the information, was represented by counsel at the time that the PSI was made known to him and reviewed the information with counsel, and was given repeated opportunities to rebut the information but chose instead to affirm the accuracy of the PSI. Thus, pursuant to St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976), McLeod was afforded the process due to a criminal defendant at sentencing. McLeod's affirmation of the correctness of the PSI constituted a waiver of a due process challenge, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. McLeod, 2002 MT 348, 313 M 358, 61 P3d 126 (2002).

No Error in Refusal to Allow Withdrawal of Guilty Plea — Parents of Sexual Assault Victim Not Parties to Plea Agreement: Following a guilty plea and conviction of sexual assault, Knox moved to withdraw the guilty plea, arguing that the County Attorney violated the terms of a plea agreement, which had recommended a 30-year suspended sentence and dropping a second sexual assault charge in exchange for the guilty plea, and indicated that the parents of the 5-year-old victim would not recommend incarceration in the victim impact statement of the presentence investigation. During the colloquy required by 46-12-210, the District Court informed Knox that, like the court itself, the parents were not bound by the plea agreement and could change their minds at any time as far as recommending future imprisonment, adding that if the parents did change their minds, that fact would not suffice as grounds for withdrawal of a guilty plea. Nevertheless, Knox voluntarily accepted the possible consequences of the plea and pleaded guilty. The parents then recommended imprisonment, and Knox was sentenced to 40 years with 18 suspended. A District Court may permit the withdrawal of a guilty plea upon a showing of good cause, but the determination of good cause is discretionary, and each case is considered on its merits. Here, the District Court subsequently denied the withdrawal motion pursuant to the colloquy, and Knox appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. After applying the factors in St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997), the Supreme Court found that there was no abuse of discretion in the denial of the motion to withdraw and that Knox's guilty plea thus met the constitutional standard of a voluntary, intelligent, and knowing choice among options. The District Court acted according to statutory requirements when it made clear that the parents could make known their opinion and change their minds regarding Knox's incarceration because they were not parties to the plea agreement, pursuant to the court's duties in 46-18-115. Further, other evidence in a psychological evaluation indicated that Knox had violent tendencies that presented complications to successful treatment, had high-risk factors for violent recidivism, and had resisted treatment for chemical dependency in the past, so the parents' incarceration request was not a determinative basis for the sentence. St. v. Knox, 2001 MT 232, 307 M 1, 36 P3d 383 (2001).

Use of Presentence Investigation Report at Resentencing Hearing — No Due Process Violation: At a resentencing hearing, the petitioner objected to the evaluation and recommendation contained in the presentence investigation report in that it was not based upon the factual information provided to the probation officer, was biased in favor of the state, and was based on hearsay in uninvestigated reports and in that his criminal history data was not verified. On appeal, the petitioner claimed prejudice by a biased probation officer who wrote the report. The Supreme Court held that when the petitioner was provided with the report prior to the sentencing hearing, the petitioner was provided with the opportunity to explain, argue, and rebut the information, and the petitioner's counsel extensively cross-examined the author of the report, the petitioner could not establish that the court relied on any misinformation in sentencing. The petitioner was not entitled to resentencing on due process grounds. Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

Due Process Violation in Failing to Afford Defendant Opportunity at Sentencing to Rebut Information Not in Presentence Investigation Report: In sentencing Hocevar for criminal endangerment of one child, the District Court denied Hocevar's due process rights by finding by a preponderance of the evidence that Hocevar smothered two other children without affording Hocevar the opportunity procedurally to challenge the accuracy of the information, which was not contained in the presentence investigation report. As determined in St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976), a sentencing judge may rely on facts outside the presentence report if, in order to avoid misinformation in sentencing, the defendant is given an opportunity to explain or rebut the information at the presentence hearing. The Supreme Court remanded for resentencing. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000).

Reliance of Sentencing Judge on Other Conviction Valid at Time of Sentencing but Later Found Invalid — Inability of Defendant to Address Vacation of Prior Convictions as Due Process Violation: In 1983, Bauer was charged with and convicted of two felonies in Silver Bow County and sentenced to terms in the state prison. Bauer challenged the convictions. About 8 years later, Bauer was charged with felony intimidation in Powell County and was sentenced to an additional 5 years in prison. Following the 1991 prison riots, Bauer was moved to Blaine County, where he was later charged with three felonies arising out of an incident with a female inmate at the Blaine County jail. The presentence investigation report (PSI) referred to the Silver Bow County convictions, and the sentencing court expressly referred to the PSI in sentencing Bauer. The court held that if Bauer was successful in challenging the 1983 convictions, the sentences for the Blaine County offenses would run from the date of judgment and sentence and Bauer would be credited with any time served from the date of filing of the information to the date of imposition of the Blaine County sentences. Bauer's 1983 sentences were subsequently voided based on newly discovered DNA evidence that exonerated Bauer. Bauer then sought postconviction relief on grounds that his due process rights had been violated when the sentencing court in Blaine County relied on the now incorrect information in the PSI regarding the Silver Bow County convictions. Under both the federal and state constitutions, a defendant is protected from a sentence predicated on misinformation about that defendant's criminal history and must be given an opportunity to explain, argue, and rebut any information, including presentencing information, that may lead to a deprivation of life, liberty, or property. Bauer could not be said to have been given that opportunity because the 1983 convictions were still valid at the time of sentencing in Blaine County, nor did the sentencing court have a full opportunity to consider the procedural and substantive consequences of the actual vacation of the 1983 convictions or the specific grounds upon which postconviction relief was granted by the Silver Bow County court. What was correct information at the time of sentencing became misinformation after the fact. Notwithstanding that the sentencing court specifically stated that it did not rely on the 1983 convictions, the Supreme Court reversed on grounds of fundamental fairness, refusing to allow the misinformation to go unchallenged before the District Court by denying Bauer the opportunity to be resentenced on the basis of materially accurate information. The case was remanded for resentencing before a new District Court Judge. Bauer v. St., 1999 MT 185, 295 M 306, 983 P2d 955, 56 St. Rep. 715 (1999), following St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976), St. v. Redding, 208 M 24, 675 P2d 974, 41 St. Rep. 147 (1984), and Bishop v. St., 254 M 100, 835 P2d 732, 49 St. Rep. 650 (1992).

Applicability of "Catchall" Mitigating Circumstance to Postoffense Conduct: The enormously broad "catchall" mitigating circumstance in 46-18-304(8) reflects the Legislature's intent to permit a defendant to raise any and all facts and evidence that might mitigate against the death penalty, including evidence of conduct during incarceration subsequent to the offense. Evidence may include any evidence required in a presentence investigation under this section relative to a defendant's characteristics, circumstances, needs, and potentialities. In this case, the sentencing court erred by failing to order a presentence investigation and report that included consideration of defendant's admission of guilt, contrition, commitment to rehabilitation, and conduct while incarcerated, which were all relevant as mitigating evidence. St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000, 50 St. Rep. 1388 (1993) (Smith II), following Lockett v. Ohio, 438 US 586, 57 L Ed 2d 973, 98 S Ct 2954 (1978), Skipper v. S.C., 476 US 1, 90 L Ed 2d 1, 106 S Ct 1669 (1986), and Smith v. McCormick, 914 F2d 1153 (9th Cir. 1990). Following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

Claim That Sentencing Based on Inaccuracies Unfounded — No Due Process Violation: Bishop claimed that his due process rights were violated in sentencing him for robbery, burglary, and use of a weapon because his sentencing was based on a presentence report that contained various inaccuracies. Under U.S. v. Wilson, 900 F2d 1350 (9th Cir. 1990), a court may not rely on materially false information when sentencing a defendant. On review, it was found that the alleged inaccuracies were primarily a matter of Bishop's interpretation of the facts rather than a material falsity. In light of the sentencing court's reliance on Bishop's criminal history in reviewing the presentence report, a 25-year sentence for robbery, a 10-year sentence for burglary, and a 5-year sentence for use of a weapon were affirmed. Bishop v. St., 254 M 100, 835 P2d 732, 49 St. Rep. 650 (1992).

Parole Officer's Sentence Recommendation Not Violation of Prosecutor's Plea Agreement: The defendant argued that the parole officer's sentence recommendation in the presentencing report was a violation of his plea agreement with the prosecutor and that he should have been allowed to withdraw his guilty plea. The Supreme Court held that the sentencing recommendation was provided for by statute, was merely one factor that the trial judge could consider, and was not a breach of the prosecutor's agreement. St. v. Milinovich, 248 M 373, 812 P2d 338, 48 St. Rep. 470

(1991), followed in St. v. Yother, 253 M 128, 831 P2d 1347, 49 St. Rep. 387 (1992). Yother was followed in St. v. Sanders, 1999 MT 136, 294 M 539, 982 P2d 1015, 56 St. Rep. 551 (1999).

Reference to Victim Impact Information by Sentencing Judge Not Cruel and Unusual Punishment: Defendant claimed the death sentence was improper because the sentencing judge referred to the victim impact information contained in the presentence investigation report. Defendant cited the holding in Booth v. Maryland, 482 US 496, 96 L Ed 2d 440, 107 S Ct 2529 (1987), that it was a violation of the eighth amendment of the U.S. Constitution (similar to Art. II, sec. 22, Mont. Const.) for a sentencing jury to refer to information in a victim impact statement during the sentencing stage of a capital murder trial. The Montana Supreme Court held that Booth was factually distinguishable from Montana sentencing procedures, noting that a judge rather than a jury performs sentencing under Montana law. Furthermore, the judge may be allowed to hear and rule on the admissibility of evidence that the jury is not allowed to hear, yet he is still responsible for sentencing. Absent evidence that the judge was adversely affected by victim impact information, there was no constitutional violation. St. v. Keith, 231 M 214, 754 P2d 474, 45 St. Rep. 556 (1988), followed in St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352, 45 St. Rep. 1542 (1988), and Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

Court's Discretion to Disallow Second Evaluation: A defendant upset with an extremely negative presentence psychological evaluation requested a continuance so that he could obtain a second evaluation at his own expense. It was within the court's discretion to deny the request. St. v. Bradford, 228 M 438, 743 P2d 103, 44 St. Rep. 1661 (1987).

Hearsay and Probation Officer's Recommendation: Defendant's contention that hearsay tainted the presentence report was without merit. Section 46-18-112 authorizes a complete investigation into the background of the defendant and does not limit hearsay. The District Court's reliance upon the recommendation of the probation officer was not error. Section 46-18-302 authorizes the sentencing judge to consider the widest possible scope of inquiry when determining the sentence to be imposed. The court followed the position established in St. v. Smith, 217 M 461, 705 P2d 1087, 42 St. Rep. 463 (1985), regarding the sentencing judge's discretion to use the presentence report and sentencing recommendations. St. v. D.B.S., 216 M 234, 700 P2d 630, 42 St. Rep. 770 (1985).

Dismissed and Juvenile Charges Properly Included in Presentence Investigation Report: Where the defendant to a hit-and-run charge alleged he was prejudiced by the inclusion in a presentence investigation report of criminal charges made against him that were later dismissed and charges that were made while the defendant was a juvenile, the District Court did not err in considering both such charges. Under the rationale of St. v. Baldwin, 192 M 521, 629 P2d 222, 38 St. Rep. 882 (1981), the dismissed charges were properly included and considered, as were the juvenile charges under the rationale in St. v. Radi, 185 M 38, 604 P2d 318, 36 St. Rep. 2345 (1979). St. v. Henricks, 206 M 469, 672 P2d 20, 40 St. Rep. 1786 (1983).

Consideration of Prior Charge of Aggravated Assault: The sentencing court here relied neither on an erroneous criminal record nor on erroneous information. The trial court was not required to shut its eyes to the facts underlying a prior charge of aggravated assault of which defendant was acquitted. It relied only on information volunteered by the defendant, and if the defendant believed that the presentence report distorted any of the information he had furnished, he was under an affirmative burden to refute, correct, or deny the facts related in the report. St. v. Baldwin, 192 M 521, 629 P2d 222, 38 St. Rep. 882 (1981), followed in St. v. Dunfee, 2005 MT 147, 327 M 335, 114 P3d 217 (2005).

Burden on Defendant to Show Report Inaccurate: When matters contained in a presentence report are contested by the defendant, he has an affirmative duty to present evidence showing the inaccuracies contained in the report. St. v. Radi, 185 M 38, 604 P2d 318 (1979), followed in St. v. Long, 274 M 228, 907 P2d 945, 52 St. Rep. 1204 (1995).

Report Not Prejudicial: The entire report is consistent with the purposes and rationale for requiring a presentence investigation. The report was properly used by the sentencing judge, provided him with a fair, objective review of appellant's history, and provides no basis to remand for a further resentencing hearing. St. v. Radi, 185 M 38, 604 P2d 318 (1979).

Arrest Record Not a Presentence Investigation: A letter, which was an arrest record of the defendant while under the supervision of the probation and parole office, was held not to be in the proper form for a presentence investigation. Murphy v. St., 181 M 157, 592 P2d 935 (1979).

46-18-113. Availability of presentence investigation report.Commission Comments

1991 Comment: The Commission felt that the defendant, as well as the prosecution, should have an absolute right to receive and review a copy of the presentence investigation report. This was made discretionary with the court under 1987 MCA 46-18-113. The Commission believed that it was unfair and, in fact, potentially a denial of constitutional due process to deny the defendant the sources of information contained in the presentence investigation report, including the identity of persons who provided such information.

Source: Model Sentencing Act, section 4.

If a sentence is to meet the purposes of [46-18-113] the judge must be armed with a professionally prepared report containing the necessary information. A pre-sentence investigation is the best way to obtain this information.

More and more jurisdictions are requiring a pre-sentence investigation of felony convictions (e.g., U.S., California, Colorado, Connecticut, New Jersey, Indiana, Michigan and Rhode Island).

The pre-sentence investigation provided for by this provision would not substantially change the law as it now exists in Montana.

The existing law as to the use of pre-sentence investigations was set forth in Kuhl v. District Court, 139 Mont. 536, 366 P.2d 347 (1961), in which the Montana Supreme Court stated it was mandatory under the provisions of sections 94-7813 and 94-7814 [repealed] that the trial court hold a hearing, either summary or regular, or formal, wherein witnesses who have knowledge of pertinent circumstances may be sworn, examined and give their testimony in the presence of the defendant and his counsel which would help in determining sentence.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 189 in (1), near middle of second sentence after "defendant's attorney", inserted "the probation and parole officer".

1995 Amendment: Chapter 125 at end of (1) inserted last sentence allowing prosecutor to disclose contents of presentence report to victim.

Severability: Section 42, Ch. 125, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

1991 Amendment: Deleted former (1) that read: "(1) The judge may, in his discretion, make the investigation report or parts of it available to the defendants or others, while concealing the identity of persons who provided confidential information. If the court discloses the identity of persons who provided information, the judge may, in his discretion, allow the defendant to cross-examine those who rendered information"; in (1), before "record", inserted "court", after "record but" substituted "may not be opened for public inspection" for "shall be sealed and opened only on order of the court", and inserted last sentence concerning who is to be provided with the report; inserted (2) concerning other access to report; deleted (3) that read: "(3) If a defendant is committed to a state institution, the investigation report shall be sent to the institution at the time of commitment"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

No Error in Reliance on Presentence Report Not Offered as Exhibit When Report Part of Record: In sentencing Flanagan, the District Court based its findings on a presentence investigation report that was not admitted as an exhibit, which Flanagan asserted was a procedural error. The Supreme Court disagreed. Because the presentence report was already part of the record, as required by this section, it was not required that the report be offered or admitted into evidence at the sentencing hearing, and the District Court did not err in using the report as a basis for its findings. St. v. Flanagan, 2003 MT 123, 316 M 1, 68 P3d 796 (2003).

Defendant's Affirmation of Correctness of Information in Presentence Investigation Constituting Waiver of Due Process Challenge: McLeod challenged the legality of his dangerous drug sentence on due process grounds because the sentencing court relied on a presentence investigation (PSI) report that indicated that McLeod had five previous felony drug convictions instead of the actual four previous convictions. A convicted defendant has a due process guarantee against a sentence predicated on misinformation. Here, McLeod was given proper notice of the information in the PSI, availed himself of the opportunity to extensively review the information, was represented by counsel at the time that the PSI was made known to him and reviewed the information with counsel, and was given repeated opportunities to rebut the information but chose instead to affirm the accuracy of the PSI. Thus, pursuant to St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976), McLeod was afforded the process due to a criminal defendant at sentencing. McLeod's affirmation of the correctness of the PSI constituted a waiver of a due process challenge, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. McLeod, 2002 MT 348, 313 M 358, 61 P3d 126 (2002).

No Reliance on Misinformation in Sentencing — Due Process Rights Not Violated: Despite the District Court's statement to the contrary, Winkle contended that the court relied on misinformation in sentencing, violating Winkle's due process rights. Due process requires that an offender be given an opportunity to explain, argue, and rebut any information, including presentencing information, that may lead to a deprivation of life, liberty, or property. Winkle argued that, given the timing of the information, he did not have an opportunity to rebut, so the court should have granted a continuance in the sentencing hearing. The decision to grant a continuance is in the discretion of the sentencing court, and the timeliness of a continuance motion is a legitimate factor for the court to consider in determining whether to grant the motion. When a criminal defendant contests matters in a presentence report, the defendant has an affirmative duty to present evidence establishing inaccuracies, and if the defendant feels that inadequate time has been allowed to accurately rebut the information, a motion for continuance is in order. Here, the motion for continuance was untimely because it was made after counsel twice indicated sentencing should proceed and after the oral imposition of sentence. Winkle's contention that the sentencing court erroneously relied on certain information in imposing sentence was also flawed. The court did not explicitly state the materials that it was deleting from the presentence report, and absent specific objection, a sentencing court is not required to do so. There was information that Winkle was unable to successfully complete the presentence investigation questionnaire, and this is the information that the court relied on. Failing to establish either any misinformation or that he had no opportunity to rebut information, Winkle's due process rights were not violated, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. Winkle, 2002 MT 312, 313 M 111, 60 P3d 465 (2002), followed in St. v. Roedel, 2007 MT 291, 339 M 489, 171 P3d 694 (2007).

Information Additional to That in Presentence Report Presented at Sentencing Hearing — No Due Process Violation: The presentence investigation report submitted to the District Court showed that defendant had had his parole on another conviction revoked for carrying a concealed weapon. At the sentencing hearing the court, over defendant's objection, received into evidence a written report and additional testimony by defendant's former parole officer about the reasons that parole was revoked. Defendant's due process rights were not violated by this procedure. He was represented by a lawyer at the sentencing hearing, had the opportunity to cross-examine the witness regarding the new material, had the opportunity to rebut the new material, and could have called for a continuance in order to call his own rebuttal witnesses. St. v. Elliott, 221 M 174, 717 P2d 572, 43 St. Rep. 723 (1986).

Out-of-Court Conference Between Sentencing Judge and Probation Officer — Denial of Due Process: The defendant was denied due process when the sentencing judge conferred with the presentence investigation officer behind closed doors where no opportunity was provided for argument, rebuttal, or explanation. St. v. Redding, 208 M 24, 675 P2d 974, 41 St. Rep. 147 (1984), distinguished in St. v. Pease, 233 M 65, 758 P2d 764, 45 St. Rep. 1296 (1988).

Confrontation of Witnesses — Discretionary at Presentence Hearing: Defendant was convicted of aggravated assault for pointing a gun at another person during a barroom altercation. A presentence investigation was completed and provided to the defense. The presentence investigation contained a number of statements by witnesses whose names were ordered withheld by the court. Defendant objected to the consideration of those statements because he was not allowed to confront the makers thereof. The Supreme Court held that the right of cross-examination at a presentence hearing is a discretionary matter with the trial court and that defendant's due process right was protected because he was represented by counsel at the time the information was made known to him and he was given the opportunity to rebut the information. St. v. Trangsrud, 200 M 303, 651 P2d 37, 39 St. Rep. 1765 (1982), followed in St. v. Gilpin, 232 M 56, 756 P2d 445, 45 St. Rep. 863 (1988).

Misinformation in Sentencing Report Alleged — Due Process of Law: Where the defendant was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent and requested a psychiatric examination and evaluation report prior to sentencing, the court did not err in utilizing a report based in part on unsubstantiated charges of other alleged rape victims with whom the defendant was involved. The use of these allegations, provided to the psychiatrist by the County Attorney, did not violate the defendant's right against imposition of sentence predicated on misinformation because the court was fully informed of the defendant's contention and the defendant had adequate notice and time to prepare for the sentencing hearing. Cross-examination of all those contributing to a presentence report rests in the discretion of the trial court. St. v. Mackie, 191 M 138, 622 P2d 673, 38 St. Rep. 86 (1981).

Not Seen Before Sentencing — Postconviction Petition to Show Report Errors: Where petitioner in a habeas corpus action alleges that he did not have an opportunity to examine his presentence report prior to sentencing or to cross-examine witnesses in respect to the report, his claim of prejudice in sentencing will not prevail unless he can show something erroneous or some ambiguity in the presentence report. Following St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976), the Supreme Court held that a convicted defendant has a due process guarantee against a sentence predicated on misinformation, but he cannot complain if the information in a presentence report is true. Spurlock v. Crist, 188 M 449, 614 P2d 498 (1980).

Proper Sentence — Fairness of Hearing: When the rules of evidence had been suspended, copies of reports were available to the defendant and he was allowed to examine the author of the presentence report, and many, many witnesses appeared, the court found it could not conceive of any way the hearing could have been conducted more fairly. St. v. Lopez, 185 M 187, 605 P2d 178 (1980).

Burden on Defendant to Show Report Inaccurate: When matters contained in a presentence report are contested by the defendant, he has an affirmative duty to present evidence showing the inaccuracies contained in the report. St. v. Radi, 185 M 38, 604 P2d 318 (1979).

Inclusion of Juvenile Record in Presentence Report: Section 41-3-205 does not support appellant's contention that it was improper to include his juvenile record in a presentence report since that section applies only to dependence and neglect situations and not to proceedings for delinquents under the Montana Youth Court Act. Section 41-5-604 (renumbered 41-5-216) does not support appellant's contention either, because the prevention of public dissemination of a juvenile record once that individual attains an age of majority is accomplished by sealing the presentence report. St. v. Radi, 185 M 38, 604 P2d 318 (1979).

Application of Statutes: If and when the trial judge requests a written report of investigation, he must be governed by the statutes relating to such reports. Kuhl v. District Court, 139 M 536, 366 P2d 347 (1961).

Right to Refute Report: The sentence of a defendant, who pleaded guilty to grand larceny, to 4 years in the state prison was reduced to 1 year by the Supreme Court when the trial court passed sentence upon receipt of private reports without allowing the defendant or his counsel to learn of the representations in the reports and holding a hearing for the presentation of evidence to refute such representations. Kuhl v. District Court, 139 M 536, 366 P2d 347 (1961).

46-18-115. Sentencing hearing—use of two-way electronic audio-video communication.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute goes beyond the provisions of 1987 MCA 46-18-102 and mainly embodies due process constitutional law that has been developed in the federal courts and by the Montana Supreme Court. In accordance with the Montana Supreme Court's decisions, subsection (5) has been included to require that the sentencing court specifically state its reasons for the sentence, both in open court and in the written judgment. This will not only provide the defendant, the prosecution, and the public with the reasons for the sentence but will also provide a record for review by the Montana Supreme Court, the Sentence Review Commission, and the Parole Board [now Board of Pardons and Parole] at the time parole is considered.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 222 in (3) in third sentence near beginning after "section" deleted "in cases in which the defendant is charged with a misdemeanor offense" and in fourth sentence at end inserted "and has informed the defendant that the defendant has the right to object to its use"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2005.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 524 in (1) before "mandatory" substituted "imposition of a sentence enhancement penalty and the applicability of" for "applicability of sentencing enhancement provisions". Amendment effective May 1, 2001.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 163 in (3) inserted third through fifth sentences regarding the acceptability of a court addressing a defendant personally through audio-video communications. Amendment effective March 26, 1997.

Applicability: Section 6, Ch. 163, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] [46-12-211, 46-16-105, 46-17-203, 46-18-102, and 46-18-115] applies to guilty pleas entered and sentences pronounced after [the effective date of this act]." Effective March 26, 1997.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 125 inserted (4) requiring court to permit victim's statement at sentencing hearing and establishing procedures relating to the statement.

Severability: Section 42, Ch. 125, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

Case Notes

Opportunity at Sentencing for Defendant to Make Statement — No Violation of Right to Allocation: The defendant was convicted of providing methamphetamine to a minor. At his sentencing hearing, the District Court asked counsel if the defendant would like to make a statement, to which counsel responded, "I believe he would". The District Court said the timing of the statement would be up to counsel; however, the hearing concluded without the defendant making a statement. On appeal, the defendant argued that the District Court had violated the sentencing statutes and his right to due process by not providing him an opportunity for allocation. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that the defendant had an opportunity to provide a statement at the hearing but did not provide one. St. v. McCoy, 2021 MT 303, 406 Mont. 375, 498 P.3d 1266.

Reliance on Document Not Admitted — Court Required to Balance Privacy Interests Against Disclosure: After the defendant's conviction for negligent endangerment, a hearing was held on the amount of restitution to be awarded to the Department of Justice's crime victims compensation program, which had provided counseling services to the defendant's victim. The Municipal Court denied the defendant's request to examine the form based on the victim's right of privacy in the information that the form contained and subsequently awarded restitution to the program. Because the defendant had a right to receive and rebut the treatment plan form because it was relied on by witnesses to establish how much of the counseling costs were related to the defendant's offense and because the victim may have had a protectable expectation of privacy regarding some of the contents, the Municipal Court erred by not determining the contents of the document and balancing the competing interests of privacy and disclosure. St. v. McClelland, 2015 MT 281, 381 Mont. 164, 357 P.3d 906.

Request for Recusal of Judge Not Timely: The defendant was charged with failure to register as a sex offender and theft. The judge in the matter had previously represented the defendant's daughter in a proceeding in which the defendant was accused of incest with the daughter and the judge was presiding over the defendant's divorce proceeding. The judge did not allow the defendant to make a statement on his own behalf and sentenced the defendant to prison. On appeal, the defendant argued that the judge should have recused himself. Analyzing the Rules of Judicial Conduct, the Supreme Court found that the defendant did not raise the claim for disqualification of the judge within a reasonable time. St. v. Dunsmore, 2015 MT 108, 378 Mont. 514, 347 P.3d 1220.

Sentencing Not Included in Right to Speedy Trial — Sentencing Delay Possible Violation of Due Process if Purposeful or Oppressive: Fourteen months elapsed between the defendant's pleading guilty and being sentenced. Prior to sentencing, the defendant filed a motion to dismiss, claiming that the delay in sentencing violated his right to due process, which the District Court denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The court concluded that the constitutional right to a speedy trial does not extend from conviction to sentencing and that a sentencing delay that is either sufficiently purposeful or oppressive may constitute a due process violation but that neither factor was substantial or demonstrable in this case. St. v. Betterman, 2015 MT 39, 378 Mont. 182, 342 P.3d 971. See also St. v. Maloney, 2015 MT 227, 380 Mont. 244, 354 P.3d 611.

Correction of Criminal Sentence in Civil Proceeding Impermissible — Defendant Entitled to Sentencing Hearing: Following the defendant's petition for a writ of habeas corpus, the Supreme Court remanded the case to the District Court for correction of the sentence. The case was filed under a new civil cause of action, even though a separate criminal proceeding was pending, and the sentence was subsequently corrected without the presence of the defendant or his counsel in the civil proceeding. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded, holding that the defendant was entitled to be heard during a criminal sentencing hearing. St. v. McEvoy, 2014 MT 126, 375 Mont. 112, 324 P.3d 1217.

Reference to Victim's Age During Sentencing — No Error: Because a court may consider any matter relevant to the disposition of an offender and because the record did not indicate the Municipal Court considered the age of the victim prior to the verdict, the Municipal Court did not err by considering the victim's age during sentencing. Billings v. Nelson, 2014 MT 98, 374 Mont. 444, 322 P.3d 1039.

Plea-Bargained Sentence Actually Recommended — Plea Agreement Not Undermined by Prosecutor's Other Conduct: Upon reviewing the prosecutor's conduct in response to the defendant's claim that the prosecutor undermined the plea agreement, the Supreme Court held: (1) introducing the testimony of the defendant's victim was allowable because she had a right to testify under 46-18-115(4)(a); (2) the recommendation by the probation officer for a $5,000 fine was allowable because he had prepared the presentence investigation; (3) the prosecutor's summation did not undercut the plea agreement just because the prosecutor argued against the defendant's suggestion for a 5-year sentence. The defendant had agreed to a sentence of 30 years, 20 suspended, as part of the plea agreement, and the prosecutor recommended a sentence of exactly that length. St. v. McDowell, 2011 MT 75, 360 Mont. 83, 253 P.3d 812.

No Error in Denial of Motion to Continue Sentencing Hearing for Further Review and Challenge of Accuracy of Presentence Investigation Report: Morrison was convicted of felony partner or family member assault, a sixth offense, misdemeanor criminal mischief, and misdemeanor disorderly conduct. A charge of felony aggravated burglary was dismissed. Two days before sentencing, Morrison received the presentence investigation report. The following day, concerned that the report recited facts relevant to the dismissed felony aggravated burglary charge, Morrison moved for a continuance of the sentencing hearing in order to investigate and contest those provisions of the report. At sentencing, the District Court entertained Morrison's arguments concerning the accuracy of the "circumstances of the offense" section of the report and decided to strike that section, stating that the court would not rely on that information for sentencing. The motion for continuance was denied. The court also offered to allow Morrison to question the author of the report regarding the accuracy of the section of the report detailing Morrison's criminal history, but Morrison declined the offer and elected to proceed with sentencing. Following sentencing, Morrison appealed on grounds that the District Court erred by denying the motion for continuance. The Supreme Court disagreed. By striking the questioned section of the report, the sentencing court removed any reference to disputed information in the report, and by declining the chance to question the accuracy of the report, Morrison waived any objection to proceeding to sentencing. The District Court did not abuse its discretion by denying the continuance motion, and Morrison's sentence was affirmed. St. v. Morrison, 2009 MT 397, 353 M 407, 220 P3d 659 (2009).

Sentencing Court's Consideration of Defendant's Background Information, Including Self-Reported Incidents of Sexual Contact With Children — No Error: While in sexual offender treatment, Hill admitted sexual contact with 12 or 13 other children. The District Court subsequently considered the self-reported acts in a psychosexual evaluation, which Hill maintained was a violation of the right against self-incrimination. The Supreme Court disagreed. In a classic penalty situation where an accused cannot elect to exercise the right to remain silent because of the possibility of substantial penalties if the person chooses not to speak, the state is prevented from using the compelled statements in later criminal proceedings. However, Hill was not in a classic penalty situation, but rather in a classic plea bargain situation. By consent decree, the state offered Hill treatment in exchange for an admission of misdemeanor assault and an agreement to undergo treatment. Hill was not faced with penalties by refusing to reveal prior sexual contacts, and the consent decree was never revoked even though Hill violated it. Absent a classic penalty situation, Hill's right against self-incrimination was not violated by the District Court's consideration of Hill's character, history, mental and physical condition, and background, including the self-reported acts in the psychosexual evaluation. St. v. Hill, 2009 MT 134, 350 M 296, 207 P3d 307 (2009). See also St. v. Fuller, 276 M 155, 915 P2d 809 (1996), and In re R.L.H., 2005 MT 177, 327 M 520, 116 P3d 791 (2005).

Determination of Restitution When Amount of Actual Loss Unknown: McMaster admitted taking money from Wright, but the actual amount could not be determined. The District Court received several restitution recommendations ranging from $12,914 proposed in the presentence investigation report to $334,425 based on a cash flow analysis. After considering testimony from numerous experts and from McMaster and Wright, the Court set restitution at $30,000, and McMaster appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. As established in St. v. Benoit, 2002 MT 166, 310 M 449, 51 P3d 495 (2002), a victim may recover losses even though the actual losses are uncertain if the losses are calculated by use of reasonable methods based on the best available evidence. Nothing requires a court or victim to substantiate a restitution calculation with documentation, nor is a court circumscribed from relying on victim testimony presented at a sentencing hearing. The court properly considered McMaster's written statement and Wright's nonexpert undocumented testimony presented at the sentencing hearing. Substantial evidence supported the court's findings and the court did not abuse its discretion when it set restitution at $30,000. St. v. McMaster, 2008 MT 268, 345 M 172, 190 P3d 302 (2008).

Affirmative Duty of Defendant to Bring Evidence Outside Presentence Investigation Report to Sentencing Court's Attention: A defendant has an affirmative duty to bring evidence outside the presentence report to the attention of the sentencing court. If the evidence is not offered, there is no error based on its absence from the record, and the Supreme Court will not fault a sentencing court for failing to consider a report that was not before it. St. v. Herman, 2008 MT 187, 343 M 494, 188 P3d 978 (2008). See also St. v. Long, 274 M 228, 907 P2d 945 (1995).

Ten-Year Sentence for Criminal Distribution of Dangerous Drugs Affirmed Despite Finding of Impaired Mental Capacity: Novak was sentenced to 10 years with 6 years suspended for selling

0.06 grams of methamphetamine to an undercover informant, despite a finding that Novak was eligible for an exception to the mandatory minimum sentence because of impaired mental capacity. Novak appealed the sentence, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The fact that Novak was eligible for a sentence exception did not mean that he was entitled to it. The sentencing court's oral pronouncement of sentence complied with statutory requirements by providing adequate reasons for imposing the sentence, and the sentence fell within the parameters of 45-9-101(4) and was not illegal. St. v. Novak, 2008 MT 157, 343 M 292, 183 P3d 887 (2008).

No Error in Treating Retribution as Component of Punishment: Rickman asserted that the sentencing court improperly considered retribution as a factor in sentencing Rickman to life with no parole eligibility for 55 years for deliberate homicide under the felony-murder rule. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that retribution has repeatedly been held to be a component of punishment. It was appropriate for the sentencing court to consider that the victim was innocent and to consider the impact of the homicide on the victim's family. The judgment and commitment of the sentencing judge indicated that retribution was only the third basis for the sentence, and in light of Rickman's minimal potential for rehabilitation and Rickman's significant threat to the public, the sentencing court's use of the word "retribution" comported with state sentencing policies and procedures. Rickman's sentence was affirmed. St. v. Rickman, 2008 MT 142, 343 M 120, 183 P3d 49 (2008). See also St. v. Kirkbride, 2008 MT 178, 343 M 409, 185 P3d 340 (2008).

Sentence for Sexual Assault Within Statutory Parameters and Adequately Explained: Rogers asserted that his sentence of 20 years with 10 years suspended for two counts of felony assault upon a minor was improperly based on his refusal to participate in a court-ordered psychosexual evaluation. However, nothing in the record indicated that the sentencing court even referenced Rogers' refusal to participate. The court's reasons for its sentence were many and were supported by the evidence. The sentence was within statutory parameters and thus was affirmed. St. v. Rogers, 2007 MT 227, 339 M 132, 168 P3d 669 (2007).

Rules of Evidence Inapplicable in Sentencing Hearings: The Montana Rules of Evidence do not apply to sentencing hearings. A sentencing court may consider any relevant information relating to the nature and circumstances of the crime, the defendant's character, background, history, and mental and physical condition, and any other information that the court considers to have probative force. St. v. Walker, 2007 MT 205, 338 M 529, 167 P3d 879 (2007), following St. v. Mason, 2003 MT 371, 319 M 117, 82 P3d 903 (2003), St. v. Ferguson, 2005 MT 343, 330 M 103, 126 P3d 463 (2005), and St. v. Harper, 2006 MT 259, 334 M 138, 144 P3d 826 (2006).

Adoption of Sentence Recommended in Presentence Investigation Report, With Variations — No Error in Disparity Between Oral and Written Sentence: As set out in St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), the oral pronouncement of sentence is the legally effective sentence, and the written judgment and commitment serves as evidence of the sentence orally pronounced. Wiedrich contended that because his written sentence contained terms and conditions that were not orally pronounced, the extra conditions were invalid and should be removed from the sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed. The transcript revealed that the sentencing court clearly adopted the sentence recommended in the presentence investigation report, with some variations—a fact that Wiedrich and his counsel were fully aware of—and the Supreme Court therefore declined to remand for resentencing. St. v. Wiedrich, 2005 MT 127, 327 M 214, 112 P3d 1054 (2005).

Community Risk by Sex Offender — Sentencing Court Consideration of Information in Presentence Report Unrelated to Crime Charged Not Erroneous: Legg pleaded not guilty to felony sexual assault of a 9-year-old girl. The initial mental examination revealed that Legg was severely depressed but competent to understand the charges and appreciate the consequences of possible incarceration. Legg's counsel then requested a psychosexual evaluation of Legg. The analyst categorized Legg as a low-level offender and suggested that community placement and outpatient sexual offender treatment would be appropriate. Legg then entered a plea bargain wherein the state agreed to recommend sentencing in accordance with the evaluations. Legg pleaded guilty, and the District Court ordered a presentence investigation (PSI). The investigator discovered information that Legg had not revealed previously, including the fact that Legg was permanently prohibited from contact with his ex-wife and children and that there were other secondary victims of Legg's sexual abuse. The analyst who performed Legg's psychosexual evaluation then reclassified Legg as a moderate risk offender and recommended confinement rather than community placement because the risk was too great to treat Legg as an outpatient. Legg filed a motion in limine to exclude any evidence from the PSI from persons other than the victim, her family, or her therapists. The motion was not ruled upon, so the challenged evidence was not excluded. The state recommended a 30-year sentence with 25 years suspended, and Legg consented to the recommendation. However, after hearing from the victim's family, doctor, and counselor and from the analyst, the court sentenced Legg to 50 years with none suspended. Legg appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Consideration of all materials in the PSI was required under 46-18-111, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in doing so. Further, the statements by the sentencing court that the 50-year sentence was both to punish Legg and to protect society from Legg in the future were a sufficient explanation of the reasons for the sentence, as required under this section. St. v. Legg, 2004 MT 26, 319 M 362, 84 P3d 648 (2004).

Failure to Establish Conflict Between Oral and Written Sentences — Waiver of Right to Request Modification of Written Judgment: After receiving a written judgment, Legg moved to amend or correct the judgment to include a designation of offender status and consideration of mitigating factors. Legg made the motion pursuant to 46-18-116, which allows modification of a written sentence to conform with the legally effective oral sentence within 120 days of the written sentence, but Legg failed to establish or discuss the existence of any conflict between the oral and written sentences or to move that the written sentence be amended. By the time that the issue arose on appeal, the 120-day time limit had passed, so Legg waived the right to request modification of the written judgment, and the Supreme Court declined to remand for resentencing on the issue. St. v. Legg, 2004 MT 26, 319 M 362, 84 P3d 648 (2004).

No Reliance on Misinformation in Sentencing — Due Process Rights Not Violated: Despite the District Court's statement to the contrary, Winkle contended that the court relied on misinformation in sentencing, violating Winkle's due process rights. Due process requires that an offender be given an opportunity to explain, argue, and rebut any information, including presentencing information, that may lead to a deprivation of life, liberty, or property. Winkle argued that, given the timing of the information, he did not have an opportunity to rebut, so the court should have granted a continuance in the sentencing hearing. The decision to grant a continuance is in the discretion of the sentencing court, and the timeliness of a continuance motion is a legitimate factor for the court to consider in determining whether to grant the motion. When a criminal defendant contests matters in a presentence report, the defendant has an affirmative duty to present evidence establishing inaccuracies, and if the defendant feels that inadequate time has been allowed to accurately rebut the information, a motion for continuance is in order. Here, the motion for continuance was untimely because it was made after counsel twice indicated sentencing should proceed and after the oral imposition of sentence. Winkle's contention that the sentencing court erroneously relied on certain information in imposing sentence was also flawed. The court did not explicitly state the materials that it was deleting from the presentence report, and absent specific objection, a sentencing court is not required to do so. There was information that Winkle was unable to successfully complete the presentence investigation questionnaire, and this is the information that the court relied on. Failing to establish either any misinformation or that he had no opportunity to rebut information, Winkle's due process rights were not violated, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. Winkle, 2002 MT 312, 313 M 111, 60 P3d 465 (2002), followed in St. v. Roedel, 2007 MT 291, 339 M 489, 171 P3d 694 (2007). See also St. v. Simmons, 2011 MT 264, 362 Mont. 306, 264 P.3d 706, holding a criminal defendant's due process rights were not violated during the sentencing hearing when the District Court referred to the defendant's negative behavior while incarcerated and cut short the defendant's cross-examination of a witness.

No Error in Refusal to Allow Withdrawal of Guilty Plea — Parents of Sexual Assault Victim Not Parties to Plea Agreement: Following a guilty plea and conviction of sexual assault, Knox moved to withdraw the guilty plea, arguing that the County Attorney violated the terms of a plea agreement, which had recommended a 30-year suspended sentence and dropping a second sexual assault charge in exchange for the guilty plea, and indicated that the parents of the 5-year-old victim would not recommend incarceration in the victim impact statement of the presentence investigation. During the colloquy required by 46-12-210, the District Court informed Knox that, like the court itself, the parents were not bound by the plea agreement and could change their minds at any time as far as recommending future imprisonment, adding that if the parents did change their minds, that fact would not suffice as grounds for withdrawal of a guilty plea. Nevertheless, Knox voluntarily accepted the possible consequences of the plea and pleaded guilty. The parents then recommended imprisonment, and Knox was sentenced to 40 years with 18 suspended. A District Court may permit the withdrawal of a guilty plea upon a showing of good cause, but the determination of good cause is discretionary, and each case is considered on its merits. Here, the District Court subsequently denied the withdrawal motion pursuant to the colloquy, and Knox appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. After applying the factors in St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997), the Supreme Court found that there was no abuse of discretion in the denial of the motion to withdraw and that Knox's guilty plea thus met the constitutional standard of a voluntary, intelligent, and knowing choice among options. The District Court acted according to statutory requirements when it made clear that the parents could make known their opinion and change their minds regarding Knox's incarceration because they were not parties to the plea agreement, pursuant to the court's duties in this section. Further, other evidence in a psychological evaluation indicated that Knox had violent tendencies that presented complications to successful treatment, had high-risk factors for violent recidivism, and had resisted treatment for chemical dependency in the past, so the parents' incarceration request was not a determinative basis for the sentence. St. v. Knox, 2001 MT 232, 307 M 1, 36 P3d 383 (2001).

Conditions Imposed in Written Judgment and Sentence Different From Those Imposed in Oral Sentence — Lane, Waters, and Simpson Reviewed — Test to Determine Which New Conditions Lawful or Unlawful — Payment of Restitution and Costs: Johnson was sentenced orally for writing bad checks and later contended that four of the conditions imposed in the written judgment and sentence by the District Court were unlawful under St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), because they were not announced orally when she was sentenced in open court. The Supreme Court reviewed its decisions in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142 (1999), and St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361 (1999), and reasoned that a written sentence would be held unlawful only if it substantively increased the defendant's loss of liberty or the defendant's sacrifice of property. Under this test, the Supreme Court held that two of the four penalties not mentioned by the District Court in its oral pronouncement of Johnson's sentence were unlawful, those being the restitution ordered to the Missoula County jail of money expended for Johnson's medical care and the requirement that Johnson pay for the costs of her prosecution in District Court. The Supreme Court held that the other two parts of the written sentence, the requirement that Johnson make restitution from money earned in prison and the imposition of certain "civil" restrictions as conditions of Johnson's suspended sentence, such as the requirement that Johnson stay out of gambling casinos, were lawfully imposed because they did not increase the amount of money that Johnson was ordered to pay or increase Johnson's deprivation of liberty in addition to those penalties imposed orally. The requirement for payment from prison earnings only specified where the money was to come from, and the "civil" restrictions were largely mentioned by the District Court at Johnson's sentencing hearing. St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000), followed in St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

Due Process Violation in Failing to Afford Defendant Opportunity at Sentencing to Rebut Information Not in Presentence Investigation Report: In sentencing Hocevar for criminal endangerment of one child, the District Court denied Hocevar's due process rights by finding by a preponderance of the evidence that Hocevar smothered two other children without affording Hocevar the opportunity procedurally to challenge the accuracy of the information, which was not contained in the presentence investigation report. As determined in St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976), a sentencing judge may rely on facts outside the presentence report if, in order to avoid misinformation in sentencing, the defendant is given an opportunity to explain or rebut the information at the presentence hearing. The Supreme Court remanded for resentencing. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000).

Failure to Object to Conduct of Psychological Evaluation or to Continuation of Sentencing Hearing — Waiver of Right to Consideration on Appeal: Osterloth was convicted of felony sexual assault and was required to undergo a sexual offender evaluation by a therapist of his choice at county expense. His scheduled sentencing was continued to allow the evaluation. On appeal, Osterloth contended that the District Court erred by sentencing him without an evaluation prepared by a qualified therapist, pursuant to 46-18-111, and by continuing sentencing instead of conducting a sentencing hearing without delay, as required in this section. The Supreme Court noted that under 46-20-104, it is precluded from considering an alleged error unless a timely objection was made or the criteria of 46-20-701 are met. Osterloth did not object to the evaluation being conducted by his own evaluator or to the sentencing continuation, nor did he assert that he could satisfy any of the requirements of 46-20-701. Thus, Osterloth waived the right to have the Supreme Court consider these alleged errors on appeal. St. v. Osterloth, 2000 MT 129, 299 M 517, 1 P3d 946, 57 St. Rep. 533 (2000).

Remand for Modification of Written Judgment to Conform to Oral Sentence: Osterloth contended that the District Court failed to comply with the provisions of this section, which require that in felony cases, the court state all reasons for the sentence in open court and in the written judgment, and that, as a result, he was entitled to be resentenced. Osterloth was partially correct, in that the written judgment must conform to the oral sentence; however, resentencing was not required. Rather, the Supreme Court affirmed the sentence and remanded for entry of a modified written judgment setting forth the reasons for the sentence as stated in the oral sentence. St. v. Osterloth, 2000 MT 129, 299 M 517, 1 P3d 946, 57 St. Rep. 533 (2000). See also St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142 (1999), and St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361 (1999).

Authority to Amend Written Judgment to List Reasons for Parole Restriction: Defendant contended that the District Court erred in failing to state its reasons for restricting parole eligibility in the court's original written judgment and that further error occurred when the court amended the written judgment, following remand from the Sentence Review Division, to list the reasons parole was restricted. Under 46-18-117 (now repealed), the District Court may correct an erroneous sentence at any time to correct clerical errors and to make the record reflect what was actually decided, as long as the correction does not set aside the judgment or change what was originally intended. Here, the amended judgment was consistent with the oral pronouncement of judgment and merely set forth the reasons for imposing the parole restriction. Further, 46-18-117 (now repealed) allows correction of a sentence following remand from an appellate court. The Sentence Review Division functions as part of the appellate process. Thus, when the Division remanded the matter to the District Court for clarification, the court had the express statutory authority to issue an order amending the written judgment to list its reasons for imposing the parole eligibility restriction. (See 2001 amendment to 46-18-116.) St. v. Christianson, 1999 MT 156, 295 M 100, 983 P2d 909, 56 St. Rep. 613 (1999).

Heinous Nature of Crime Alone Justifying Parole Restriction: Defendant raised several contentions in arguing that the District Court improperly imposed a parole eligibility restriction as part of a sentence for the mitigated deliberate homicide of his 3-year-old daughter. The District Court commented at sentencing that it felt "somewhat as the representative of [the] now deceased child". Defendant alleged that the statement showed undue partisanship and indicated failure of the court to act as an objective judicial officer. However, when viewed in the context of the entire proceeding, the comment underscored the court's conclusion that the heinous, brutal nature of the crime was sufficient reason alone to withdraw the privilege of parole eligibility. Citing St. v. Heit, 242 M 488, 791 P2d 1379 (1990), the Supreme Court also noted that it had in the past upheld parole restrictions based upon the heinous nature of the offense. Imposition of the restriction was not an abuse of the court's broad sentencing discretion. St. v. Christianson, 1999 MT 156, 295 M 100, 983 P2d 909, 56 St. Rep. 613 (1999).

46-18-116. Judgment — conflict between written judgment and oral pronouncement — correction of factually erroneous sentence or judgment.

Compiler's Comments

2003 Amendment: Chapter 141 in (1) at beginning of third sentence substituted "written judgment" for "judgment" and at end inserted "within 30 days after the oral pronouncement of the disposition of the case"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 74 in (1) inserted fourth and fifth sentences requiring service of a copy of the judgment on the defendant, including a statement of the rights set forth in subsection (2); inserted (2) concerning a request for modification of a written judgment and waiver of the request; inserted (3) allowing correction of a factually erroneous or illegal sentence; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 20, 2001.

New subsection (3), concerning correction of a factually erroneous sentence or judgment and how an illegal sentence is addressed, relates to the subject matter of former 46-18-117, which was repealed by Ch. 74, L. 2001.

Applicability: Section 4, Ch. 74, L. 2001, provided: "[This act] applies to all cases currently pending on direct review or that are not yet final".

Case Notes

DECISIONS GOVERNED BY LAW IN EFFECT AFTER 2001 AMENDMENT OF 46-18-116 AND REPEAL OF 46-18-117

Condition of Written Sentence Inconsistent With Oral Pronouncement — Written Judgment Increasing Sentence Invalid: The Supreme Court reversed a written sentence requiring the defendant to attend self-help meetings when the oral sentence had allowed the probation officer the discretion to determine whether or not the defendant was to attend self-help meetings, the District Court had explicitly stated that it was making the modification at the oral pronouncement, and the District Court had noted its intention to alter the language. St. v. Pulst, 2015 MT 184, 379 Mont. 494, 351 P.3d 687.

Court Ordering Interpreter Fees — Statutory Authority Exceeded — Oral Pronouncement Different From Written Order: The defendant, who spoke English as a second language, pleaded no contest to possession of dangerous drugs with intent to distribute, reserving his right to appeal. At the sentencing hearing, the District Court ordered the defendant to pay the costs of his interpreter. However, the District Court's written sentencing order also required a 10% administrative fee. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, finding that the Office of the State Public Defender is responsible for interpreter expenses and that the oral pronouncement of sentence controls when in conflict with a written order. St. v. Duong, 2015 MT 70, 378 Mont. 345, 343 P.3d 1218.

Written Sentence Different From Oral Sentence — Inadequate Opportunity to Respond: At oral sentencing, the judge did not impose a restriction on contact between law enforcement and two firefighters convicted of trespassing and theft who engaged in fire suppression by contract, but the written sentence included a condition that the firefighters had to report contact with law enforcement within 2 days. Because the firefighters did not have the opportunity to respond to the inclusion upon sufficient notice and because the condition constituted substantial interference with their livelihood, liberty, and property, the case was remanded to conform the written judgment with the oral pronouncement. St. v. Robertson, 2014 MT 279, 376 Mont. 471, 336 P.3d 367.

Appeal Raising Unconstitutional Self-Incrimination — Motion to Amend Judgment Subject to Normal Time Limits: Parrish was required to complete Phase II of the sex offender treatment program at Montana State Prison but argued that fulfilling the program requirement for disclosing his past criminal history was a violation of his constitutional right against self-incrimination. He petitioned the District Court for modification of his sentence, but the petition was denied as untimely. The Supreme Court held that the same time limitations for review of a judgment by a District Court applied to Parrish's petition to the District Court notwithstanding that Parrish had raised a constitutional issue concerning his sentence, those time limitations being the ones set forth in 46-18-116, 46-21-102, and Rule 4(5)(b)(i), M.R. App. P. Parrish filed his motion to amend judgment more than a year after the time for appeal to the Supreme Court had expired. St. v. Parrish, 2010 MT 196, 357 Mont. 375, 239 P.3d 957.

Appeal Filed Within Sixty Days of Entry of Judgment Timely: Clark was convicted on March 23, and the written judgment was entered with the Clerk of Court on March 27. Clark filed an appeal on May 23 and an amended notice of appeal on May 25. The state contended that the appeal was untimely because it was not entered within 60 days of the conviction. The Supreme Court disagreed. In criminal cases, an appeal must be entered within 60 days of entry of judgment, not conviction. Clark's appeal was filed 57 days after the written judgment was entered, and the amended notice was filed 59 days after entry of judgment. Thus, the appeal was timely. St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 112, 342 M 461, 182 P3d 62 (2008).

Written Sentence Conforming to Oral Sentence — Sentence Modification Denied: At Garland's sentencing hearing on a mitigated deliberate homicide charge, the District Court sentenced Garland to 30 years plus 10 years for use of a weapon, with the sentences to run consecutively. The County Attorney then suggested the possibility of a 40-year sentence with 10 years suspended to address the ease of supervised probation. The court agreed to a 40-year sentence with 10 years suspended as long as it did not result in an earlier parole. However, after further consulting with the attorneys, the court issued the written judgment the following day stating the original sentence of 30 years plus 10 years for use of a weapon. Almost 12 years later, Garland submitted a motion to modify the written sentence to conform to the orally pronounced 40-year sentence with 10 years suspended. The motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. It was clearly stated at the hearing that imposition of the 40-year sentence with 10 years suspended was contingent on the condition that it would not make Garland eligible for earlier parole. The subsequent discussion with attorneys revealed that the 40-year sentence with 10 years suspended would in fact result in earlier parole, so the written judgment reflected the original sentence. The contingent condition raised at the hearing did not occur, so there was no discrepancy between the oral and written sentence, and Garland's motion to modify the sentence was properly denied. St. v. Garland, 2007 MT 280, 339 M 433, 171 P3d 675 (2007).

Improper Nunc Pro Tunc Judgments Reducing Credit for Time Served Vacated: By nunc pro tunc judgment, the District Court reduced the number of days of credit that Megard received for prior incarceration after two suspended commitments to the Department of Corrections were revoked, and Megard appealed. The Supreme Court reviewed the sentence for legality, noting that once a valid sentence has been pronounced, a District Court has no authority to modify or change it except as provided by statute. Under subsection (3) of this section, a factually erroneous judgment can be corrected at any time, but the original judgments against Megard were not factually incorrect in that Megard was properly credited for time served at that time and the credit did not conflict with the oral pronouncement of Megard's sentence from the bench. Thus, the District Court's amended nunc pro tunc judgments were not within the purview of subsection (3) of this section and, being illegal, were vacated. The case was remanded for reinstatement of the original judgments. St. v. Megard, 2006 MT 84, 332 M 27, 134 P3d 90 (2006), following St. v. Fertterer, 260 M 397, 860 P2d 151 (1993), and St. v. Kroll, 2004 MT 203, 322 M 294, 95 P3d 717 (2004).

Motion to Dismiss Denied Despite Trial Court's Failure to Enter Written Judgment Within Statutory Time Limit: Despite Ferguson's request for expedited sentencing, the District Court still had not entered a written sentence or set a sentencing date more than a month after the oral sentence was pronounced. Ferguson moved for a new trial based on the requirement of this section that a trial court must enter a written sentence within 30 days after oral pronouncement of sentence and asserted that failure of the court to issue a written sentence within the statutory time limit divested the court of jurisdiction to impose a sentence. Neither the state nor the court responded to the motion, but a written sentence was finally rendered 48 days after oral sentencing. Ferguson appealed, citing St. v. Winterrowd, 1998 MT 74, 288 M 208, 957 P2d 522 (1998). The Supreme Court distinguished Winterrowd because that case dealt only with late sentencing by nunc pro tunc orders, and the court declined to extend it in a way that would allow convicted persons to escape sentencing altogether. Although the record did not disclose a legitimate justification for the plain violation of the statute in Ferguson's case, the Supreme Court noted that the statute contains no remedial provision to address a sentencing court's failure to issue a timely written sentence. However, loss of jurisdiction and dismissal of the case were held to be too extreme a remedy, given the relatively minor nature of the sentencing court's statutory infraction. Rather, the Supreme Court deferred to the sentencing court's discretion in rendering timely written judgments on the record and affirmed Ferguson's sentence. St. v. Ferguson, 2005 MT 343, 330 M 103, 126 P3d 463 (2005).

District Court Retention of Criminal Jurisdiction — State's Appeal of Order Granting Driving Privileges Not Timely: A condition of Jivelekas's sentence for felony DUI and misdemeanor driving with a revoked or suspended license provided that Jivelekas could not drive unless approval was granted by the sentencing court or Jivelekas's supervising officer. Nearly 2 years after Jivelekas completed all terms of his sentence, he asked the District Court for approval to operate a motor vehicle in order to maintain full-time employment. The state contended that because 61-8-731 (now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10) required that Jivelekas's probation officer authorize motor vehicle operation, the District Court did not have jurisdiction to consider Jivelekas's motion. The Supreme Court disagreed. Even if the District Court exceeded its statutory authority in imposing the sentence condition, the court still retained jurisdiction to entertain Jivelekas's motion. Additionally, the Supreme Court was precluded from addressing the merits of the state's argument because the state failed to file a timely appeal pursuant to former Rule 5(b), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), so the appeal was time-barred. St. v. Jivelekas, 2005 MT 277, 329 M 204, 122 P3d 1248 (2005), following Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004).

Adoption of Sentence Recommended in Presentence Investigation Report, With Variations — No Error in Disparity Between Oral and Written Sentence: As set out in St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), the oral pronouncement of sentence is the legally effective sentence, and the written judgment and commitment serves as evidence of the sentence orally pronounced. Wiedrich contended that because his written sentence contained terms and conditions that were not orally pronounced, the extra conditions were invalid and should be removed from the sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed. The transcript revealed that the sentencing court clearly adopted the sentence recommended in the presentence investigation report, with some variations—a fact that Wiedrich and his counsel were fully aware of—and the Supreme Court therefore declined to remand for resentencing. St. v. Wiedrich, 2005 MT 127, 327 M 214, 112 P3d 1054 (2005).

Suspension of Part of Sentence for Failure to Register as Sex Offender — Conditions in Written but Not Oral Judgment That Full Employment Be Maintained and Offender Not Have Contact With Victims: Malloy, a convicted sex offender, pleaded guilty to failing to report his change of address. The written judgment, but not the oral pronouncement of sentence, required him to maintain full-time employment and to not have contact with the victims of his offense. The court could not say that the conditions would not substantively increase his loss of liberty or sacrifice of property, and accordingly, the court ordered those conditions to be vacated. St. v. Malloy, 2004 MT 377, 325 M 86, 103 P3d 1064 (2004). See also St. v. Mehan, 2019 MT 100, 395 Mont. 383, 440 P.3d 25.

Imposition of Stock Probation Requirements in Written Sentence When Not Mentioned in Oral Sentence Not Error Absent Showing of Prejudice: When Kroll was sentenced orally for a felony bad check scheme, he received a 10-year prison sentence with all but 180 days suspended and was ordered to pay restitution, not possess or consume alcohol, obtain a chemical dependency evaluation, refrain from entering casinos and playing games of chance, and undergo a sexual risk assessment because many of the materials purchased with the bad checks included pornography. The subsequent written judgment deviated from the oral pronouncement in several respects, omitting the sexual risk assessment and including several conditions not addressed at the oral sentencing, including requirements that Kroll conduct himself in a law-abiding manner, submit to reasonable searches, not own or possess firearms or deadly weapons, maintain full-time legitimate employment, have no contact with the victims, and pay a supervision fee. Kroll contested the validity of the added conditions in the written sentence and the imposition of the sexual risk assessment. The Supreme Court affirmed. The added conditions were civil restrictions that were considered stock requirements for probationers and individuals subject to a suspended sentence and did not substantively increase Kroll's loss of liberty or sacrifice of property. Given the standard nature of the sentencing conditions, Kroll suffered no actual prejudice by failure of the District Court to impose the conditions at oral sentencing, and they were therefore upheld as lawful. The state conceded that the alcohol restrictions and the chemical dependency conditions of the oral sentence were not related to the crime, and the Supreme Court ordered that those conditions be removed, leaving only the gambling and sexual risk assessment at issue. The Supreme Court affirmed those conditions because they were related to the bad check crimes and were a reasonable condition to assist Kroll's rehabilitation. St. v. Kroll, 2004 MT 203, 322 M 294, 95 P3d 717 (2004), following St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480 (2000). See also St. v. Lucero, 2004 MT 248, 323 M 42, 97 P3d 1106 (2004), in which the imposition of significant restrictions and conditions not mentioned in the oral sentence, in addition to stock sentencing conditions authorized in Kroll, was considered prejudicial, reversible error.

No Continuing District Court Jurisdiction to Review Original Sentence and Resentence on Original Charge: Evert was sentenced to 65 years in prison with 15 years suspended for sexual assault. About 5 years into the sentence, Evert petitioned pro se for postconviction relief, alleging numerous claims related to his guilty plea and sentencing, but no hearing was held. Following appointment of two different public defenders, the District Court was notified that the parties had reached an agreement on Evert's petition. In exchange for a new sentence, Evert agreed to withdraw the petition, waive the right to appeal the amended sentence, and waive the right to file any further postconviction petitions based on the new sentence. The District Court agreed to the stipulation, noted Evert's criminal history and progress in prison, and resentenced Evert to 60 years with 20 years suspended, with credit for time served. Evert then appealed the new sentence on grounds that the District Court mistakenly described Evert's eligibility for parole and that because the court did not correctly advise him, he did not fully understand the consequences of waiving his postconviction claims. The Supreme Court reversed because the District Court did not have continuing jurisdiction to resentence Evert after final judgment. Under 46-18-117 (now repealed), the District Court could modify or correct an erroneous sentence but had no authority to resentence Evert on the original charge. Therefore, Evert's original sentence was reinstated, the postconviction claims that Evert waived were also reinstated, and the case was remanded for consideration of the postconviction claims. St. v. Evert, 2004 MT 178, 322 M 105, 93 P3d 1254 (2004), following Gilbert v. St., 2002 MT 258, 312 M 189, 59 P3d 24 (2002), and Vannatta v. Boulds, 2003 MT 343, 318 M 472, 81 P3d 480 (2003).

Remand for Consideration of Amendment of Judgment to Reflect Conviction of Assault With Weapon by Accountability Rather Than Assault With Weapon: Although McDanold's plea of guilty to assault with a weapon was premised entirely on the alternative charge that McDanold was guilty of assault with a weapon by accountability, neither the written nor the oral sentence included any mention of accountability. When McDanold arrived in prison, this fact affected his classification and treatment, so McDanold requested that the judgment be amended to clarify the accountability aspect of the conviction. Even though both the prosecution and defense counsel stipulated to amending the judgment, the District Court noted that the stipulation was not filed until more than 30 days after sentencing and that neither party claimed that the written judgment differed from the oral sentence, so the court declined to amend the judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that it was uncontested that the reason for including the accountability provision in the judgment did not present itself until McDanold was in prison and that a court may correct a factually incorrect sentence at any time. Therefore, under these unique circumstances, the case was remanded for further consideration of the sentencing issue. St. v. McDanold, 2004 MT 167, 322 M 31, 97 P3d 1076 (2004).

Failure to Establish Conflict Between Oral and Written Sentences — Waiver of Right to Request Modification of Written Judgment: After receiving a written judgment, Legg moved to amend or correct the judgment to include a designation of offender status and consideration of mitigating factors. Legg made the motion pursuant to this section, which allows modification of a written sentence to conform with the legally effective oral sentence within 120 days of the written sentence, but Legg failed to establish or discuss the existence of any conflict between the oral and written sentences or to move that the written sentence be amended. By the time that the issue arose on appeal, the 120-day time limit had passed, so Legg waived the right to request modification of the written judgment, and the Supreme Court declined to remand for resentencing on the issue. St. v. Legg, 2004 MT 26, 319 M 362, 84 P3d 648 (2004).

DECISIONS GOVERNED BY LAW IN EFFECT PRIOR TO 2001

AMENDMENT OF 46-18-116 AND REPEAL OF 46-18-117

Addition of Written Sentencing Conditions Not Enunciated Orally at Hearing — Johnson Applied: Drube failed to complete a sex offender program, so the District Court revoked his suspended sentence and sentenced him to a 9-year term, with commitment to the Department of Corrections for the first 5 years and the remainder to be served at the state prison. The court specified that the prison portion of the sentence be suspended as long as Drube met sentencing conditions, including completion of a long-term aftercare program. Drube appealed the sentence on grounds that the court imposed a condition on the sentence that was impossible to fulfill and because the written revocation and sentencing order differed from the oral sentence enunciated at the sentencing hearing. Reviewing the sentence for legality, the Supreme Court affirmed. Drube presented nothing establishing that it would be impossible to complete the sex offender program within the reinstated 5-year commitment to the Department. Arguing that eight written conditions added to the suspended sentence by written order should be stricken, Drube cited St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), for the proposition that when written and oral sentences differ, the oral order prevails. The Supreme Court agreed with the general rule in Lane, but noted that the rule is not absolute. Under St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480 (2000), when deciding whether a subsequent written sentencing order is unlawful because it contains conditions not enunciated orally, the court first determines whether a defendant was afforded the opportunity to respond to the inclusion upon sufficient notice at hearing and second whether the portion of the written sentence substantively increases the defendant's loss of liberty and sacrifice of property. Here, all the conditions in the 2002 written revocation and sentencing order were contained either in Drube's original sentence or in a 2001 revocation and sentencing order and thus were not new or unknown to Drube, who had the opportunity to respond to the conditions placed on the sentence, nor did Drube present any argument that the eight conditions substantively increased the loss of liberty or sacrifice of property. Thus, the 2002 sentencing order was not rendered unlawful by the addition of conditions not imposed orally at the sentencing hearing. St. v. Drube, 2003 MT 138, 316 M 156, 69 P3d 1182 (2003).

Correction of Sentence for Imprisonment Not Erroneous: Kern was convicted of felony sexual assault against a minor. The District Court sentenced Kern to a 15-year commitment to the Department of Corrections, with all but 7 years suspended. However, 46-18-201 requires that a sentence to the Department include suspension of all but 5 years of the commitment. The District Court corrected its mistake and committed Kern to the state prison for 15 years, with all but 7 years suspended. Kern contended that the court erred in correcting the sentence. Under the version of 46-18-117 in effect at the time that the crime was committed (prior to repeal in 2001), the court was allowed to correct the erroneous sentence within 120 days of sentencing. Although Kern might have preferred commitment to the Department for 15 years with all but 5 years suspended, the District Court was not restricted from pursuing the option that it chose and did not err in timely correcting the sentence pursuant to former 46-18-117. (See 2001 amendment to this section.) St. v. Kern, 2003 MT 77, 315 M 22, 67 P3d 272 (2003).

Failure to Credit Inmate With Time Served Before Sentencing in Written Judgment After Allowing Credit in Oral Pronouncement of Sentence: At the sentencing hearing, Horton inquired as to whether he would get credit for time served between arrest and sentencing. The judge responded that credit would be granted automatically. However, in the written judgment entered 2 days later, the judge denied credit for time served because Horton was being held on a probation violation. Under 46-18-403, Horton was entitled to credit for each day of incarceration prior to or after sentencing, and pursuant to St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), the court's oral pronouncement controlled over the written judgment. Thus, the Supreme Court directed that the provision in the written judgment denying Horton credit for time served be stricken. St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001).

Extra Conditions in Sentencing Order Not Mentioned in Oral Sentence Stricken: The District Court that sentenced Waters imposed two extra conditions in the sentencing order that were not contained in the plea agreement or presentence investigation or contained in the oral sentence: (1) payment of supervision fees; and (2) submission to Texas authorities. Pursuant to St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), the oral pronouncement controls. Thus, Waters contended that only the conditions contained in the oral sentence could be imposed. The Supreme Court clarified Lane, noting that Waters was on notice of the conditions in the plea agreement and presentence investigation and that those terms applied despite the ambiguous sentencing conditions that were imposed orally. However, the court remanded for an amendment of the written sentence to strike the submission to Texas authorities, which was never mentioned, and to strike the payment of supervision fees as well, unless it was determined that payment of the fees would not impose a significant hardship on Waters, pursuant to 46-23-1031. St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999), followed in St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000), and St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

Authority to Amend Written Judgment to List Reasons for Parole Restriction: Defendant contended that the District Court erred in failing to state its reasons for restricting parole eligibility in the court's original written judgment and that further error occurred when the court amended the written judgment, following remand from the Sentence Review Division, to list the reasons parole was restricted. Under 46-18-117 (now repealed), the District Court may correct an erroneous sentence at any time to correct clerical errors and to make the record reflect what was actually decided, as long as the correction does not set aside the judgment or change what was originally intended. Here, the amended judgment was consistent with the oral pronouncement of judgment and merely set forth the reasons for imposing the parole restriction. Further, 46-18-117 (now repealed) allows correction of a sentence following remand from an appellate court. The Sentence Review Division functions as part of the appellate process. Thus, when the Division remanded the matter to the District Court for clarification, the court had the express statutory authority to issue an order amending the written judgment to list its reasons for imposing the parole eligibility restriction. St. v. Christianson, 1999 MT 156, 295 M 100, 983 P2d 909, 56 St. Rep. 613 (1999).

Heinous Nature of Crime Alone Justifying Parole Restriction: Defendant raised several contentions in arguing that the District Court improperly imposed a parole eligibility restriction as part of a sentence for the mitigated deliberate homicide of his 3-year-old daughter. The District Court commented at sentencing that it felt "somewhat as the representative of [the] now deceased child". Defendant alleged that the statement showed undue partisanship and indicated failure of the court to act as an objective judicial officer. However, when viewed in the context of the entire proceeding, the comment underscored the court's conclusion that the heinous, brutal nature of the crime was sufficient reason alone to withdraw the privilege of parole eligibility. Citing St. v. Heit, 242 M 488, 791 P2d 1379 (1990), the Supreme Court also noted that it had in the past upheld parole restrictions based upon the heinous nature of the offense. Imposition of the restriction was not an abuse of the court's broad sentencing discretion. St. v. Christianson, 1999 MT 156, 295 M 100, 983 P2d 909, 56 St. Rep. 613 (1999). See also St. v. Rosling, 2008 MT 62, 342 M 1, 180 P3d 1102 (2008).

Oral Pronouncement as Legally Effective Sentence — Correction of Error in Written Judgment by Nunc Pro Tunc Order — Due Process and Double Jeopardy Rights Not Violated: The oral pronouncement of sentence is the legally effective sentence. The written judgment and commitment serves as evidence of the sentence orally pronounced. In the event of a conflict between the oral and written sentence, the oral controls. The sentencing court may correct an error in a written judgment and commitment by a nunc pro tunc order, pursuant to 46-18-117 (now repealed), to accurately reflect what was orally pronounced at the sentencing hearing. Absent evidence of a tangible detriment or concrete injury to defendant, a clarifying nunc pro tunc order does not jeopardize a defendant's due process rights or constitute double jeopardy. (See 2001 amendment.) St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), overruling St. v. Enfinger, 222 M 438, 722 P2d 1170 (1986), St. v. Wirtala, 231 M 264, 752 P2d 177 (1988), St. v. Mason, 253 M 419, 833 P2d 1058 (1992), and St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915

P2d 184 (1996), to the extent that those cases held that the written judgment and commitment, rather than the oral pronouncement of sentence, was to be considered the final, valid order, and followed and applied retroactively in St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361, 56 St. Rep. 1032 (1999). The Supreme Court amended former Rule 5, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), to reflect the Lane decision in In re Amending Rule 5 of the Mont. Rules of Appellate Procedure, 55 St. Rep. 1267 (1998). The Lane rule was applied retroactively in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999). Lane was also followed in St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001), and St. v. Ringewold, 2001 MT 185, 306 M 229, 32 P3d 729 (2001). See also St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000), and St. v. Cleveland, 2018 MT 199, 392 Mont. 338, 423 P.3d 1074.

Abuse of Discretion for Court to Correct Failure to Sentence by Nunc Pro Tunc Order: The District Court failed to sentence Winterrowd, in either open court or by written judgment, on his misdemeanor theft conviction. Four months later, the court issued an order nunc pro tunc, sentencing Winterrowd to 6 months' imprisonment. It is within a District Court's power to enter an order nunc pro tunc modifying or amending a judgment in order to remedy certain types of clerical errors or to make the record reflect what was actually decided. However, in this case, not only was the sentence omitted from the written sentencing order, but the sentence was not even discussed at the sentencing hearing. The Supreme Court reversed and vacated the nunc pro tunc order and sentence. St. v. Winterrowd, 1998 MT 74, 288 M 208, 957 P2d 522, 55 St. Rep. 307 (1998).

No Jurisdiction to Modify Sentence as to Restitution: Defendant was ordered to pay the victim's future counseling costs. Later, on a motion of the state, the court ordered defendant to pay costs for inpatient psychiatric treatment received by the victim prior to the original court order. The Supreme Court held that the District Court was without jurisdiction to modify the sentence under 46-18-117 (now repealed) because the sentence was not erroneous or imposed in an illegal manner. St. v. Richards, 285 M 322, 948 P2d 240, 54 St. Rep. 1172 (1997), followed in St. v. Rennick, 1999 MT 155, 295 M 97, 983 P2d 907, 56 St. Rep. 611 (1999).

Appeal of Misdemeanor Conviction From Justice's Court to District Court — No Record of Oral Pronouncement of Sentence in Justice's Court — District Court Jurisdiction Upheld: Tweedy was convicted by a Justice's Court jury of misdemeanor assault and was scheduled for sentencing on April 18, 1989. On April 19, Tweedy filed a notice of appeal to the District Court. The Justice's Court filed its sentencing order on May 3. Later, in response to a motion by Tweedy to dismiss the underlying charge, the state contended that the District Court had not acquired jurisdiction over Tweedy. The Supreme Court held that since there was no evidence in the record that the sentencing hearing scheduled for April 18 did not, in fact, take place and since, under St. v. Mortenson, 175 M 403, 574 P2d 581 (1978), appeal may be taken within 10 days after sentence is orally pronounced in open court, Tweedy's notice of appeal was timely filed and the District Court had jurisdiction over the case. The Supreme Court also noted that the later enactment of this section, which applies to Justices' Courts by virtue of 46-1-103, requiring a signed judgment on the record, should eliminate confusion in the future regarding when the statutory time for appeal begins to run. St. v. Tweedy, 277 M 313, 922 P2d 1134, 53 St. Rep. 656 (1996).

Variance Between Oral and Written Sentence Held Harmless Error: Graveley was convicted of solicitation to commit deliberate homicide. At the sentencing hearing, the District Court announced Graveley's sentence of 40 years in the custody of the Department of Corrections, with the first 10 years in a prison environment. The District Court's written judgment omitted the reference to the first 10 years. The Supreme Court held that a review of the oral record showed that the District Court intended the reference to 10 years to mean a minimum of 10 years and that because under the written judgment Graveley would be eligible for a supervised release program earlier than under the oral pronouncement, Graveley was not prejudiced by the written judgment. The Supreme Court held that absent a finding that a sentence is erroneous or illegal, the District Court could not alter its sentence. However, the difference in this case between the oral pronouncement and written judgment was harmless error. St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915 P2d 184, 53 St. Rep. 239 (1996).

No Error in Refusal to Modify Sentence to Run Concurrently With Federal Sentence: After Fertters were each convicted and sentenced on state felony and misdemeanor counts involving poaching, they were convicted of federal violations arising out of the same acts. The federal District Court stated that the federal sentences "shall be served concurrent to state penalties dealing with the same criminal transaction". The state District Court, which announced its penalties before the federal District Court did, refused to amend its sentences to allow them to run concurrently with the penalties of the federal District Court. The Supreme Court held that the state District Court was correct in its refusal in that the state District Court did not have jurisdiction to amend a lawful sentence once the sentence was pronounced. St. v. Fertterer, 260 M 397, 860 P2d 151, 50 St. Rep. 1135 (1993), followed in St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915 P2d 184, 53 St. Rep. 239 (1996).

Part 2 Form of Sentence

46-18-201. Sentences that may be imposed.

Source: New.

[Section 46-18-201(1)(a)] was principally constructed for the benefit of a young offender who has no previous criminal record. Thus, if the imposition of sentence is deferred, the fact an individual made one mistake will not plague him for the rest of his life.

Under [46-18-201(1)(b)] the judge may give a credit for elapsed time if he feels this to be an incentive for better behavior.

The conditions which may be imposed are left entirely to the imagination of the individual judge. It is contemplated that conditions will be imposed which are for the benefit of the individual, and which can be fairly met. An example would be jail-basing of the sentenced individual for a specified period of time, or some other limitations on his daily life which [are] in keeping with the individual's particular needs in adjusting to his environment.

Chapter 575 in (4) inserted reference to 45-9-101(5)(d); and made minor changes in grammar. Amendment effective April 20, 1989.

1987 Amendments: Chapter 370 near middle of (4), after "45-5-103", substituted "45-5-202(3) relating to aggravated assault" for "45-5-202(2)".

Chapter 610 in (4) substituted reference to 45-5-103 for reference to 45-5-103(2); and in (5) substituted reference to 45-5-102 for reference to 45-5-102(2).

Chapter 626 in (3) substituted language stating that if subsection (1)(a) or (1)(b) restrictions or conditions are violated, the court may disallow all or part of elapsed time (except jail time already served) against the sentence for "If any restrictions or conditions imposed under subsection (1)(a) or (1)(b) are violated, any elapsed time, except jail time, is not a credit against the sentence unless the court orders otherwise."

1985 Amendments: Chapter 205 at end of (1)(a)(iv) deleted "as provided in subsection (2)"; and in (2) substituted "any financial obligation" for "restitution" and after "(1)(a)", deleted "or (1)(b)".

Chapter 581, in (1)(a)(ii), changed "90 days" to "180 days"; and inserted (1)(a)(v) including the condition of payment of the costs of confinement.

1981 Amendments: Chapter 198 inserted (1)(a)(v), (1)(a)(vi), and (1)(a)(vii) relating to payment of fine, payment of costs, and community service, respectively; in (1)(b) inserted “or conditions” following “restrictions” in two places; inserted (1)(d) relating to requiring payment of costs; and revised subsection references to reflect inserted subsections.

Chapter 207 inserted (5) restricting deferral of imposition of sentence in a felony case.

Chapter 415 inserted (1)(a)(vii) relating to payment of costs; inserted “or conditions” after “restrictions” in the second and third sentence of (1)(b); changed “(1)(a)(vi)” to “(1)(a)(x)” in (1)(b); inserted (1)(d) relating to payment of costs; and changed “subsections (1)(b), (1)(c), and (1)(d)” to “subsections (1)(b) through (1)(e)” in (1)(f).

Applicability of Commission Comments: The applicability of commission comments should be evaluated with reference to numerous subsequent amendments.

Saving Clause: Section 4, Ch. 322, L. 1979, provided: “This act applies only to offenses committed after the effective date of this act.” The effective date was July 1, 1979.

GENERAL

Workers’ Compensation Insurer Entitled to Restitution for Pecuniary Loss — Defendant’s Financial Situation Made Payment of Restitution Unjust: The defendant pleaded guilty to the offense of misdemeanor assault for striking a peace officer while waiting for an initial appearance in Justice Court in another matter. The plea agreement called for the defendant to pay restitution to the Montana State Fund (MSF) for its workers’ compensation payments to the peace officer and medical providers. The defendant argued at the restitution hearing that MSF was not a victim under 46-18-243 because it had not suffered a pecuniary loss, that the statute did not authorize payment of general damages, and that she was unable to afford and would be unduly burdened by the full amount of restitution suggested. The District Court held that MSF qualified as a victim insurer and thus was entitled to the full amount of restitution within 5 months of the sentence. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that MSF was entitled to restitution for pecuniary loss. However, the Supreme Court reversed the District Court’s failure to waive restitution pursuant to 46-18-246, reasoning that the uncontroverted evidence of the defendant’s dire financial situation made it otherwise unjust to require the defendant to pay the restitution imposed. St. v. Lodahl, 2021 MT 156, 404 Mont. 362, 491 P.3d 661.

No Written Documentation Supporting Documentation of Restitution Calculation — Not Clearly Erroneous: The victim in a criminal case was awarded restitution for the pecuniary losses she sustained, including purchasing a new door, lock, and keys, and renting a storage space. She testified as to the losses but did not provide written documentation in support. The Supreme Court affirmed the award, noting that the statute does not specifically require written documentation, the defendant had a full opportunity to cross-examine and to provide rebuttal evidence, and the expenses were not outside the realm of common experience. The Supreme Court also noted that providing written documentation is nevertheless the better practice. St. v. Williams, 2018 MT 194, 392 Mont. 285, 423 P.3d 596.

Reliance on Document Not Admitted — Court Required to Balance Privacy Interests Against Disclosure: After the defendant’s conviction for negligent endangerment, a hearing was held on the amount of restitution to be awarded to the Department of Justice’s crime victims compensation program, which had provided counseling services to the defendant’s victim. The Municipal Court denied the defendant’s request to examine the form based on the victim’s right of privacy in the information that the form contained and subsequently awarded restitution to the program. Because the defendant had a right to receive and rebut the treatment plan form because it was relied on by witnesses to establish how much of the counseling costs were related to the defendant’s offense and because the victim may have had a protectable expectation of privacy regarding some of the contents, the Municipal Court erred by not determining the contents of the document and balancing the competing interests of privacy and disclosure. St. v. McClelland, 2015 MT 281, 381 Mont. 164, 357 P.3d 906.

No District Court Authority to Order Sale of Firearms During Sentencing: The defendant pleaded nolo contendere to robbery, assault with a weapon, and burglary. As part of the sentencing the District Court directed the County Sheriff to sell the defendant's firearms and apply the proceeds to the cost of incarceration at the county detention facility. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed the condition that the firearms be sold and the proceeds applied against the defendant's incarceration costs. The court reasoned that the Legislature did not provide the District Court with the statutory authority to order the sale of firearms. St. v. Lee, 2015 MT 259, 381 Mont. 33, 358 P.3d 168.

Proper Denial of Credit for Time Served at Residential Treatment Center Prior to Sentencing: Prior to being sentenced, the defendant spent a year in a treatment facility. During sentencing, she requested that the District Court credit her under 46-18-403 for each day she spent at the facility, arguing that she should receive credit because the District Court had ordered her to complete the 12-month program at the facility. The state, however, argued that the time at the treatment facility was not incarceration and therefore she could not receive credit for her time there. The District Court denied the request for credit. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that although other states have passed laws allowing defendants to receive credit for time spent at a treatment facility, Montana has not and therefore the District Court did not have the authority to grant credit for the defendant's time at the treatment facility. St. v. Byrd, 2015 MT 20, 378 Mont. 94, 342 P.3d 9.

Release of Restitution Obligation Properly Denied: The defendant was convicted of felony sexual assault against two young sisters. The defendant was designated a level 1 sex offender and sentenced to 35 years' imprisonment, with 5 years suspended. The defendant was also ordered to pay restitution to compensate the victims for counseling. The District Court denied the defendant's subsequent petition for remission of restitution. On appeal, the Supreme Court concluded that the record provided credible evidence that both victims wanted and needed counseling and that the victims were unable to pay for counseling. The Supreme Court held that the District Court was well within the bounds of reason in determining that the defendant should not be released from his restitution obligation. State v. Passmore, 2014 MT 249, 376 Mont. 334, 334 P.3d 378.

State Not "Victim" Eligible for Restitution: A District Court ordered a defendant who pleaded guilty to sexual assault to pay restitution to the state for the costs of extraditing him from New Mexico. The defendant appealed the order for restitution. The Supreme Court reversed, concluding that the state did not qualify as a "victim" under 46-18-243 and was not eligible to receive restitution for costs related to his extradition. St. v. Brothers, 2013 MT 222, 371 Mont. 254, 307 P.3d 306, followed in St. v. Macy, 2014 MT 34, 374 Mont. 8, 318 P.3d 706.

State Not Victim for Restitution Purposes — Expenses of Interviewing Witnesses: The state was not a victim entitled to restitution when the state did not suffer from property damage or incur costs in apprehending the defendant but, rather, incurred expenses when interviewing a potential defense witness. St. v. Jay, 2013 MT 79, 369 Mont. 332, 298 P.3d 396.

Affirmative Evidence of Defendant's Lack of Remorse Sufficient Justification for Sentence Enhancement: When the defendant's lack of remorse was a main theme during the trial and was discussed at length during the sentencing hearing, the judge's conclusion that the defendant demonstrated no remorse for her actions that resulted in the death of another motorist was based on competent evidence and was not improper. St. v. Bekemans, 2013 MT 11, 368 Mont. 235, 293 P.3d 843.

Award of Restitution When Causation Not Element of Offense — No Error — Sworn Testimony at Restitution Hearing Sufficient Evidence to Support Amount Awarded: The defendant was involved in a collision between her vehicle and the victim's bicycle, but because she apparently was unaware of the collision, she drove away from the scene of the accident. After a jury found the defendant guilty of failure to remain at the scene of an accident in violation of 61-7-103 and failure to notify authorities of an accident in violation of 61-7-108, the defendant's sentence included an order to pay the victim $4,148.60 in restitution. The defendant appealed the award of restitution on the grounds that neither of the two charges she was convicted of included causation as an element. The Supreme Court concluded that because the lower court properly found that the victim's losses resulted from the defendant's commission of the offenses, there was no error in awarding restitution, even though causation was not an element of either offense, and held that the victim's sworn testimony at the restitution hearing provided sufficient substantive evidence to support the amount of the award. Billings v. Edward, 2012 MT 186, 366 Mont. 107, 285 P.3d 523.

District Court Failed to Reference Lack of Remorse In Record — Sentence Illegal: After the defendant was convicted of assault with a weapon, the District Court sentenced him to 20 years at Montana State Prison with no restriction on parole, based in part on the defendant's lack of remorse for the stabbing. Relying on St. v. Duncan, 2008 MT 148, 343 Mont. 220, 183 P.3d 111, the Supreme Court reversed the sentence and remanded for correction because in its sentence pronouncement, the District Court did not affirmatively point to any evidence in the record to support the finding of lack of remorse. St. v. Briscoe, 2012 MT 152, 365 Mont. 383, 282 P.3d 657.

Criminal Endangerment — Bodily Injury — Restitution for Lost Wages: A defendant entered a guilty plea to felony criminal endangerment after he crashed into a car driven by a minor, who suffered multiple injuries. The District Court imposed on the defendant a 10-year commitment to the Department of Corrections with all but 180 days suspended and ordered him to pay the minor's wages for the summer, her father's lost wages, and her unpaid medical expenses. The defendant appealed, contending that the District Court had improperly awarded restitution for lost wages and had abused its discretion in imposing the maximum sentence. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the District Court was reasonable in including the minor's lost wages for summer employment as part of restitution and that the District Court properly considered the defendant's prior drunk-driving infractions in imposing the maximum sentence. St. v. Dodson, 2011 MT 302, 363 Mont. 63, 265 P.3d 1254.

Remand for Resentencing vs. Striking Illegal Portion of Sentence — Heafner Followed: After the Supreme Court determined that a sentence involving a weapons enhancement was illegal and remanded the case to the District Court for resentencing, the defendant appealed, claiming that the District Court should have simply struck the illegal portion of its sentence. Citing St. v. Heafner, 2010 MT 87, 356 Mont. 128, 231 P.3d 1087, the Supreme Court held that the better practice was to remand for resentencing rather than to remand with an order to strike the illegal portion of the sentence. St. v. Lambert, 2010 MT 287, 359 Mont. 8, 248 P.3d 295. See also St. v. Boyd, 2021 MT 323, 407 Mont. 1, 501 P.3d 409.

Error in Failing to State Reasons for Not Crediting Time Spent on Probation — Remanded for Further Proceedings: In 1997, Tirey was sentenced to 50 years in prison for sexual assault, with 25 years suspended. Tirey was released from prison to serve his suspended sentence on November 10, 2008, but failed to comply with the terms of his parole. Tirey was arrested on December 3, 2008, and the District Court revoked his probation on July 24, 2009. Tirey was subsequently sentenced to 25 years in prison with 7 years suspended, with no credit for time served on probation. The District Court erred when it failed to state the reasons for not crediting the time Tirey spent on probation. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded for further proceedings. St. v. Tirey, 2010 MT 283, 358 Mont. 510, 247 P.3d 701.

Statutory Direction for Determining Sanction Following Revocation of Probation: Unlike the initial criminal proceedings against an accused, a probation violation proceeding is civil. Probation revocation is not based on the conduct that constituted the original crime, but rather on later conduct that constituted a violation of the conditions of a suspended sentence. Thus, 46-18-201 applies to the initial sentence imposed after conviction of a crime upon a verdict or plea and governs the form of a criminal sentence. By contrast, 46-18-203 applies later when a District Court finds that an offender has violated the terms of the original suspended sentence imposed under 46-18-201 and defines the District Court's options in a revocation proceeding. Therefore, a District Court determining the sanction to be imposed after a revocation of probation is governed by 46-18-203 and not by 46-18-201. St. v. Roberts, 2010 MT 110, 356 Mont. 290, 233 P.3d 324. See also St. v. Boulton, 2006 MT 170, 332 Mont. 538, 140 P.3d 482, St. v. Letasky, 2007 MT 51, 336 Mont. 178, 152 P.3d 1288, St. v. Seals, 2007 MT 71, 336 Mont. 416, 156 P.3d 15, and St. v. Strong, 2009 MT 65, 349 Mont. 417, 203 P.3d 848.

Full Restitution for Theft Without Consideration of Offender's Ability to Pay — No Error: Following conviction for theft by common scheme, Brownback was ordered to pay restitution in full. Brownback appealed on grounds that the sentencing court erred by failing to consider Brownback's ability to pay restitution. The Supreme Court disagreed. The former provision requiring a sentencing court to consider an offender's ability to pay was removed from the restitution statutes in 2003 and was replaced by the mandate that District Courts require an offender to pay full restitution. Therefore, the sentencing court did not err in requiring Brownback to pay full restitution without considering the ability to pay. St. v. Brownback, 2010 MT 96, 356 Mont. 190, 232 P.3d 385.

Revocation of Parole or Probation Not Considered Punishment for Double Jeopardy Purposes: Revocation is a supervisory act involving the enforcement of conditions imposed on a term of parole or probation. Therefore, the same act or acts may form the basis for revoking both an offender's parole and an ensuing suspended sentence without contravening double jeopardy protections. Here, Haagenson was granted conditional release and a suspended sentence subject to certain conditions, including a requirement that he remain law abiding and not consume alcohol. Haagenon subsequently violated these conditions and thus forfeited both the conditional release and the future suspended sentence. St. v. Haagenon, 2010 MT 95, 356 Mont. 177, 232 P.3d 367, distinguishing St. v. Martinez, 2008 MT 233, 344 Mont. 394, 188 P.3d 1034, and St. v. Johnston, 2008 MT 318, 346 Mont. 93, 193 P.3d 925.

Remand Appropriate Remedy for Partially Illegal Sentence: In order to reconcile disparate past decisions regarding the appropriate remedy for a partially illegal sentence, the Supreme Court adopted a rule that when a portion of a sentence is illegal, the best remedy is to remand the case to the District Court to correct the illegal provision unless, under the particular circumstances of the case, the illegal portion of the sentence cannot be corrected. In those instances, the case will be remanded with instructions to strike the illegal conditions. St. v. Heafner, 2010 MT 87, 356 Mont. 128, 231 P.3d 1087, followed in St. v. Ring, 2014 MT 49, 374 Mont. 109, 321 P.3d 800, and Kalispell v. Salsgiver, 2019 MT 126, 396 Mont. 57, 443 P.3d 504. See also St. v. Boyd, 2021 MT 323, 407 Mont. 1, 501 P.3d 409.

Authority of District Court to Sentence Youth to Department of Corrections for Fifteen Years With None Suspended: After Quesnel violated five conditions of a suspended sentence for sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault, Quesnel was sentenced to 15 years with the Department of Corrections with a recommendation for placement at the state prison and that parole eligibility be conditioned on completion of sexual offender treatment. Quesnel was a youth at the time of the offenses but was charged directly in District Court as an adult. Quesnel contended that the District Court lacked authority to impose a 15-year sentence because under the 2001 version of 46-18-201(3)(d)(i), all but the first 5 years of the sentence should be suspended. The state maintained that 46-18-201(3)(d)(ii) should apply because Quesnel was a youth whose case was transferred to District Court, so the District Court was authorized to impose the longer sentence. Quesnel argued that because charges were filed directly in District Court, his case was never technically transferred. The Supreme Court examined the legislative history to reconcile the use of the term “transferred” and concluded that 46-18-201(3)(d)(ii) applied not only to a youth whose case was transferred from Youth Court to District Court, but also to any youth who appears in District Court pursuant to 41-5-206. Quesnel appeared in District Court to answer charges of an offense enumerated in 41-5-206 and was found guilty, therefore the provisions of 46-18-201(3)(d)(ii) applied, and the District Court was not required to suspend all but 5 years of Quesnel’s sentence but in fact was authorized to impose the 15-year sentence. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Quesnel, 2009 MT 388, 353 M 317, 220 P3d 634 (2009).

Report Containing List of Victim’s Medical Expenses Insufficient to Serve as Victim-Submitted Affidavit: A presentence investigation report set out the medical expenses paid by or on behalf of a crime victim, but no documentation or evidence of payment was included. The Supreme Court concluded that the report was not sufficient in form and substance to serve as the victim-submitted affidavit of medical expenses required under 46-18-242(1)(b) to form the basis for establishing the amount of restitution owed by defendant for the victim’s medical expenses. St. v. Hunt, 2009 MT 265, 352 M 70, 214 P3d 1234 (2009). See also McDermott v. Carie, LLC, 2005 MT 293, 329 M 295, 124 P3d 168 (2005).

No Statutory Indication That Youth Received Illegal Sentence Following Transfer of Case to District Court: At the age of 17, Strong was charged with two counts of felony burglary, and the state moved to transfer the charges to District Court. The state also filed theft charges against Strong in Youth Court. Strong entered a guilty plea on the burglary charges in exchange for dismissal of the theft charges. The District Court sentenced Strong to the Department of Corrections for 8 years, with 2 years suspended on each count. While serving the prison term, Strong challenged the sentence as illegal because the District Court failed to suspend all but 5 years. The state countered that the 5-year limitation in 46-18-201(3)(d) did not apply to a youth who was transferred to District Court under 41-5-206. The District Court affirmed the original sentence and Strong appealed. Applying the criteria in St. v. Ellis, 2007 MT 210, 339 M 14, 167 P3d 896 (2007), the Supreme Court addressed the facial challenge to the exemption in 46-18-201(3)(d)(ii) and affirmed. In order for an adult to receive the less onerous commitment to the Department of Corrections, the sentencing court must be willing to suspend all but 5 years of the commitment, but the statute imposes no similar impediment on a court’s ability to commit to the Department a youth transferred to District Court under 41-5-206. This enhanced flexibility with regard to the treatment of youth offenders comports with the goals of the Youth Court Act to ensure rehabilitation of youth offenders rather than solely retribution. Therefore, nothing in 46-18-201(3)(d)(ii) established that Strong received an illegal sentence. St. v. Strong, 2009 MT 65, 349 M 417, 203 P3d 848 (2009). See also In re C.H., 210 M 184, 683 P2d 931 (1984).

Failure of Defendant to Admit Incest — Sentence Not Considered More Harsh Given Relevant Sentencing Factors: Bullman consistently maintained that he was not guilty of incest with his stepdaughter because he was never married to her mother. Because Bullman refused to admit guilt and was thus ineligible for community-based treatment, he asserted that he was sentenced more harshly by being sentenced to prison. The Supreme Court examined the record and disagreed. The sentencing court was aware of the prohibition against sentencing a defendant to prison because the defendant does not admit guilt, but the court also considered numerous other relevant factors in sentencing Bullman to prison in addition to the expert opinion that Bullman was not a candidate for community-based treatment, including: (1) the significant impact of the crime on the victim; (2) the need to protect society; (3) Bullman's need for appropriate treatment; (4) Bullman's criminal history; and (5) Bullman's long history of substance abuse. Given these sentencing factors, the Supreme Court could not conclude that Bullman was sentenced to prison for failure to admit guilt, and the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Bullman, 2009 MT 37, 349 M 228, 203 P3d 768 (2009).

What Constitutes Similarly Situated Case for Purposes of Retroactive Application of New Rule — Issue Required to Be Raised in Trial Court: As a general principle, in order for a case to be similarly situated for purposes of retroactive application of a newly announced rule, the issue addressed by the new rule should be raised by the movant at the trial court level and properly preserved for appeal. The only exception would be a challenge under the common-law plain error doctrine or if unique circumstances apply, such as those in St. v. Carter, 2005 MT 87, 326 M 427, 114 P3d 1001 (2005). Here, Foster-DeBerry contended that the new rule regarding suppression of telephone and transmission recordings announced in St. v. Goetz & St. v. Hamper, 2008 MT 296, 345 M 421, 191 P3d 489 (2008), should retroactively apply to Foster-DeBerry's case, which was pending when the Goetz-Hamper rule was announced. However, Foster-DeBerry never filed a motion to suppress or raised the legal issues addressed in Goetz-Hamper in trial court, and thus did not preserve the issue for appeal, so Foster-DeBerry was not entitled to retroactive application of the Goetz-Hamper rule. Further, Foster-DeBerry did not argue for application of the plain error doctrine, so the Supreme Court declined to apply it. St. v. Foster-DeBerry, 2008 MT 397, 347 M 164, 197 P3d 1004 (2008), following Griffith v. Kentucky, 479 US 314 (1987), and St. v. Zivcic, 598 NW2d 565 (Wis. Ct. App. 1999).

Inability of District Court to Impose Sentence in Plea Agreement — Withdrawal of Guilty Plea Allowed: Deserly negotiated a plea agreement on a felony assault with a weapon charge wherein the state would recommend a 10-year sentence with the Department of Corrections and Deserly would be designated a persistent felony offender. However, after the plea was entered, the District Court and Deserly discovered that under 46-18-201, all but the first 5 years of a department commitment must be suspended, so the sentence in the plea agreement was not one that could be legally imposed. Deserly then moved to withdraw the guilty plea on grounds of good cause, but the District Court denied the motion, and Deserly appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Under St. v. Lone Elk, 2005 MT 56, 326 M 214, 108 P3d 500 (2005), a defendant's plea is not voluntary if the court, the prosecutor, defense counsel, or some other party induced the plea, however slightly, by misrepresentation, including unfulfilled or unfulfillable promises. At the time Deserly entered the plea, it was reasonable for him to expect that the District Court could at least consider, if not actually impose, the recommended sentence, and Deserly was induced, at least in part, by the prospect of being able to receive the sentence that he and the prosecutor had negotiated and agreed to recommend. Because Deserly was induced by an unfulfillable promise of an illegal sentence, albeit unintentionally, his plea was not voluntary, and the case was remanded for further proceedings to allow Deserly to withdraw the guilty plea. St. v. Deserly, 2008 MT 242, 344 M 468, 188 P3d 1057 (2008).

Court's Sua Sponte Withdrawal of Defendant's Guilty Plea Following Judgment Considered Mistake of Law: Friedt pleaded guilty to a stop sign violation and to a charge of failing to carry proof of insurance in the vehicle and was sentenced in Municipal Court. During sentencing, the County Attorney failed to raise any issues of restitution. After judgment was entered, the court was advised by a victim of a claim of damages associated with Friedt's offenses. The court, sua sponte, withdrew Friedt's guilty pleas, appointed counsel, and set an omnibus hearing. Friedt then petitioned the Supreme Court for supervisory control, asserting that the Municipal Court lacked jurisdiction to vacate or modify the sentence once a valid sentence was pronounced and thus proceeded under a mistake of law in withdrawing the guilty pleas, which would result in a gross injustice and unnecessary expense if Friedt was required to stand trial on charges to which she knowingly and voluntarily pleaded guilty and on which she had been sentenced. The County Attorney argued that the Municipal Court retained jurisdiction under 46-16-702 and that the interests of justice to the victim and the mandatory restitution provision in 46-18-201 required the Municipal Court to remedy the situation sua sponte. The Supreme Court noted that 46-16-702 allows a new trial, following judgment, for a defendant in the interests of justice, but that the statute does not authorize a new proceeding to benefit a victim or a prosecutor who fails to timely raise a sentencing matter. Further, although 46-16-105 allows a court for good cause to allow withdrawal of a guilty plea within 1 year after judgment if evidence supports a fundamental miscarriage of justice, nothing in the statute allows a court to forcibly withdraw a defendant's guilty plea sua sponte under any circumstances. Therefore, the Supreme Court agreed that the Municipal Court's action constituted a mistake of law. Friedt's petition for supervisory control was granted, and the Municipal Court was instructed to vacate the order withdrawing Friedt's guilty pleas. Friedt v. Billings Municipal Court, 2008 MT 174, 343 M 386, 184 P3d 1032 (2008).

Adoption of Herd Standard of Review of Challenges to Legality or Propriety of Probation Conditions: The appropriate standard of review for cases challenging the legality or propriety of probation conditions is the two-pronged standard set out in St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 M 490, 87 P3d 1017 (2004). The sentencing condition is first reviewed for legality. Then, because sentencing statutes authorize the imposition of conditions on deferred or suspended sentences that constitute reasonable restrictions or conditions considered necessary for the rehabilitation or for the protection of the victim or society, the reasonableness of the conditions is reviewed for an abuse of discretion. St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008).

Revocation of Suspended Felony DUI Sentence—Erroneous Order to Serve Time at State Prison: After pleading guilty to a felony DUI committed in 2000, Oie was sentenced to the Department of Corrections for 13 months, followed by 4 years of supervised release with conditions. Oie was subsequently apprehended on several occasions for violating probation conditions, and the state moved to revoke Oie's suspended sentence. The District Court gave Oie credit for time served and sentenced Oie to 4 years at the state prison. Oie appealed the sentence, arguing that under the 1999 version of 61-8-731 (now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10) in effect at the time of the original offense, the District Court could not impose a sentence that was greater than the remainder of the probationary term. The Supreme Court agreed and reversed. The specific provisions of 61-8-731(5) (1999) governed the imposition of a sentence upon the revocation of Oie's suspended sentence and limited the District Court to either continuing the period of probation or requiring Oie to serve the remainder of the probation sentence. A 4-year prison sentence was outside statutory parameters, and the case was remanded for resentencing consistent with the applicable statute. St. v. Oie, 2007 MT 328, 340 M 205, 174 P3d 937 (2007), following St. v. Webb, 2005 MT 5, 325 M 317, 106 P3d 521 (2005).

Res Judicata Not Bar to Correction of Manifest Error in Prior Decision—Illegal Sentence Reversed: In 1998, when Southwick committed two felonies, this section limited commitment to the Department of Corrections (DOC) to 5 years. In 1999, the Legislature amended the statute to allow a longer DOC commitment up to the maximum time that a defendant could be sentenced for a particular offense, provided that all but the first 5 years of commitment are suspended. When Southwick's parole was subsequently revoked in 2003, the District Court revoked the suspended portion of Southwick's commitments to the DOC, even though Southwick had discharged his unsuspended commitments to the DOC, and ordered Southwick to be recommitted to the DOC for an additional 5 years in each case. Southwick petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus on grounds that the sentence was illegal, but the petition was denied on grounds of res judicata. Southwick also moved the District Court for resentencing on grounds that the sentence was illegal, but the motion was denied, and Southwick appealed. The Supreme Court noted that res judicata generally precludes reviewing an issue already decided and that relitigation of issues in criminal cases is barred if: (1) the same ground presented in the subsequent application was determined adversely to the applicant on the prior application; (2) the prior determination was on the merits; and (3) the ends of justice would not be served by reaching the merits of the subsequent application. The court also noted that when a criminal defendant is potentially subject to a facially illegal sentence, the ends of justice suggest that res judicata should not bar rehearing the issues even if the first two criteria are met. In this case, the District Court applied a statute that was not in effect at the time that Southwick committed the crimes, which violated the prohibition on ex post facto laws. Because the District Court did not have authority to impose the sentence, the sentence was illegal and facially invalid. The 5-year DOC commitment for each offense was valid, but not the suspended portions following Southwick's commitment. Southwick had discharged the maximum time that he could have been committed to DOC before the petition to revoke was filed, and the District Court had no authority to revoke a suspended commitment that was illegally imposed. Therefore, the Supreme Court vacated the order revoking the suspended portion of Southwick's commitments. St. v. Southwick, 2007 MT 257, 339 M 281, 169 P3d 698 (2007).

Failure to Base More Onerous Resentence on Objective Information Concerning Identifiable Conduct by Defendant or to Set Out Reasons for Longer Sentence Affirmatively in Record Violative of Due Process — Resentence Reversed: Following conviction for sexual intercourse without consent, Jackson was sentenced to the Department of Corrections for 6 years and ordered to complete a sex offender treatment program before becoming eligible for parole. More than 2 years later, Jackson moved for resentencing, alleging that the sentence violated subsection (3)(d)(i) of this section, which requires that all but the first 5 years of commitment to the Department of Corrections must be suspended, but the motion was dismissed as untimely. Jackson then petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus. The state conceded that the sentence was illegal, but asserted that resentencing, rather than striking the illegal portion of the sentence, was the proper remedy. The District Court agreed and resentenced Jackson to a 6-year term at the state prison with the same program completion requirements, after determining that the new sentence was not more onerous. Jackson appealed. Reviewing the sentence for legality, the Supreme Court reversed. Under St. v. Redfern, 2004 MT 277, 323 M 225, 99 P3d 223 (2004), in order to meet due process requirements and allow full appellate review of the constitutional legitimacy of the sentence, a longer sentence on resentencing after a new trial must be based on objective information concerning identifiable conduct of the defendant after the original sentencing and reasons for the longer sentence must affirmatively appear in the record. Additionally, a sentencing court denies a defendant's due process rights by imposing a heavier sentence as punishment for setting aside the original sentence. In this case, Jackson's resentencing was considered more onerous, and the sentencing judge did not base the more burdensome sentence on objective information concerning identifiable conduct by Jackson after the original sentencing or set out the reasons for the longer sentence affirmatively in the record, thus violating Jackson's due process rights. St. v. Jackson, 2007 MT 186, 338 M 344, 165 P3d 321 (2007), followed in St. v. Bullplume, 2011 MT 40, 359 Mont. 289 251 P.3d 114.

No Prejudice Shown in Incorporation of Tribal Court Juvenile Record Into Sentencing Procedure — Due Process Not Violated: Phillips sought postconviction relief on grounds that his tribal court juvenile record had been illegally requested by the state and incorporated into the presentence investigation report and sentencing proceedings in violation of due process. The petition was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed without addressing the issue of release of the record under tribal law. Phillips did not present any evidence that the juvenile record or any information in the presentence investigation report was materially inaccurate, that the tribal court record influenced placement with the Department of Corrections, or that he was prejudiced by the tribal court record in violation of due process, so dismissal of the petition for postconviction relief was not erroneous. St. v. Phillips, 2007 MT 117, 337 M 248, 159 P3d 1078 (2007).

Sentence Based Upon Lack of Remorse Inferred From Silence Not Legal Sentence: Rennaker was found guilty of incest after defending against the charge by asserting consent and that the victim was 20 years old at the time of the offense. When Rennaker was found guilty and asked at his sentencing hearing if he had anything to say and he replied that he did not, the District Court found that silence indicated Rennaker's lack of remorse and sentenced Rennaker to a term in the state prison. The Supreme Court, citing St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002), and St. v. Cesnik, 2005 MT 257, 329 M 63, 122 P3d 456 (2005), held that because the District Court did not tie Rennaker's apparent lack of remorse to any evidence or statement by him, but rather inferred it from Rennaker's silence, the District Court violated Rennaker's right against self-incrimination. The Supreme Court remanded the case for resentencing. St. v. Rennaker, 2007 MT 10, 335 M 274, 150 P3d 960 (2007). See also St. v. Garcia, 2011 MT 130, 360 Mont. 537, 254 P.3d 589.

Sufficient Accurate Information to Support Sentence for Distribution of Methamphetamine: Harper was sentenced to 20 years in prison with 10 years suspended and fined $12,000 after pleading guilty to possession of dangerous drugs with intent to distribute. Harper appealed on grounds that the sentencing court based the sentence on inaccurate and insufficient evidence that Harper was the center of the drug operation. Harper had a right to be sentenced based on correct evidence, but also had the affirmative duty to show, beyond mere unsupported contentions, that the alleged misinformation was materially inaccurate and to present information establishing inaccuracies in the presentence investigation report. In this case, the sentencing court did nothing more than consider relevant information relating to the nature and circumstances of the possession of drugs found during the search of Harper's home, including unrefuted information that Harper was at the center of a methamphetamine distribution business conducted from the home. Information in the presentence investigation report simply underscored Harper's involvement in drug distribution and supported that charge to which Harper pleaded guilty. The information was properly before the sentencing court, and the court did not err in imposing a sentence within the statutory parameters. The sentence was affirmed. St. v. Harper, 2006 MT 259, 334 M 138, 144 P3d 826 (2006), followed in St. v. Walker, 2007 MT 205, 338 M 529, 167 P3d 879 (2007), with respect to defendant's affirmative duty to show, beyond mere unsupported contentions, that alleged misinformation in a presentence investigation report was materially inaccurate and to present information establishing inaccuracies in the presentence investigation report.

Punishment for Defendant's Refusal to Accept Responsibility or Show Remorse Not Considered Legal Sentence: Although steadfastly maintaining innocence, Cesnik was convicted of assaulting a fellow gun club member with a weapon. The sentencing court was dismayed at Cesnik's refusal to acknowledge the verdict and placed considerable weight on the fact that Cesnik refused to accept responsibility for the crime despite having been convicted. The court spent the bulk of the sentencing hearing commenting on the need to impose a sentence that would instill a sense of responsibility in Cesnik and then sentenced Cesnik to 10 years with 6 years suspended. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, holding that a sentencing court may not punish a defendant for failing to accept responsibility for a crime when the defendant has expressly maintained innocence and has a right to appeal the conviction. St. v. Cesnik, 2005 MT 257, 329 M 63, 122 P3d 456 (2005), followed in St. v. Rennaker, 2007 MT 10, 335 M 274, 150 P3d 960 (2007). See also St. v. Garcia, 2011 MT 130, 360 Mont. 537, 254 P.3d 589.

Imposition of Restitution Only Upon Deferral or Suspension of Sentence Under 2001 Version of Statute: In addition to Honey's sentences for felony theft, the District Court also ordered Honey to pay restitution and ordered forfeiture of Honey's bond as partial payment of restitution. Honey contended that under the 2001 version of this section in effect at the time that the crimes were committed, the court exceeded its statutory authority by imposing restitution because the statute allowed imposition of a restitution obligation only if all or part of the sentence was deferred or suspended. The Supreme Court agreed. In the absence of a deferral or suspension of all or part of Honey's sentence, it was improper for the District Court to impose restitution on top of Honey's prison term. Because the restitution order was reversed, the order of forfeiture of Honey's bail for restitution was also reversed. St. v. Honey, 2005 MT 107, 327 M 49, 112 P3d 983 (2005).

Claim of Illegal Sentence Based on Lack of Jurisdiction to Be Raised on Direct Appeal, Not Postconviction Petition — Pena Applied: Camarillo was a minor when he was convicted in 1999 of deliberate homicide, robbery, and aggravated burglary and sentenced as an adult offender to 70 years in the state prison. The case was filed directly in District Court rather than Youth Court, as allowed under 41-5-206. Camarillo filed a petition for postconviction relief in 2003, claiming that the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction. The state responded that the claims could have been raised on direct appeal, and the District Court agreed and dismissed the petition. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that the District Court properly exercised jurisdiction under Art. VII, sec. 4, Mont. Const., so Camarillo's jurisdiction argument failed. The court then applied Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004), and held that the issues that Camarillo attempted to raise in the petition for postconviction relief could have been but were not raised on direct appeal and, pursuant to 46-21-105, could not be brought in the petition for postconviction relief. In addition, under 46-21-102, petitions for postconviction relief must be filed within 1 year of final judgment. Camarillo's petition was not filed until more than 3 years after judgment and thus was untimely. The District Court was affirmed. Camarillo v. St., 2005 MT 29, 326 M 35, 107 P3d 1265 (2005).

No Standing to Raise Constitutionality of Restitution Statutes Absent Showing of Direct Personal Injury: The 2003 Legislature amended the state restitution statutes, and Thaut sought to challenge the constitutionality of the amendments on numerous grounds. However, Thaut was unable to show a direct personal injury resulting from application of the restitution laws. Pursuant to St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298 (1990), and Helena Parents Comm'n v. Lewis & Clark County Comm'rs, 277 M 367, 922 P2d 1140 (1996), Thaut lacked standing to challenge the constitutionality of the restitution statutes, and the Supreme Court declined to address the issue. St. v. Thaut, 2004 MT 359, 324 M 460, 103 P3d 1012 (2004). See also St. v. Ellis, 2007 MT 210, 339 M 14, 167 P3d 896 (2007), in which defendant established direct economic injury and thus standing to challenge the constitutionality of repayment conditions on equal protection grounds through the District Court's order to repay $2,398 in costs of appointed counsel.

Restitution Order Proper Given Defendant's Ability to Pay: The sentencing court ordered Thaut to pay $69,457 in restitution. Thaut appealed the award on grounds that the court failed to meet statutory requirements establishing Thaut's financial resources and future ability to pay and on grounds that due process rights were violated when the court failed to consider several factors in Thaut's ability to pay, including Thaut's age and short time to work following parole, minimum wage employment history, lack of assets and ability to acquire assets in the future, and mental health issues related to an alleged prior head injury. However, the presentence investigation and supplemental presentence investigation provided adequate documentation regarding Thaut's ability to pay restitution and to work hard to earn a living. Further, Thaut had no documented physical limitations and was unemployed only because he was incarcerated. The District Court's determination that Thaut had the ability to pay medical expenses, a grant from the Board of Crime Control, and property damages was amply supported by the record, and the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Thaut, 2004 MT 359, 324 M 460, 103 P3d 1012 (2004).

Right to Appeal Error in Length of Sentence Lost by Failing to File Petition Within Statutory Time Limit: Pena, who was 17 years of age at the time, was sentenced as an adult to 45 years in prison for deliberate homicide and aggravated burglary. Pena did not challenge the legality of his sentence on direct appeal, but more than a year after entering a guilty plea and being sentenced, Pena filed a petition alleging that his sentence was illegal because the Montana Youth Court Act provided that a youth could not be sentenced to the custody of the Department of Corrections for more than 5 years and therefore the District Court did not have subject matter jurisdiction to impose a longer sentence. Pena argued that the lack of subject matter jurisdiction was not subject to any statutory postconviction time limits for filing appeals and could be raised at any time. The Supreme Court held that an error in sentencing does not divest a court of subject matter jurisdiction over the case before it. The Supreme Court further held that all postconviction claims, both jurisdictional and nonjurisdictional, must be brought within the 1-year time limit provided by statute and that the time limit was jurisdictional and was not waived by the state's failure to raise the issue in District Court. Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004). Pena was overruled in Davis v. St., 2008 MT 226, 344 M 300, 187 P3d 654 (2008), to the extent that Pena held that the Legislature limited District Courts' subject matter jurisdiction by codifying a 1-year time bar on postconviction relief pursuant to 46-21-102.

Increased Sentence Imposed on Resentencing After Original Sentence Vacated Not Due Process Violation: After Redfern's petition for postconviction relief was granted, Redfern's original sentence was vacated and the District Court resentenced him to a greater period of potential imprisonment and supervision than the original sentence. Redfern appealed the new sentence, contending that the greater sentence on resentencing violated the right to due process. The Supreme Court affirmed. Under N.C. v. Pearce 395 US 711 (1969), neither double jeopardy nor equal protection bars imposition of a more severe sentence upon resentencing after an original conviction is set aside unless a heavier sentence is imposed to punish a defendant for successfully having the original conviction set aside. However, in order to meet due process requirements and allow full appellate review of the constitutional legitimacy of the sentence, a longer sentence on resentencing after a new trial must be based on objective information concerning identifiable conduct of the defendant after the original sentencing and reasons for the longer sentence must affirmatively appear on the record. Both conditions were met here, there was no showing that the more severe sentence was imposed as retaliatory motivation by the sentencing judge, and the new sentence was within statutory sentencing parameters. St. v. Redfern, 2004 MT 277, 323 M 225, 99 P3d 223 (2004), following St. v. Forsyth, 233 M 389, 761 P2d 363 (1988), and St. v. Hubbel, 2001 MT 31, 304 M 184, 20 P3d 111 (2001), and distinguishing St. v. Ringewold, 2001 MT 185, 306 M 229, 32 P3d 729 (2001). Redfern was followed in St. v. Bullplume, 2011 MT 40, 359 Mont. 289 251 P.3d 114.

Failure to Raise Question of District Court's Sentencing Authority on Direct Appeal — Issue Precluded in Postconviction Hearing: In a petition for postconviction relief, Thurston alleged that the District Court erred by imposing a prison sentence without considering the statutory nonviolent offender criteria. The claim was denied by the District Court on grounds that the issue should have been raised on direct appeal. The Supreme Court affirmed. Contrary to Thurston's contention, the issue was not a subject matter jurisdiction issue that could be raised at any time. The failure to consider nonviolent offender sentencing alternatives should have been raised on direct appeal, and failure to do so precluded consideration of the issue in postconviction proceedings. Thurston v. St., 2004 MT 142, 321 M 411, 91 P3d 1259 (2004), distinguishing St. v. Moorman, 279 M 330, 928 P2d 145 (1996).

Error in Sentencing to Department of Corrections — Remand Based on Partially Illegal Sentence: Upon conviction for sexual intercourse without consent, the District Court sentenced Heath to the Department of Corrections for 25 years with 5 years suspended and required Heath to complete a sex offender program and a criminal thinking course at the state prison. However, the court erred because under subsection (3)(d) of this section, commitment to the Department requires that all but the first 5 years of the sentence be suspended. The Supreme Court generally remands for resentencing if the illegal portion of a sentence affects the entire sentence or if the court is unable to discern what sentence the trial court would have imposed if it had correctly applied the law. Heath asserted that resentencing could impermissibly expose him to an increased sentence if the trial court was vindictive because Heath successfully attacked the conviction. Nevertheless, the illegal unsuspended portion of Heath's sentence affected the entire sentence, so the case was remanded with instructions that the sentencing court avoid vindictiveness in imposing a new sentence. St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 58, 320 M 211, 89 P3d 947 (2004). On remand, the District Court sentenced Heath to prison for 25 years with 15 years suspended. Citing St. v. Tracy, 2005 MT 128, 327 M 220, 113 P3d 297 (2005), Heath appealed on grounds that commitment to prison instead of to the Department of Corrections was harsher than the original sentence, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Despite the more flexible nature of a commitment to the Department of Corrections, Heath could not seriously argue that he received a harsher sentence on remand because the sentence was changed to run concurrently rather than consecutively, actually reducing the sentence by 12 years. St. v. Heath, 2005 MT 280, 329 M 226, 123 P3d 228 (2005), followed in St. v. Lambert, 2010 MT 287, 359 Mont. 8, 248 P.3d 295.

Consideration at Sentencing of Alleged Crimes Dismissed by Plea Bargain Not Violative of Due Process: At sentencing, the District Court considered allegations of other crimes for which Mason had been initially charged but that had been dismissed by plea agreement. Mason contended that consideration of statements related to unproved conduct violated the right to due process. The Supreme Court noted that due process protects a defendant from being sentenced based on misinformation and requires that a defendant be given an opportunity to rebut any information that may lead to deprivation of life, liberty, or property, but does not protect against all misinformation unless the sentence is premised on materially false misinformation. The court also noted that St. v. Collier, 277 M 46, 919 P2d 376 (1996), allows a sentencing court to consider any evidence that has probative force, including other acts that have been dismissed by plea agreement, as in St. v. Baldwin, 192 M 521, 629 P2d 222 (1981). Nothing in Mason's plea agreement prevented the state from presenting the facts of the case during the sentencing hearing, and in fact, that inquiry is required as part of the presentence investigation report under 46-18-112. Mason failed to show that the sentencing court relied on misinformation and thus was not entitled to resentencing on due process grounds. Further, the plea agreement required relinquishment of Mason's parental rights, so the sentencing court properly considered evidence of the danger Mason posed to the other children in order to approve that portion of the agreement. St. v. Mason, 2003 MT 371, 319 M 117, 82 P3d 903 (2003), followed in St. v. Ferguson, 2005 MT 343, 330 M 103, 126 P3d 463 (2005).

Presumption of Punishment for Going to Trial Based on Difference Between Pretrial Offer and Actual Sentence — Remand: As set out in St. v. Baldwin, 192 M 521, 629 P2d 222 (1981), when a District Court becomes involved in plea negotiations and an offer is made, any difference in the sentencing after trial must point out the factors justifying an increased sentence, and failure to enumerate the factors leads to the presumption that a greater sentence has been imposed for a vindictive purpose. Here, when the District Court failed to justify having an 11-year sentence run consecutively rather than concurrently with another sentence, the Baldwin standard requiring an explanation for imposing a harsher sentence than that offered in plea negotiations was not met, constituting reversible error. The case was remanded for resentencing. St. v. Hall, 2003 MT 253, 317 M 356, 77 P3d 239 (2003).

Error in Failing to Consider Street Time Credit at Time Sentence Revoked — Remand for Resentencing: Pursuant to the 1997 version of this section in effect at the time of Williams' sentencing, District Courts were required to either allow or reject street time, meaning time spent serving a suspended sentence, as credit against a term of incarceration imposed as a result of the revocation of an individual's sentence. Thus, the District Court erred by not considering and awarding or denying street time credit to Williams at the time that his suspended sentence was revoked. The only remaining question was whether the case should be remanded for resentencing or whether the remaining days that Williams had not already served on probation or in prison should be excused. The District Court's error resulted in the imposition of a revoked suspended sentence that was not reduced to account for some or all of the time already served.

The error affected the entire sentence, and there was no discreet portion that could be identified or stricken. Because the Supreme Court was unable to surmise what the District Court would have done if it had followed the statutory directive, the case was remanded for resentencing. St. v. Williams, 2003 MT 136, 316 M 140, 69 P3d 222 (2003). See also Speldrich v. McCormick, 243 M 238, 794 P2d 339 (1990), and St. v. Brister, 2002 MT 13, 308 M 154, 41 P3d 314 (2002).

Adequate Nexus Between Alcohol Consumption and Sexual Assault to Warrant Substance Monitoring as Sentencing Condition for Sex Crime: As a condition of probation for Flanagan's 10-year suspended sentence for felony sexual assault, the District Court required that Flanagan: (1) submit to alcohol and drug testing at the probation officer's request; (2) undergo a chemical dependency evaluation and, if recommended, chemical dependency treatment; and (3) not possess alcohol or drugs or frequent places where alcohol is the main item of sale. Citing St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), Flanagan protested the conditions on grounds that they had no nexus to the offense or the environment in which it was committed. The Supreme Court distinguished Ommundson, noting that Flanagan himself connected the assault charge to his alcohol consumption in requesting a mental evaluation to determine whether his substance use rendered him capable of acting knowingly. There was a sufficient connection between the offense and Flanagan's chronic alcohol consumption to warrant imposition of the parole conditions, and the sentencing court was affirmed. St. v. Flanagan, 2003 MT 123, 316 M 1, 68 P3d 796 (2003).

Prior DUI Convictions Properly Used to Enhance Sentence: The District Court used three prior DUI convictions to sentence Jackson for felony DUI. Jackson contended that use of two of the prior convictions was improper because he waived his right to counsel in one case and because he did not have an attorney in another case. However, when a defendant collaterally attacks a prior conviction, a presumption of regularity attaches to the conviction and failure to sign a waiver of rights does not constitute reversible error but is merely a factor to be considered in the totality of the circumstances. Here, the state provided sufficient proof for the court to rely on the prior convictions in sentencing, and the court did not err in doing so. St. v. Jackson, 2002 MT 212, 311 M 281, 54 P3d 990 (2002).

No Abuse of Discretion in Imposing Sentence Greater Than Sentence Suggested in Plea Agreement — Sentence Adequately Explained: Wells was charged with DUI, negligent vehicular assault, operation of a motor vehicle without insurance, and driving with a revoked license. Wells entered a plea agreement in which he pleaded guilty to negligent vehicular assault and driving with a revoked license and agreed to pay restitution, and the prosecution agreed to recommend a 5-year sentence with all but 18 months suspended. At the sentencing hearing, Wells' probation officer disagreed with the recommended sentence, stating that 18 months was an insufficient time for Wells to deal with his alcohol and drug problems and that restitution was unlikely given Wells' work and drug abuse history. The sentencing court considered the testimony and the evidence and imposed a 5-year sentence without any time suspended. Wells appealed on grounds that the sentence was not adequately explained and was erroneous. Under St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298 (1980), the sentencing court has the discretion to impose the maximum sentence allowed by law but should provide any rationale for the sentence. Here, the court provided a rationale, explaining the nature of the offense and the degree of harm done by Wells and describing Wells' history of drug abuse and inability to pay restitution as well as a concern for future harm to society. Wells was informed that the judge was not bound by the terms of the plea agreement and retained the authority to impose a greater or lesser sentence than recommended, within the statutory limits for the offense. The sentence was adequately explained and within statutory limits and was thus affirmed. St. v. Wells, 2001 MT 112, 305 M 303, 27 P3d 47 (2001).

Suspending Less of Sentence After Retrial Than After First Trial — Court's Belief Time Needed to Complete Ordered Programs: If a judge imposes a more severe sentence upon a defendant after a new trial than that imposed in the former trial, the reasons for doing so must appear in the record and be based on objective information concerning identifiable conduct of defendant occurring after the time of the original sentencing. Otherwise, there is a presumption that the greater sentence was for a vindictive purpose, and the presumption must be rebutted. It was constitutionally legitimate for the court to reduce, after a second trial resulting in the same incarceration term, the amount of time that the sentence was suspended after the first trial. The court believed that defendant needed the time to complete rehabilitative programs that the court ordered him to complete in each sentence and suspended less time to ensure that there was sufficient time to complete the programs. St. v. Hubbel, 2001 MT 31, 304 M 184, 20 P3d 111 (2001).

Four-Year Mandatory Minimum Sentence for Sexual Intercourse With Minor Properly Applied: By plea agreement, Fauque pleaded guilty to one count of sexual intercourse without consent and one count of sexual assault against his 14-year-old daughter. The District Court concluded that the 4-year minimum sentence provided in 45-5-503 applied and that Fauque had failed to establish entitlement to any exceptions to the mandatory minimum sentence provided in 46-18-222. The court sentenced Fauque to 25 years on each count, with all but 4 years suspended and the sentences to run concurrently. Fauque appealed on grounds that a direct conflict existed between the mandatory minimum sentence for sexual intercourse without consent when the victim is less than 16 and the defendant is 3 or more years older contained in 45-5-503 and the 30-day mandatory minimum sentence for sexual intercourse without consent when the victim is less than 16 contained in this section (see 1999 amendment and enactment of 46-18-205). The Supreme Court examined the legislative intent of both sentencing provisions and found no conflict in this case. The 4-year mandatory minimum provided in 45-5-503 clearly applied to Fauque, who was 53 years old at the time that he assaulted his 14-year-old daughter and who did not argue any sentencing exception under 46-18-222. The mandatory minimum (now contained in 46-18-205) in this section simply disallowed suspension of the first 30 days of a sentence under 45-5-503 under any circumstances, even if an exception existed under 46-18-222. Because no exception existed here, this section did not come into play, so the Supreme Court affirmed Fauque's 4-year mandatory minimum sentence pursuant to 45-5-503. St. v. Fauque, 2000 MT 168, 300 M 307, 4 P3d 651, 57 St. Rep. 693 (2000).

Retroactive Applicability of Judicial Rule Regarding Oral Pronouncement of Sentence: Retroactivity is a threshold matter that compels the evenhanded application of a new rule for the conduct of criminal prosecutions to all similarly situated cases that are pending on direct appeal or not yet final. Therefore, all defendants whose cases meet those criteria are entitled to the retroactive application of a new judicial rule of criminal procedure. This standard applies irrespective of whether the new judicial rule constitutes a clear break from existing precedent and without regard to whether the rule was available to the District Court at the time that it ruled. Thus in the present case, the rule in St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), that oral pronouncement of sentence controls over the written sentence for purposes of finality applied retroactively to Waters' appeal, even though the District Court did not have the Lane rule at the time of sentencing. St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999), following St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260 (1995), and St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999), overruling St. v. Redding, 208 M 24, 675 P2d 974, 41 St. Rep. 147 (1984), Peterson v. Mont. Bank of Bozeman, N.A., 212 M 37, 687 P2d 673 (1984), and their progeny, and followed in St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361, 56 St. Rep. 1032 (1999). See also Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288, 103 L Ed 2d 334, 109 S Ct 1060 (1989).

Misdemeanor Offender Not Entitled to Consideration of Mandatory Sentencing Requirement Applicable to Nonviolent Felony Offenders: Renee was sentenced to incarceration for three misdemeanor violations. On appeal, Renee contended that because the misdemeanors were nonviolent offenses, the District Court erred in not complying with this section by considering alternatives to sentencing for Renee's nonviolent offenses. However, the plain language of 46-18-104(3) applies only to defendants who commit a particular kind of felony that is nonviolent. Therefore, a misdemeanor offender is not entitled to have a sentencing court consider the mandatory sentencing requirements of 46-18-225 and this section, which apply only to felony offenders. St. v. Renee, 1999 MT 135, 294 M 527, 983 P2d 893, 56 St. Rep. 545 (1999).

Nonviolent Felony Offenders Not Similarly Situated With Misdemeanor Offenders — No Equal Protection Violation in Different Felony and Misdemeanor Sentencing Schemes: Renee contended that Montana's nonviolent felony offender sentencing statutes violated his equal protection rights to physical liberty as a misdemeanor offender because both kinds of offenders may be subject to imprisonment, thus both felony and misdemeanor offenders are similarly situated classes dealt with unequally under the law. The Supreme Court disagreed. Relying on Tigner v. Tex., 310 US 141, 84 L Ed 1124, 60 S Ct 879 (1940), the court found that the constitution does not require that things that are different in fact or opinion be treated in law as though they were the same. Misdemeanor and felony offenders are not similarly situated because of differences in the quality and duration of punishment, as well as the long-term effects on an individual's liberty interest brought about by a felony conviction as compared to that for a misdemeanor conviction. Renee failed to make the necessary threshold showing that misdemeanor and nonviolent felony offenders are similarly situated, so the equal protection challenge failed. St. v. Renee, 1999 MT

No Error in Youth Court Conclusion That Incarceration Not Mandatory if Youth Convicted in District Court: In its transfer order, the Youth Court concluded that transferring Spina into the adult system neither mandated incarceration nor precluded rehabilitation and that although any commitment of the youth must necessarily be to the Department of Corrections, the Department was not necessarily bound to incarcerate Spina. The Supreme Court agreed. The sentencing guidelines in this section provide a District Court with a number of sentencing options, including imposition of a deferred or suspended sentence. The Youth Court was correct in concluding that Spina's conviction would not mandate incarceration. St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421, 56 St. Rep. 467 (1999).

Payment of Justice's Court Cost Imposed as Judgment of District Court Held Improper — Smith Reaffirmed: Morales was charged with assaulting a sports official, in violation of 45-5-211, after striking a basketball referee. Upon his conviction in Justice's Court, Morales appealed to District Court. Upon his conviction, the District Court ordered Morales to pay the costs of the trial in Justice's Court. The Supreme Court reaffirmed its holding in Billings v. Smith, 281 M 133, 932 P2d 1058 (1997), and held that a trial de novo in District Court has the effect of erasing any debt for costs in Justice's Court incurred before the appeal to District Court. St. v. Morales, 284 M 238, 943 P2d 1286, 54 St. Rep. 862 (1997), followed in St. v. Bustle, 2010 MT 68, 355 Mont. 487, 228 P.3d 1150.

Recommendation of Prosecutor and Probation Officer Adequate Statement of Sentencing Reason — No Improper Reliance on Pending Charge in Sentencing: The District Court's statements both orally and in its written sentence that Goulet's sentence was imposed at the recommendation of the prosecutor and the probation officer, plus the court's consideration of Goulet's prior record and long history of contact with the legal system, were sufficient statements of sentencing reasons to comply with St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298 (1980). Further, in the present case, nothing in the record indicated that the sentencing court improperly relied on a pending deliberate homicide charge against Goulet in sentencing him for escape. St. v. Goulet, 277 M 308, 921 P2d 1245, 53 St. Rep. 739 (1996), following St. v. Johnson, 221 M 503, 719 P2d 1248 (1986), St. v. Petroff, 232 M 20, 757 P2d 759 (1988), and St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298 (1990).

Sexual Abuse — Failure of District Court to Consider Sentencing Alternatives — No Objection — Sentence Not Illegal or Violation of Due Process: Swoboda pleaded guilty to sexual abuse of children, was classified as a nondangerous offender, and was sentenced to 15 years with the Department of Corrections. On appeal, she claimed as error the District Court's failure to consider alternatives to incarceration. The Supreme Court noted that she had not objected at sentencing to the District Court's failure and declined to review the judgment. The Supreme Court noted that in the past, it had made an exception and reviewed such a failure of the District Court when the state conceded the failure of the District Court or when the sentence was illegal. Here, however, the Supreme Court noted that the sentence was not beyond the District Court's jurisdiction. Citing St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep. 310 (1996), the Supreme Court also held that the failure of the District Court was not a manifest miscarriage of justice and would not leave unsettled the question of the fundamental fairness of the trial or the proceedings. St. v. Swoboda, 276 M 479, 918 P2d 296, 53 St. Rep. 478 (1996).

Judgment as Including Sentence — Sentence Not Strictly Premised on Punishment: A defendant had 60 days under former Rule 5(b), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), to appeal a final judgment. Although prior to the 1991 enactment of 46-1-202, "sentence" was interpreted as being the same as "punishment", 46-1-202 now defines a sentence as any judicial disposition of a criminal proceeding upon a plea, verdict, or finding of guilt. The judicial disposition is itself a sentence regardless of whether actual punishment is deferred or imposed immediately. This broader definition applies to deferment cases, but in double jeopardy cases, the narrower meaning premised on the punishment factor still applies. Therefore, a judgment that includes a deferred sentence is final for purposes of appeal, and an appeal filed more than 60 days after sentencing was dismissed as untimely. St. v. Rice, 275 M 81, 910 P2d 245, 53 St. Rep. 48 (1996), followed in Davis v. St., 2004 MT 112, 321 M 118, 88 P3d 1285 (2004).

Sentence of Imprisonment of Dangerous Offender — No Need to Consider Alternatives: After a conviction for kidnapping and assault, when the District Court clearly articulated numerous reasons for designating the defendant as a dangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) and its reasons were fully supported by the record, the court's reasons for designating the defendant a dangerous offender are sufficient to rule out alternatives to imprisonment. By its findings, the court, as a practical matter, satisfied the requirements of statutory criteria for sentencing. St. v. Eichenlaub, 272 M 332, 901 P2d 90, 52 St. Rep. 786 (1995).

Twenty-Five Year Sentence for Bank Robbery Not Improper: The Supreme Court upheld the lower court's sentencing of the defendant to 25 years for bank robbery on the basis that the lower court's sentence was within the statutory guidelines and therefore did not violate the constitution. St. v. Hembd, 254 M 407, 838 P2d 412, 49 St. Rep. 788 (1992).

Misinterpretation of Criminal Record Contained in Presentence Investigation Report — Conclusions Proper — Resentencing Inappropriate: The District Court misinterpreted defendant's criminal record as contained in the presentence investigation report, counting as a new felony the revocation of an earlier offense previously counted and counting criminal endangerment and criminal possession of dangerous drugs offenses as one felony instead of two. The court therefore arrived at the right conclusion as to the number of offenses even though it used the wrong means. This did not constitute an error that mandated resentencing. St. v. Willson, 250 M 241, 818 P2d 1199, 48 St. Rep. 907 (1991).

Sufficient Statement of Reasons for Sentence — Consistency With Presentence Report: It was a sufficient statement of reasons in sentencing for the District Court to cite defendant's entire and extensive criminal record and his threat to society, especially when the sentence was consistent with the presentence investigation report that recommended a lengthy sentence. St. v. Willson, 250 M 241, 818 P2d 1199, 48 St. Rep. 907 (1991).

Failure of Sentencing Court to Consider Time Served — Remand — Writ of Habeas Corpus Denied: Petitioner was sentenced to 5 years in the state prison for aggravated assault, with all 5 years suspended upon certain conditions. He served 4½ years of the suspended sentence before violating probation. After an appropriate petition, the District Court revoked the suspended sentence and sentenced petitioner to 5 years in the state prison, with 2 years suspended upon certain conditions. Petitioner sought a writ of habeas corpus seeking restoration of his good time but not appealing his sentence or conviction. After review, the Supreme Court held that the District Court had jurisdiction to revoke the suspended sentence and impose the original sentence but remanded for compliance with 46-18-201, requiring the District Court to consider elapsed time and state its reasons for either expressly allowing or rejecting elapsed time as credit against the sentence. The petition for writ of habeas corpus was denied for failure to set forth any basis for granting the writ. Speldrich v. McCormick, 243 M 238, 794 P2d 339, 47 St. Rep. 1186 (1990), followed in St. v. Docken, 274 M 296, 908 P2d 213, 52 St. Rep. 1240 (1995).

Failure to Appear for Probation Officer-Ordered Urine Sample — Minimal Grounds Required to Order Testing: It was error for the District Court to dismiss a petition for revocation of suspended sentence based on the defendant's failure to appear for purposes of providing a urine sample because the probation officer did not have some articulable reasons for requesting the test. Under the standard established in St. v. Burke, 235 M 165, 766 P2d 254, 45 St. Rep. 2278 (1988), the Supreme Court held that a probation officer's opinion that rehabilitation could not begin until the defendant was free of drugs and the fact that the defendant had not passed a drug test since his arrest constituted sufficient evidence to establish reasonable grounds for requiring a urine sample. St. v. Sigler, 236 M 137, 769 P2d 703, 46 St. Rep. 244 (1989).

Different Sentencing Judge — No Presumption of Vindictiveness When Sentence Increased on Remand: Due process rights on resentencing create a presumption of vindictiveness when a sentence is increased on remand. However, when a different judge performs resentencing, there is no presumption of vindictiveness; rather, the defense must show actual vindictiveness. St. v. Forsyth, 233 M 389, 761 P2d 363, 45 St. Rep. 1577 (1988).

Rules of Evidence Inapplicable to Sentencing: Defendant contended that the court erred in adding 10 years to his sentence for being a persistent felony offender because the court relied on evidence improperly before it. The Supreme Court affirmed the sentence because the rules of evidence do not apply to sentencing and because the evidence was competent. St. v. Smith, 232 M 156, 755 P2d 569, 45 St. Rep. 955 (1988). See also St. v. Passwater, 2015 MT 159, 379 Mont. 372, 351 P.3d 382, holding that the rules of evidence do not apply to an award of restitution as a part of sentencing.

Supreme Court Review of Sentence — Legality Only: Defendant requested the Supreme Court remand for resentencing on the grounds that the District Court erred in believing a mandatory minimum sentence applied to the crime of attempt. The Supreme Court found no evidence of ineffective assistance of counsel or prejudice in sentencing. The Supreme Court will review sentences for legality only. Because the sentence was well within the legal limits, the request for remand was refused. St. v. Hurlbert, 232 M 115, 756 P2d 1110, 45 St. Rep. 923 (1988), followed in St. v. Cope, 250 M 387, 819 P2d 1280, 48 St. Rep. 949 (1991), St. v. Graves, 272 M 451, 901 P2d 549, 52 St. Rep. 755 (1995), St. v. Romannose, 279 M 58, 931 P2d 1394, 54 St. Rep. 72 (1997), and St. v. Gordon, 1999 MT 169, 295 M 183, 983 P2d 377, 56 St. Rep. 654 (1999).

Claim of Reliance on Incorrect Information in Sentencing — Sentencing Court Presumed Correct: Defendant contended the District Court wrongly assumed he had two prior probation violations and relied on this incorrect information in sentencing. Although a defendant has a right to a sentence based on substantially correct information, the Supreme Court will not strain at worst-case assumptions to find a mistake on review. Rather than finding two previous probation violations, the District Court correctly recognized defendant's two prior chances to avoid a more severe penalty. The sentencing court was presumed correct and judgment affirmed. St. v. Petroff, 232 M 20, 757 P2d 759, 45 St. Rep. 833 (1988).

Judgment Containing Reasons for Sentence Sufficient — Oral and Written Reasoning Not Required: The rationale set out in St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298 (1980), acknowledging a defendant's right to be informed of the reasons underlying punishment, does not impose a duty on a District Court to set forth its reasoning orally in open court and in writing. It was sufficient when the reasons underlying a sentence were clearly stated in the judgment. St. v. Petroff, 232 M 20, 757 P2d 759, 45 St. Rep. 833 (1988).

Use of Dismissed Charge in Sentencing: The District Court, during sentencing, improperly relied on a prior conviction that had been dismissed following defendant's successful completion of a deferred sentence. However, given defendant's course of criminal conduct, his criminal history, and his continuing disregard for the rights and safety of others, the error was harmless. St. v. Wirtala, 231 M 264, 752 P2d 177, 45 St. Rep. 596 (1988).

Disparity in Codefendants' Sentences — One by Trial, One by Plea Bargain: That defendant, after a trial, was sentenced to 35 years and a codefendant, after plea bargaining, was sentenced to 8 years does not, standing alone, establish that defendant was punished for exercising his right to a jury trial. The judge outlined his reasons for sentencing, which was well within the maximum authorized; the reasons support the severity of the sentence given, and there was no abuse of discretion. Therefore, the defendant was not denied his right to trial. St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980).

Failure to Include Reasons for Sentence — Abuse of Discretion: Failure of trial court to specify the reasons behind the determination of the defendant's sentence is an abuse of discretion. It is not enough that the sentence be within the statutory maximum. The defendant is entitled to know why the sentencing judge chose the particular sentence involved. St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298 (1980), cited in St. v. Johnson, 221 M 503, 719 P2d 1248, 43 St. Rep. 1010 (1986).

Sentencing Guidelines: A criminal statute need not contain sentencing guidelines. St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298 (1980).

Appellate Review of Sentence — No Objection Necessary: The Supreme Court generally will not review an issue where there was no objection at trial. However, the court will review a sentence imposed in a criminal case if it is alleged that the sentence is illegal or exceeds statutory mandates, even if no objection is made at the time of sentencing. St. v. Lenihan, 184 M 338, 602 P2d 997 (1979), contrasted in St. v. Swoboda, 276 M 479, 918 P2d 296, 53 St. Rep. 478 (1996), and followed in St. v. Brewer, 1999 MT 269, 296 M 453, 989 P2d 407, 56 St. Rep. 1090 (1999), St. v. Brister, 2002 MT 13, 308 M 154, 41 P3d 314 (2002), St. v. Honey, 2005 MT 107, 327 M 49, 112 P3d 983 (2005), St. v. Hameline, 2008 MT 241, 344 M 461, 188 P3d 1052 (2008), St. v. Heddings, 2008 MT 402, 347 M 169, 198 P3d 242 (2008), St. v. Haldane, 2013 MT 32, 368 Mont. 396, 300 P.3d 657, St. v. Winter, 2014 MT 235, 376 Mont. 284, 333 P.3d 222, and Kalispell v. Salsgiver, 2019 MT 126, 396 Mont. 57, 443 P.3d 504.

Guilty Plea — Refusal to Allow Withdrawal — Discretion: It was not an error or an abuse of court's discretion to not allow defendant to withdraw his guilty plea after serving 2 months of a 20-year sentence because the judge has complete discretion to deny a change of plea. St. v. Sattler, 170 M 35, 549 P2d 1080 (1976).

Postconviction Relief: Time spent in jail under a suspended sentence must be credited to sentence for violation of probation. In re Hanson, 169 M 80, 544 P2d 816 (1976).

DEFERRAL

Failure to Cite Alternative Sentencing Authority Statute While Arguing for Deferred Sentence — Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: The defendant's attorney recommended the defendant receive a deferral of her sentence after her conviction for criminal possession of dangerous drugs, arguing that the "may not be deferred" language in 46-18-201 was discretionary rather than mandatory, which was clearly incorrect. Because the defendant's counsel cited only 46-18-201, the defendant had no real opportunity to receive a deferred sentence despite the allowance of alternatives provided under the alternative sentencing authority statute in 45-9-202. Because an alternative deferred sentence was not precluded for a defendant with a felony that had occurred over 24 years prior and was not drug-related, and because there was a reasonable probability the District Court would have deferred imposition of sentence if it had been made aware of alternative sentencing options, the defendant received ineffective assistance of counsel at sentencing by her attorney. Thus, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded the case for resentencing. St. v. Wright, 2021 MT 239, 405 Mont. 383, 495 P.3d 435.

Imposition of Jail Term as Condition of Deferred Sentence Not Improper: A defendant was found guilty of criminal possession of drug paraphernalia, and the Justice Court deferred the imposition of the sentence for 6 months on the conditions that the defendant pay specified fines and charges, complete community service, and serve 10 days in the county jail or work for 5 days on the county labor detail program in lieu of the fines and jail time. The defendant appealed to the District Court, asserting that the jail-time condition was inconsistent with the provision in 45-10-103 providing that a first-time offender is presumed to be “entitled to a deferred imposition of sentence of imprisonment”. On initial appeal, the District Court affirmed the Justice Court, and the defendant appealed again. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court, finding that because the imposition of incarceration in a detention center not exceeding 180 days is expressly authorized as a condition of a deferred sentence in 46-18-201, the jail-time provision was a facially legal condition of the sentence. St. v. Thibeault, 2021 MT 162, 404 Mont. 476, 490 P.3d 105.

Definition of Felony Based on Maximum Potential Sentence — Nondeferral of Sentence for Second Felony Offense Proper: The defendant was charged with felony criminal possession. The District Court concluded that, under this section, it did not have the discretion to defer the defendant’s sentence because she had previously been convicted of a felony in Arizona and therefore was not a first-time offender. The defendant appealed, and the Supreme Court examined whether the Arizona conviction constituted a prior felony. The court ruled that a prior felony conviction under this section is a conviction of an offense, in any jurisdiction, that has a maximum potential sentence of death or imprisonment exceeding 1 year. Because the maximum sentence for the felony conviction in Arizona exceeded 1 year, the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Nelson, 2019 MT 62, 395 Mont. 134, 437 P.3d 127.

No Good Faith Efforts to Pay Restitution — Deferred Sentence Revoked and New Sentence Imposed: The defendant was convicted of felony theft for defrauding the elderly, given a deferred sentence, and ordered to pay restitution. After the defendant paid only a small portion of the restitution order over 6 years, the state filed a petition to revoke his deferred sentence for failing to make good faith efforts to pay restitution. Following a hearing, the District Court found that the defendant had not made good faith efforts to pay restitution, revoked his deferred sentence, and imposed a new deferred sentence that required him to make monthly income and expense reports. The defendant appealed, claiming that he had made good faith efforts to pay restitution but simply could not afford to. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that substantial evidence supported the District Court’s finding that the defendant had not made a reasonable effort to pay restitution. St. v. Johnson, 2018 MT 277, 393 Mont. 320, 430 P.3d 494.

Defendant Properly Deemed Ineligible for Deferred Sentence — “Threat” Not Synonymous With “Risk”: The defendant entered into a plea agreement under which he would receive a deferred sentence on his felony criminal endangerment charge. Afterward, the prosecutor learned that the defendant had been previously convicted of a felony and was therefore not eligible for a deferred sentence under 46-18-201. The defendant argued that he was eligible under an exception to 46-18-222 because the term “threat” in 46-18-222 means the same as “risk” in the criminal endangerment section, 46-5-207. The District Court disagreed and imposed a suspended sentence. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, agreeing with the District Court that the terms are not synonymous and that the defendant was not eligible for a deferred sentence. St. v. Cleveland, 2014 MT 305, 377 Mont. 97, 338 P.3d 606.

Terms of Plea Agreement Illegal — Defendant Not Entitled to Specific Performance of Plea Agreement: The defendant entered into a plea agreement under which he would receive a deferred sentence. Later, however, it was learned that he did not qualify for a deferred sentence and the District Court instead imposed a suspended sentence. On appeal, the Supreme Court concluded that the terms of the plea agreement were illegal and unenforceable and the defendant was therefore not entitled to specific performance of the agreement. St. v. Cleveland, 2014 MT 305, 377 Mont. 97, 338 P.3d 606.

Portion of Sentence Imposed Beyond Sentencing Authority Illegal — Timely Petition to Revoke: The District Court sentenced DeShields to 4 years for sexual assault and deferred imposition of the sentence for 4 years subject to certain terms and conditions. The state twice petitioned to revoke DeShields' sentence for violation of the deferred sentence. Both petitions were filed within the 4-year period of deferral. DeShields filed for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court held that the initial 4-year sentence was illegally imposed because the maximum time that the sentence could be deferred was 3 years, but DeShields' argument that the entire sentence was void was mistaken. The mere fact that the District Court exceeded its statutory authority in imposing an improper deferred sentence did not render the sentence void ab initio. Only the portion of the sentence beyond the court's authority was illegal. Additionally, the state filed its petitions within the allowable 3-year deferral period, so DeShields' deferred sentence was properly revoked. DeShields v. St., 2006 MT 58, 331 M 329, 132 P3d 540 (2006).

Authority to Defer Imposition of Sentence When Financial Condition Imposed — Failure to File Timely Appeal: Ingersoll filed for postconviction relief, arguing that the District Court lacked statutory authority to either impose consecutive deferred sentences or to defer imposition of his sentence in excess of 3 years. The Supreme Court found that the District Court had statutory authority at the time of sentencing under this section to impose a deferred sentence for up to 6 years for Ingersoll's felony conviction for criminal mischief. Therefore, pursuant to former Rule 5(b), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), Ingersoll had 60 days after sentencing to appeal the court's authority to impose the sentence. Failure to file a timely appeal rendered Ingersoll's claim procedurally barred in a postconviction hearing. Ingersoll v. St., 1999 MT 215, 295 M 520, 986 P2d 403, 56 St. Rep. 843 (1999).

Limitation on Deferral of Sentence — Constitutionality: The provision of this section prohibiting a defendant from receiving a referred sentence if he has been convicted of a prior felony is not unconstitutional under the due process clause. Defendant who had received a deferred sentence in 1973 and had not attempted to have that conviction dismissed or expunged was not entitled to a deferred sentence after a 1988 conviction. Defendant's argument regarding constitutionality is moot because the 1987 amendment to 46-18-204 was repealed in 1989. St. v. Lorash, 238 M 345, 777 P2d 884, 46 St. Rep. 1321 (1989), distinguished in St. v. Bowles, 284 M 490, 947 P2d 52, 54 St. Rep. 962 (1997), as to the requirement for a motion for expungement.

Deferral or Suspension of Entire Sentence Proper: Defendant was sentenced to 5 years in prison, with all but 2 years suspended by a judge who mistakenly believed that suspension or deferral of the entire sentence was prohibited by this section. The Supreme Court vacated the sentence and remanded the case for resentencing, ruling the District Court's belief that the charge required imprisonment was prejudicial to defendant. St. v. Arbgast, 202 M 220, 656 P2d 828, 40 St. Rep. 45 (1983).

Deferring Sentence Imposition — Second Deferment: Contention that sentencing court had no jurisdiction to defer imposition of sentence a second time did not affect the court's power to subsequently revoke suspension of part of the sentence and was not validly raised on appeal from the revocation. The conviction and first deferment of imposition of sentence occurred on October 7, 1975. The sentence, part of which was suspended, was imposed on October 28, 1977, within the 3-year period set in October 1975, for deferment of the imposition of sentence. The court could not be held in error for ordering (at August 19, 1977, revocation hearing) deferment for an additional 3 years. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982).

Revocation of Sentence Deferred or Suspended Longer Than Allowed by Statute: Petitioner was convicted of felony theft. On May 22, 1978, he was given a 3-year deferred imposition of sentence on the condition that restitution be made. On August 20, 1979, this deferred sentence was continued and petitioner was ordered to complete restitution by November 5, 1980. This was not done, and a petition to revoke the deferred sentence was filed on January 16, 1981. A hearing on the petition was held May 27, 1981, 3 years and 5 days after the initial deferral. The court revoked the deferred sentence and sentenced petitioner to 3½ years in prison, over petitioner's objections that the District Court was without jurisdiction to do so. The District Court contended it retained jurisdiction when the petition to revoke is filed within the deferral time. On a petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus, the Supreme Court held that this section grants jurisdiction to revoke suspended sentences or impose sentences following deferral only during the period of the suspended or deferred sentences. This jurisdiction extends only through the running of the suspended or deferred sentence, regardless of whether a petition for revocation has been filed prior to the termination of the suspended or deferred sentence. Felix v. Mohler, 195 M 391, 636 P2d 830, 38 St. Rep. 1881 (1981).

On October 24, 1977, the petitioner received a deferred imposition of sentence and was placed on probation for 1 year. On August 14, 1978, the deferred imposition of sentence was extended for an additional 2 years. On April 4, 1979, the deferred imposition of sentence was again extended for 2 years. On February 2, 1981, petitioner was found guilty of a misdemeanor in Justice's

Court. Based on that conviction, the court revoked its order staying deferment of sentence and sentenced petitioner to 5 years in the state prison for the original crime. In granting his petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus, the Supreme Court said that this section gives the District Judge the authority to defer imposition of sentence for a period not to exceed 3 years. The District Court can revoke a deferred imposition of sentence only during the 3-year period immediately following the initial sentence deferral. Gonzales v. Blodgett, 193 M 504, 632 P2d 1084, 38 St. Rep. 1159 (1981).

Restrictions During — Abuse of Discretion: When the trial court deferred imposition of sentence but required the defendants to serve 1 year in the county jail with release for working hours, it abused its discretion to impose reasonable restrictions or conditions during the period of the deferred imposition. St. v. Openshaw, 172 M 511, 565 P2d 319 (1977).

Presumption for Deferral: The trial judge's belief that a 19-year-old defendant lied to him when he asked where the defendant got marijuana is not the type of aggravated circumstances necessary to overcome the presumption of a deferred sentence, as the aggravating circumstances should be supported by substantial evidence over and above the simple facts of a prima facie crime. St. v. Burris, 168 M 195, 542 P2d 1223 (1975).

Revocation — Ground Not Formal Condition: The trial court could revoke the deferred imposition of sentence after the defendant refused to testify against another defendant even though his cooperation with the State was not made a formal condition of the judgment deferring sentence. St. v. Lintz, 162 M 102, 509 P2d 13 (1973).

SUSPENSION

Entitlement to Credit for Incarceration When Charged in Multiple Counties: A man charged with crimes in multiple counties argued that his sentence on one charge should have included credit for time served prior to sentencing. The District Court noted that "someone was also holding him" during that time and entered a sentence that did not credit the man for each relevant day he was incarcerated. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that the Legislature's enactment of 46-18-201(9) eliminated sentencing courts' need to determine whether a defendant is incarcerated on a "bailable offense". The Supreme Court stated that its holding in Killam v. Salmonsens, 2021 MT 196, 405 Mont. 143, 492 P.3d 512, was controlling, and that the man is entitled to credit pursuant to 46-18-201(9) for each day he was incarcerated from the date he was served with an arrest warrant for the offense he was convicted of to the date of sentencing, regardless of whether he was also being held in connection with another matter in a different county. St. v. Mendoza, 2021 MT 197, 405 Mont. 154, 492 P.3d 509. See also St. v. Spagnolo, 2022 MT 228, 410 Mont. 457, 520 P.3d 330.

Mandate to Give Credit for Time Served Before Sentencing: A man on parole was arrested for felony criminal endangerment. Upon conviction for the new crime, the man did not receive credit for his pretrial incarceration. He filed a writ of habeas corpus. The state argued he was not held on a bailable offense because he would have been in the custody of the Department of Corrections related to his prior conviction. On appeal, the Supreme Court remanded the case to the District Court, explaining that 46-18-201(9) mandates sentencing courts to give credit for time served by the offender before sentencing, and therefore credit must be given. Killam v. Salmonsens, 2021 MT 196, 405 Mont. 143, 492 P.3d 512. See also St. v. Pitkanen, 2022 MT 231, 410 Mont. 503, 520 P.3d 305.

Illegal Portion of Sentence Affecting Entirety of Sentence — Remand for Resentencing: For sexual intercourse without consent, Hicks was sentenced to 14 years with the Department of Corrections with no time suspended, and because of the seriousness of the offense, Hicks was also ordered to complete sexual offender treatment, undergo psychiatric evaluation to determine possible mental or personality disorders, and complete a chemical dependency evaluation, a cognitive and behavioral modification program, and an anger management course. Hicks appealed the legality of the sentence because it violated sentencing statutes. The Supreme Court noted that subsection (3)(d)(i) of this section provides that when a defendant is sentenced to the Department, all but the first 5 years of the sentence must be suspended, so the unsuspended sentence was illegal. However, the court could not determine whether the sentencing court would consider a 14-year sentence with 9 years suspended adequate to complete the recommended sentence conditions. Because the illegal portion of the sentence affected the entirety of the sentence, the Supreme Court remanded for resentencing under a correct application of the sentencing statutes. St. v. Hicks, 2006 MT 71, 331 M 471, 133 P3d 206 (2006).

Revocation of Juvenile Offender's Suspended Sentence and Commitment to Department Authorized: Following a dispositional hearing, the Youth Court entered an order declaring

Lesmeister a delinquent youth and serious juvenile offender, transferred the 18 year old's case to District Court, and placed the youth on probation until age 25, with the entire commitment suspended upon certain conditions. One year later, on a petition filed by the Cascade County Attorney alleging numerous probation violations, the District Court revoked Lesmeister's suspended sentence and committed the youth to the Department of Corrections until age 25. On appeal, Lesmeister challenged the legality of the court's commitment to the Department, arguing that 41-5-208 authorizes the District Court to impose only those conditions provided for in 46-18-201 through 46-18-203, which does not include a sentence to the Department of Corrections. In affirming the District Court decision, the Supreme Court ruled that state law authorizes a District Court to impose a sentence to commit an offender to the Department of Corrections when all but the first 5 years are suspended. St. v. Lesmeister, 2000 MT 318, 302 M 500, 15 P3d 392, 57 St. Rep. 1344 (2000).

Right to Jury Trial — Not Applicable to Suspended Sentence Revocation Proceedings: Since a trial by jury under the seventh amendment to the U.S. Constitution and Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const., is guaranteed only in "criminal prosecutions", it does not apply in proceedings for revocation of a suspended sentence. St. v. Watts, 221 M 104, 717 P2d 24, 43 St. Rep. 670 (1986).

Deferral or Suspension of Entire Sentence Proper: Defendant was sentenced to 5 years in prison, with all but 2 years suspended by a judge who mistakenly believed that suspension or deferral of the entire sentence was prohibited by this section. The Supreme Court vacated the sentence and remanded the case for resentencing, ruling the District Court's belief that the charge required imprisonment was prejudicial to defendant. St. v. Arbogast, 202 M 220, 656 P2d 828, 40 St. Rep. 45 (1983).

Revocation of Suspended Sentence — No Double Jeopardy: The court rejected defendant's contention that revocation of a suspended sentence enhanced his punishment and thus subjected him to double jeopardy. Even though a defendant must live with the conditions of probation throughout the period of suspension and even though he must serve the entire sentence if the suspension is revoked, there is no double jeopardy. The prohibitions against double jeopardy do not preclude the State from filing a second petition for revocation of suspended sentence that alleges the same facts. St. v. Oppelt, 184 M 48, 601 P2d 394 (1979), followed in St. v. Johnston, 2008 MT 318, 346 M 93, 193 P3d 925 (2008). Johnston was overruled in part in St. v. Maynard, 2010 MT 115, 356 Mont. 333, 233 P.3d 331.

Purpose of Suspension: A former statute providing for the suspension of sentences in criminal actions was designed to afford first offenders an opportunity for reformation, and the court held that it should be liberally construed. State ex rel. Bottomly v. District Court, 73 M 541, 237 P 525 (1925).

Time When Sentence May Be Suspended:

The defendant was convicted of a violation of the liquor laws and sentenced to serve 60 days in jail and pay a fine. He at once perfected an appeal, secured a certificate of probable cause, and was admitted to bail. Five months thereafter his appeal was dismissed and the trial court on the day the certificate of dismissal was received suspended his sentence. The court held on an application for a Writ of Supervisory Control that since the defendant had never been committed, the trial court could properly, after entry of judgment, suspend the sentence at the time it did. State ex rel. Bottomly v. District Court, 73 M 541, 237 P 525 (1925).

Assuming that the court had the power to suspend the execution of the accused's sentence and to place him upon probation, that power, too, must have been exercised at the time the sentence was pronounced. When an order suspending sentence is made, it is in effect a part of the judgment itself. It is the court's direction as to how the judgment shall be carried into effect. State ex rel. Reid v. District Court, 68 M 309, 218 P 558 (1923).

FINE OR IMPRISONMENT

Imposition of Mandatory Minimum Fine for DUI Per Se Not Exercise of Discretion — COVID-19 Stimulus Funds Are Protected Payment, But Municipal Court Did Not Require Defendant to Use Stimulus Funds to Pay Required Fine — No Error by Municipal Court. Whitefish v. Curran, 2023 MT 118, 412 Mont. 499, 531 P.3d 547.

Sentencing Courts Must Impose Mandatory Minimum Punishments But Retain Discretion Regarding How Defendants May Satisfy Punishment After Imposed — Failure of Municipal Court to Consider Alternate Method for Indigent Defendant to Satisfy Minimum Fine for DUI Per Se Was Abuse of Discretion. Whitefish v. Curran, 2023 MT 118, 412 Mont. 499, 531 P.3d 547.

Illegal Sentencing — No Active Acquiescence to Sentencing Conditions Lacking Statutory Authority: The Municipal Court imposed a suspended jail sentence and fines totaling over $400.

When the defendant indicated that he could not pay the fine, the Municipal Court offered an installment plan subject to a $10 contract fee, a 10% annual interest rate, and a condition that no prepayments would be allowed unless authorized. On review, the Supreme Court found no statutory authority for the Municipal Court to impose the $10 contract fee, the interest rate, or the bar on prepayment. Overruling St. v. Micklon, 2003 MT 45, 314 Mont. 291, 65 P.3d 559, the Supreme Court held that a defendant cannot “actively acquiesce” or “participate” in the imposition of a sentencing condition that is not statutorily authorized and remanded to the Municipal Court with instructions to strike the unauthorized portions of the sentence. Kalispell v. Salsgiver, 2019 MT 126, 396 Mont. 57, 443 P.3d 504.

Surcharge Imposed by City Ordinance for State Criminal Offense — Illegal Sentence — Order to Strike Surcharge: A defendant who had pleaded nolo contendere to disorderly conduct was ordered to pay a $25 surcharge pursuant to a city ordinance. The defendant unsuccessfully moved to strike the surcharge, arguing that a city ordinance was not authorized under statute. The defendant appealed and the Supreme Court reversed and remanded to strike the surcharge, holding that a city cannot assess a charge on a state sentence for a criminal offense absent statutory authority. Missoula v. Franklin, 2018 MT 218, 392 Mont. 440, 425 P.3d 1285.

Conditions Concerning Fines Mentioned in Oral Pronouncement but Missing in Written Sentence — Oral Pronouncement Controls: The District Court imposed an oral sentence that suspended certain fees and costs given the defendant’s age, the sentence length, and the defendant’s ability to work. However, the written sentence imposed the fines but failed to specify these conditions. The Supreme Court noted that the trial court had the power to impose certain conditions on fines and surcharges, and the costs were imposed and suspended pending the fulfillment of a specific obligation in the oral pronouncement of sentence. The Supreme Court held that the oral pronouncement concerning the conditions controlled. St. v. Hammer, 2013 MT 203, 371 Mont. 121, 305 P.3d 843, following St. v. Goff, 2011 MT 6, 359 Mont. 107, 247 P.3d 715. See also St. v. Barrows, 2018 MT 204, 392 Mont. 358, 424 P.3d 612.

Plea Bargain Rejected — Imposition of State-Recommended Maximum Sentence Not Violative of Due Process: Killam was charged with felony aggravated assault with a weapon. The state entered into plea negotiations, but Killam rejected the proposed agreement. Killam ultimately pleaded guilty. At sentencing, the state recommended the maximum sentence, which was greater than the sentence offered in the plea agreement, and the sentencing court imposed the maximum statutory sentence. On appeal, Killam contended that the state acted vindictively and violated Killam’s due process rights by recommending a more severe sentence than was offered in the plea negotiations, citing N.C. v. Pearce, 395 US 711 (1969), and Blackledge v. Perry, 417 US 21 (1974). The Supreme Court distinguished both federal cases because they dealt with vindictiveness based on harsher sentences imposed following retrial, while Killam argued vindictiveness during initial sentencing. The court noted that a defendant is free to accept or reject a plea offer, but if the offer is rejected, the prosecution may proceed with the case and make any legal sentencing recommendation because there is no agreement to the contrary. When Killam entered a guilty plea, the District Court informed him of the maximum sentence and the state was free to recommend the maximum statutory sentence. Thus, imposition of the maximum sentence did not violate Killam’s due process rights. St. v. Killam, 2005 MT 255, 329 M 50, 122 P3d 439 (2005), following Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 US 357 (1978).

Correction of Sentence for Imprisonment Not Erroneous: Kern was convicted of felony sexual assault against a minor. The District Court sentenced Kern to a 15-year commitment to the Department of Corrections, with all but 7 years suspended. However, this section requires that a sentence to the Department include suspension of all but 5 years of the commitment. The District Court corrected its mistake and committed Kern to the state prison for 15 years, with all but 7 years suspended. Kern contended that the court erred in correcting the sentence. Under the version of 46-18-117 in effect at the time that the crime was committed (prior to repeal in 2001), the court was allowed to correct the erroneous sentence within 120 days of sentencing. Although Kern might have preferred commitment to the Department for 15 years with all but 5 years suspended, the District Court was not restricted from pursuing the option that it chose and did not err in timely correcting the sentence pursuant to former 46-18-117. St. v. Kern, 2003 MT 77, 315 M 22, 67 P3d 272 (2003).

Acquiescence in Assessment of Interest on Unpaid Portion of Criminal Fine — Waiver of Right to Appeal: As part of a plea agreement on a felony drug charge, Micklon was fined $55,000. After hearing testimony on Micklon’s financial status, the sentencing court agreed to allow five annual payments of $11,000, but assessed interest at 10% a year on the unpaid balance. Micklon appealed the interest charges on grounds that there was no statutory authority for requiring interest on a criminal fine. The state responded that appeal was waived by Micklon's failure to object to the interest provisions at the time of sentencing. The Supreme Court recognized that a defendant often must remain silent even in the face of invalid conditions to guard against the possibility that the sentencing court may forego a more lenient sentence if the defendant objects to one of the conditions, and that in those circumstances a defendant's failure to object does not necessarily constitute a waiver of the right to appeal. However, during sentencing Micklon did not remain silent, but in fact affirmatively agreed to inclusion of the interest condition in the sentence. Without addressing the legality of interest charges, the Supreme Court concluded that Micklon waived the right to appeal the issue and affirmed the sentencing court's assessment of interest on the unpaid portion of Micklon's criminal fine. St. v. Micklon, 2003 MT 45, 314 M 291, 65 P3d 559 (2003), followed in St. v. Walker, 2007 MT 205, 338 M 529, 167 P3d 879 (2007). Micklon was overruled in Kalispell v. Salsgiver, 2019 MT 126, 396 Mont. 57, 443 P.3d 504.

Jail Sentence for DUI Not Cruel and Unusual Punishment: The defendant, who has an extensive record of driving under the influence of alcohol, was convicted on three counts of driving under the influence (DUI) and sentenced to serve 10 months in the county jail. The defendant contends her sentence is cruel and unusual punishment and a denial of equal protection because it may be greater than would be served in the state prison for a more serious offense since county jail inmates are not entitled to statutory good time allowance or parole eligibility as are prison inmates. However, the sentence falls within the maximum authorized by statute and is not so disproportionate to the crime that it shocks the conscience and outrages the moral sense of the community or of justice. Therefore, the sentence imposed is not cruel and unusual punishment that would render it unconstitutional. St. v. Bruns, 213 M 372, 691 P2d 817, 41 St. Rep. 2178 (1984).

Power of District Court:

A judgment under former law requiring a defendant who was convicted on three counts of an information charging violations of the liquor law to pay a fine of $200 and to serve 60 days in the county jail on each count and, if the fines were not paid, to serve them out at the rate of 1 day for each $2 of the fines was held not uncertain or ambiguous. It meant that he would be imprisoned for a total of 180 days and would serve 1 day for each $2 of the fines aggregating $600. In re Pyle, 72 M 494, 234 P 254 (1925).

The District Court had the power under a former statute to impose a sentence of imprisonment in the county jail for a certain number of days, the defendant in addition to pay a fine in a stated amount and, in default of payment, to stand committed 1 day for every $2 of the fine after expiration of the term of imprisonment, until the fine was paid. In re Londos, 54 M 418, 170 P 1045 (1918).

Sufficiently Definite and Certain: A judgment under former law in a case of misdemeanor, imposing a fine of $500 and providing that in default of payment the defendant be imprisoned "for the term of one day for each $2 of said fine", was sufficiently definite and certain. State ex rel. Poindexter v. District Court, 51 M 186, 149 P 958 (1915).

RESTRICTIONS OR CONDITIONS

Blanket Prohibition Against Access to Internet Devices Without Prior Permission Too Prohibitive — Remanded to District Court for Amending to Allow Access Subject to Certain Restrictions, Monitoring, and Supervision. St. v. Johnson, 2023 MT 143, 413 Mont. 114, 533 P.3d 335.

Restrictions on Probation Too Prohibitive — Remand for District Court to Amend to Allow Use of Devices for Legitimate Purposes: The defendant pleaded guilty to sexual assault and evidence tampering. Over the defendant's objection, the District Court adopted the recommendations in the defendant's presentence investigation, including those prohibiting him from having a cell phone, computer, or access to the Internet. The defendant appealed the restrictions, arguing that they had no nexus to his offenses. He also claimed that they were unreasonably burdensome because they limited his ability to apply for jobs or attend school online. The Supreme Court reversed, agreeing that the probation conditions were overbroad. The Supreme Court further instructed the District Court to amend the restrictions to allow the use of such devices for legitimate purposes. St. v. Hotchkiss, 2020 MT 269, 402 Mont. 1, 474 P.3d 1273.

Drug Charges — Restitution for Entire Cost of Remediation of Apartment Reversed — Inadequate Evidence Criminal Conduct Caused Damage: The defendant pleaded guilty to drug-related offenses after police officers found numerous drugs and drug paraphernalia not only in his room but throughout the apartment the defendant shared with three other people. The District Court ordered the defendant to pay restitution in an amount equal to the entire cost of remediating the apartment due to methamphetamine contamination. The defendant appealed, arguing that the state had not proven that he alone had caused the entirety of the damage to the apartment. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that there was insufficient evidence of a causal connection between the criminal conduct to which the defendant had pleaded guilty and the apartment renovation expenses. St. v. Cole, 2020 MT 259, 401 Mont. 502, 474 P.3d 323.

Terms of Sentencing Restricting Defendant's Contact With Minors — Defendant's Viewing of Pornography Insufficient Nexus to Underlying Offense: The defendant pleaded guilty to sexual intercourse without consent. Part of the presentence investigation recommended restricting the defendant's contact with minors. The defendant objected, arguing that the victim was not a minor and there was an insufficient nexus between the defendant, his offense, and the conditions protecting minors. The District Court disagreed, reasoning that the charging affidavit and the reports from two experts indicated that the defendant's viewing of pornography distorted his view of what a reasonable woman would consent to. On appeal, the Supreme Court overruled the District Court. The court held that a condition of sentence that generally relates to rehabilitation is insufficient; rather, there must be a correlation between the crime for which the defendant was convicted and the conditions imposed. Since nothing in the record related to minors, the District Court's restriction on the defendant's contact with minors did not correlate. St. v. Mehan, 2019 MT 100, 395 Mont. 383, 440 P.3d 25.

As-Applied Constitutional Challenge Raised for First Time on Appeal — Unreviewable: A convicted defendant moved to strike a probationary condition from his sentence that prohibited him from possessing a cell phone or other such device with photo, video, or internet capabilities because he claimed the prohibition constituted an overly broad restriction on his first amendment freedom of speech. The Supreme Court declined to allow the challenge because the defendant was challenging the constitutionality of the provision as applied to him rather than facially challenging the constitutionality of the sentencing statute. The challenge therefore could not be raised for the first time on appeal. The Supreme Court also declined to exercise plain error review. St. v. Coleman, 2018 MT 290, 393 Mont. 375, 431 P.3d 26.

Partner or Family Member Assault — Contact Restrictions Prohibiting Contact With Common-Law Wife Victim Proper: The defendant was convicted of partner or family member assault. At sentencing, the defendant objected to a restriction prohibiting him from having contact with the victim, whom he considered to be his common-law wife. Nevertheless, the District Court imposed the restriction. The defendant appealed, claiming that the restriction constituted an illegal sentencing condition. The Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed, holding that there was a sufficient nexus between the assault and the restriction. The Supreme Court also agreed with the District Court's rationale that protection of the victim warranted the restriction. St. v. Parkhill, 2018 MT 69, 391 Mont. 114, 414 P.3d 1244.

Erroneous Sentence — Imposition of Department of Corrections Commitment — Restriction on Release: Under 46-18-202, a sentencing court may restrict parole eligibility if a defendant is sentenced to imprisonment in a state prison for a term exceeding 1 year. However, when imposing a Department of Corrections (DOC) commitment, a sentencing court may not restrict release because a DOC commitment does not constitute an accompanying sentence of incarceration under 46-18-202. St. v. Day, 2018 MT 51, 390 Mont. 388, 414 P.3d 267.

Condition of Written Sentence Inconsistent With Oral Pronouncement — Written Judgment Increasing Sentence Invalid: The Supreme Court reversed a written sentence requiring the defendant to attend self-help meetings when the oral sentence had allowed the probation officer the discretion to determine whether or not the defendant was to attend self-help meetings, the District Court had explicitly stated that it was making the modification at the oral pronouncement, and the District Court had noted its intention to alter the language. St. v. Pulst, 2015 MT 184, 379 Mont. 494, 351 P.3d 687.

Valid Authority to Impose Restitution Recommendation — Doctrine of Case Inapplicable: After a prior Supreme Court decision determined that the District Court lacked authority to impose a restitution payment as a condition of parole, the District Court was not prevented by the law of the case doctrine from restating its parole eligibility restrictions and conditions as recommendations or from specifying the total amount of restitution. Furthermore, although the defendant argued that her sentence violated due process because it was based on the amount of time it would take her to pay restitution, the District Court did not err when it based the defendant's sentence on many factors but did not make financial obligations the basis of the sentence. St. v. Winter, 2014 MT 235, 376 Mont. 284, 333 P.3d 222.

No Reduction in Restitution for Portion Paid by Medical Insurer — Restitution Order Proper: The defendant pleaded guilty to assault with a weapon and criminal mischief for attacking another motorist but challenged the District Court's order requiring him to pay $6,418.33 in restitution to the victim for medical and dental expenses related to the assault, claiming that the amount should be reduced because the victim's insurer had reimbursed the victim for a portion of the expenses. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that because the restitution statutes reflect an intent to require an offender to make full restitution to any victim who has sustained pecuniary loss, the defendant was not entitled to a reduction in the amount of restitution ordered by the District Court. St. v. Fenner, 2014 MT 131, 375 Mont. 131, 325 P.3d 691.

Probation Search of Purse Based on Reasonable Suspicion — Motion to Suppress Correctly Denied: As a condition of her probation, the defendant was required to inform her probation officer of her prescriptions. During a home visit, the officer searched her purse because of her suspicious behavior. Her purse contained illegal pills, and the state filed a petition to revoke her probation. The defendant filed a motion to suppress the evidence from the purse search, contending that the officer lacked reasonable grounds to search it. The District Court denied the motion to suppress and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the denial. While a probation officer may not go through a probationer's belongings unless there is reasonable suspicion of a violation, in this case, the defendant's nervous behavior and excuses about her pills constituted reasonable grounds. St. v. Fischer, 2014 MT 112, 374 Mont. 533, 323 P.3d 891.

Affidavit From Independent Adjuster Supported by Documentation Sufficient to Establish Amount of Restitution: Following his conviction for felony theft by insurance fraud, the defendant appealed the award of restitution, arguing that the affidavit of loss from an independent adjuster hired by the insurance company was insufficient to satisfy the requirement of a victim-submitted affidavit. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that determining the amount of loss under the insurance claim was within the scope of the adjuster's duties, the adjuster was authorized to investigate and settle the claim on behalf of the insurance company, the affidavit was properly sworn, and the amount was supported by documentation in the record. St. v. Schaeffer, 2014 MT 47, 374 Mont. 93, 321 P.3d 809.

Restitution Not Parole Condition — Properly Imposed as Part of Defendant's Sentence: As part of the defendant's sentence, the District Court imposed restitution to the victims and a prohibition against seeing the victims. On appeal, the defendant argued that these sentence conditions were an unlawful imposition of conditions for future parole. The Supreme Court disagreed and upheld the sentence conditions, holding that the District Court was within its authority to impose a sentence condition of restitution that lasts the entirety of the defendant's sentence, even if the defendant is later paroled. The Supreme Court also noted that to the extent that the District Court imposed conditions that governed the defendant's behavior on parole, those conditions may be viewed as recommendations to the parole board. St. v. MacGregor, 2013 MT 297, 372 Mont. 142, 311 P.3d 428.

Sentencing Condition Lacked Nexus — No History of Substance Use or Abuse: A 17-year-old defendant was charged as an adult with one count of sexual intercourse without consent and one count of sexual assault. Subsequently, the defendant was sentenced and one of the conditions required him to report the conviction to all medical providers, as well as reporting addiction history and prescriptions for narcotics or medical marijuana. On appeal, the Supreme Court relied on St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 Mont. 187, 179 P.3d 1164, and reversed the reporting requirement on the grounds that the sentencing conditions lacked a nexus to either the offense or the offender. St. v. Dietsch, 2013 MT 245, 371 Mont. 460, 308 P.3d 111. See also St. v. Mehan, 2019 MT 100, 395 Mont. 383, 440 P.3d 25.

Psychosexual Evaluation as Condition of Probation for Misdemeanor Sexual Assault Not Prohibited — Condition Reasonable Given Offender and Offense: The defendant pleaded guilty to two counts of misdemeanor sexual assault, for which he received a deferred sentence. As a condition of probation, the Municipal Court required the defendant to obtain a psychosexual evaluation. The defendant objected, arguing that the court lacked authority to order a psychosexual evaluation under 46-18-111 and that this condition of probation was unreasonable. The District Court affirmed the Municipal Court's sentencing, and the defendant appealed. The Supreme Court concluded that 46-18-111 did not proscribe a court from requiring a psychosexual evaluation as a condition of probation and that, given the offender and the offense, the evaluation was a reasonable condition. City of Bozeman v. Cantu, 2013 MT 40, 369 Mont. 81, 296 P.3d 461.

DOC Custody — Requirement to Complete Cognitive Principles and Restructuring Program Improper: The defendant was convicted of felony criminal endangerment, sentenced to the custody of the Department of Corrections for 10 years with 5 years suspended, and ordered by the District Court to complete a cognitive principles and restructuring program before she could be released from the Department's custody. However, the District Court exceeded its authority when it required completion of the cognitive principles program since a sentencing judge may impose a parole restriction only when a defendant is sentenced to a term of imprisonment in a state prison exceeding 1 year. St. v. Bekemans, 2013 MT 11, 368 Mont. 235, 293 P.3d 843.

Parole Restriction to Hold Defendant Accountable for Homicide Justified — Conviction Affirmed: The defendant, who was convicted of deliberate homicide and sentenced to life in prison without the possibility of parole after he shot and killed his girlfriend, argued the District Court imposed an illegal sentence by restricting his parole eligibility when the District Court did not find that he could not be rehabilitated or was a danger to society. However, a sentencing determination will not be disturbed when the statutory requirements for imposing sentencing restrictions are satisfied and the court's findings are adequately supported by the record. St. v. Paulsrud, 2012 MT 180, 366 Mont. 62, 285 P.3d 505.

Sentence Not Reviewed — Failure to Timely Raise Issue — No Error Regarding Fundamental Constitutional Rights: On appeal, the defendant asserted that the prosecutor breached a plea agreement at the District Court level during sentencing. The Supreme Court declined to consider the claimed error because it was not advanced in District Court and raised no question concerning fundamental fairness of the trial court proceeding; a party may not change its theory on appeal from that advanced in the trial court or raise an argument for the first time on appeal. St. v. Lewis, 2012 MT 157, 365 Mont. 431, 282 P.3d 679.

Burglary Conviction — Conditions Related to Sexual Offense Affirmed: The defendant appealed the District Court's imposition of conditions on the defendant's suspended sentence for burglary, which included designating the defendant a level 2 sexual offender and requiring that the defendant undergo sexual offender treatment, a psychosexual evaluation, and HIV testing and provided for employment and occupational restrictions, arguing that the conditions should be stricken because the conditions were permissible only when the conviction involved a sexual offense. The Supreme Court reversed the designation as a sexual offender but affirmed the other conditions, concluding that the statutes requiring certain conditions of probation for persons convicted of a sexual offense did restrict those conditions to sexual offenses alone but did not otherwise limit the broad discretion of a sentencing court. St. v. Leyva, 2012 MT 124, 365 Mont. 204, 280 P.3d 252.

Alcohol-Related Sentencing Conditions Reasonable for Aggravated Assault Conviction: The defendant pleaded guilty to aggravated assault but challenged the District Court's sentencing conditions, which prohibited him from possessing and consuming alcohol even though he had no history of alcohol abuse. The Supreme Court affirmed the conditions, ruling that there was a sufficient nexus between the offense and the conditions and that the defendant's consumption of alcohol would be detrimental to his rehabilitation given his anger issues. St. v. Green, 2012 MT 87, 364 Mont. 515, 276 P.3d 929.

Requirement That Defendant Remove Indoor Pets From County as Sentencing Condition for Public Nuisance Affirmed: As a condition of deferred sentencing for maintaining a public nuisance, Zimmerman was ordered to remove his indoor house pets from a dilapidated house he looked after in Dutton. Each day, Zimmerman drove from Great Falls to Dutton to feed his indoor pets; he had been feeding a clowder of feral cats in and around Dutton as well, and neighbors complained about the proliferation of cats in town. The jury returned a guilty verdict, and Zimmerman was forbidden to feed the feral cats. At sentencing, the state recommended a $500 fine and a 2-year deferred sentence, which included a condition that Zimmerman also remove his house pets from the county. Zimmerman appealed this condition on grounds that his house pets were his personal property, that their removal would cause irreparable harm, and that the condition had no nexus to him or to the crime of maintaining a public nuisance. The Supreme Court disagreed. Even though the pets were not the basis of the charge, they were an integral part of Zimmerman's established feeding routine for more than 3 years. By ordering that the indoor pets be removed, the District Court minimized the likelihood that Zimmerman would bring cat food to Dutton, which in turn reduced the likelihood that Zimmerman would return to feeding feral cats, so it was plausible that removal of the indoor pets was reasonably related to protecting the citizens of Dutton from further nuisances. Further, Zimmerman was not deprived of his personal pets, but only required to remove them from the county. The sentencing requirement had a nexus to the crime and was not so unduly punitive that it amounted to an abuse of the sentencing court's discretion, so the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Zimmerman, 2010 MT 44, 355 Mont. 286, 228 P.3d 1109.

Legality of Sentence Not Reviewed if Defendant Fails to Object: As a condition of his sentence for burglary, Holt agreed to complete phases I and II of the sex offender treatment program at the Montana State Prison. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that if the defendant failed to object to a sentence, it would not review a sentence to determine if the sentence was improper, unreasonable, or an abuse of discretion. St. v. Holt, 2011 MT 42, 359 Mont. 308, 249 P.3d 470.

Restriction on Financial Transactions as Condition for Suspended Sentence for Sexual Assault Affirmed: As a condition for a suspended sentence for sexual assault of a child, Hernandez was required to obtain permission from the probation officer before engaging in financial transactions to finance or purchase a vehicle, engage in business, or incur debt. Hernandez appealed on grounds that the condition was unrelated to the crime. The Supreme Court noted that the sentencing condition was authorized by statute and Department of Corrections rule, so the Ashby requirement of a nexus to the offender or the offense did not apply. The financial transaction restriction was considered a standard condition of the Department, and Hernandez offered nothing indicating that the condition would impose a hardship; because Hernandez's priority financial obligations while serving the suspended sentence would be restitution, child support, fines, and fees, the imposition of the condition was appropriate and not an abuse of discretion. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Hernandez, 2009 MT 341, 353 M 111, 220 P3d 25 (2009), followed in St. v. Holt, 2011 MT 42, 359 Mont. 308, 249 P.3d 470.

Prohibition Against Firearms as Condition of Deferred Sentence for Stalking Affirmed: As a condition of Essig's deferred sentence for stalking, the District Court prohibited Essig from owning, possessing, or being in control of firearms. Essig appealed the prohibition, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Several years earlier Essig was convicted of a concealed weapon violation, and considering the threatening nature of the stalking violation, the District Court did not abuse its discretion by restricting Essig's firearms use to obtain the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of the victim and society. St. v. Essig, 2009 MT 340, 353 M 99, 218 P3d 838 (2009).

Sufficient Nexus of Sentencing Condition to Offense of Sexual Intercourse Without Consent: Brinson was sentenced to 20 years with 10 years suspended for sexual intercourse without consent, and the sentencing court also attached 56 terms and conditions to the sentence. Brinson challenged three conditions. The Supreme Court applied the nexus test in St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008), to determine whether the conditions lacked a nexus either to the offense or to Brinson. In this case a sufficient nexus was established to affirm imposition of conditions: (1) that Brinson's contact with his daughter be supervised; (2) prohibiting Brinson from having a cell phone, with exceptions, or other technology or device with photo, video, or internet capabilities; and (3) prohibiting Brinson from viewing television or motion pictures that were geared toward Brinson's offending cycle or as a stimulus to arouse deviant thoughts or fantasies. St. v. Brinson, 2009 MT 200, 351 M 136, 210 P3d 164 (2009).

Restitution Proper for Felony Criminal Endangerment: As part of Perkins' plea agreement on a charge of felony criminal endangerment, the state was allowed to seek restitution, and the sentencing court assessed $5,947 in restitution. Perkins appealed. The state conceded that $78.44 was not supported by documentation, but the Supreme Court held that there was sufficient legal authority for the sentencing court to impose restitution as part of the sentence. Therefore, the restitution award was affirmed but was reduced by $78.44. St. v. Perkins, 2009 MT 150, 350 M 387, 208 P3d 386 (2009).

Alcohol-Related Sentencing Condition for Incest Conviction Affirmed: As sentencing conditions following conviction for felony incest, the sentencing court required Heddings to abstain from and be tested for alcohol and drugs. Heddings argued that the alcohol-related conditions should be stricken because they were unrelated to the crime or to Heddings himself. Citing St. v. Stephenson, 2008 MT 64, 342 M 60, 179 P3d 502 (2008), the Supreme Court noted that a sentencing condition is illegal if: (1) the sentencing court lacked statutory authority to impose it; (2) the condition falls outside the parameters of the applicable sentencing statutes; or (3) the sentencing court did not adhere to affirmative mandates of the applicable sentencing statutes. Here, the presentence investigation revealed that Heddings was a situational, opportunistic child molester and that allowing him to drink would give him more opportunities to fail and increase the likelihood of reoffending. Heddings maintained that the incest did not involve the use of alcohol, but he did not challenge the accuracy of the findings. Thus, there was a nexus between the alcohol-related conditions and Heddings as an offender. It was within the sentencing court's discretion to impose conditions that were reasonable and necessary for rehabilitation or for the protection of the victim or society, and the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Heddings, 2008 MT 402, 347 M 169, 198 P3d 242 (2008). See also St. v. Green, 2012 MT 87, 364 Mont. 515, 276 P.3d 929 (alcohol-related conditions upheld when the defendant pleaded guilty to aggravated assault).

Alcohol-Related Sentencing Conditions for Fraudulently Obtaining Dangerous Drugs Affirmed: Following conviction for fraudulently obtaining dangerous drugs, Hunter challenged two sentencing conditions that prohibited the possession and consumption of alcohol and that required chemical testing for drugs and alcohol. The Supreme Court affirmed. Prohibiting and monitoring Hunter's consumption of both alcohol and drugs would help prevent Hunter from repeating the same criminal conduct that gave rise to the sentence. A sufficient nexus was established between the offense and the alcohol-related sentence conditions. St. v. Hunter, 2008 MT 395, 347 M 155, 197 P3d 998 (2008), following St. v. Winkel, 2008 MT 89, 342 M 267, 182 P3d 54 (2008). See also St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008).

Alcohol-Related Conditions Unrelated to Felony Theft Stricken From Sentence: As a condition of Stiles' sentence for felony theft, the sentencing court prohibited Stiles from possessing or consuming intoxicants and entering places where intoxicants are sold and required Stiles to submit to drug and alcohol testing. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), and its progeny, a nexus must exist between a sentencing condition and the offense and offender. Because there was no nexus between the sentencing condition and Stiles and the offense of felony theft, the alcohol-related condition was stricken from Stiles' sentence. St. v. Stiles, 2008 MT 390, 347 M 95, 197 P3d 966 (2008).

Sentencing Conditions May Not Restrict Medical Treatment Authorized by State Law: Nelson was charged with seven drug-related crimes. Nelson suffers from a degenerative disc disorder and has had four surgeries on his back. Nelson had applied with the state to be a qualified patient in Montana's medical marijuana program and to be entitled to the lawful use of medical marijuana. On December 8, 2006, subsequent to being charged with the drug-related crimes, Nelson was accepted into the medical marijuana program, placed on the confidential registry, and issued an identification card indicating his participation in the program. On February 7, 2007, Nelson entered into a plea agreement with the state. In exchange for pleading nolo contendere to criminal possession or manufacture of dangerous drugs, Nelson received a 3-year deferred imposition of sentence, and the state agreed to dismiss the remaining six counts. On February 26, 2007, Nelson appeared before the District Court and formally pleaded no contest to the charge. The District Court asked Nelson's attorney how Nelson participated in the medical marijuana program. The state offered that it had spoken to officials at the Department of Corrections, who opined that they would not allow Nelson to smoke marijuana while under their supervision but would allow him to use the pill form of marijuana, dronabinol, as prescribed by a physician. Nelson's attorney argued that such a restriction on Nelson's use of medical marijuana would be cost-prohibitive for him due to the expense of dronabinol and was thus contrary to the intent behind the passage of the Medical Marijuana Act (repealed and replaced in 2011), which was to allow individuals to obtain medical relief through the use of medical marijuana in a manner that was cost-effective. Nelson was ultimately given a 3-year deferred imposition of sentence subject to 20 conditions. Nelson appealed the conditions requiring him to comply with federal law and restricting his use and possession of marijuana to the pill form. Under the Medical Marijuana Act (repealed and replaced in 2011), "medical use" specifically contemplates "cultivation" and the use of "paraphernalia relating to the consumption of marijuana". The Supreme Court concluded that the District Court exceeded its statutory authority in imposing the condition limiting use to the pill form. The District Court unlawfully denied Nelson the right and privilege to use a lawful medical treatment for relief from a debilitating condition under the Medical Marijuana Act (repealed and replaced in 2011). The District Court also exceeded its authority in imposing the condition requiring compliance with federal law, insofar as it could be invoked to support a revocation of his deferred sentence in the face of contrary state law. It is an axiom of federalism under the U.S. Constitution that Congress does not have the authority to commandeer the processes of states by directly compelling them to enact and enforce a federal regulatory program. St. v. Nelson, 2008 MT 359, 346 M 366, 195 P3d 826 (2008), distinguished in St. v. Fadness, 2012 MT 12, 363 Mont. 322, 268 P.3d 17.

District Court Lacked Power to Impose Conditions of Parole: The District Court imposed an illegal sentence when sentencing defendant on a petition to revoke and on a new charge because the court purported to impose many "parole and probation" conditions. St. v. Dennison, 2008 MT 344, 346 M 295, 194 P3d 704, (2008).

Requirement for Annual Polygraph Test as Condition of Suspended Sentence Not Unlawful — Use of Test Results in Punishment Prohibited: As a condition of Hameline's suspended sentence the District Court required Hameline to undergo an annual polygraph test. Hameline objected on grounds that the condition was illegal because polygraph results are not admissible in Montana court proceedings and on grounds that requiring the test violated the constitutional right against self-incrimination. The Supreme Court reiterated the complete prohibition against the direct or indirect use of polygraph results in court proceedings, while noting that requiring a person to undergo a polygraph test is not in itself illegal, so requiring a polygraph test for other purposes is not prohibited. The court also held that the right against self-incrimination did not prevent the District Court from compelling Hameline to undergo a polygraph test, but the right did prevent the state from using information gleaned from the test to punish Hameline. St. v. Hameline, 2008 MT 241, 344 M 461, 188 P3d 1052 (2008), followed in St. v. Smart, 2009 MT 1, 348 M 274, 201 P3d 123 (2009). See also St. v. Heddings, 2008 MT 402, 347 M 169, 198 P3d 242 (2008).

Restrictions Against Gambling and Use of Alcohol Unrelated to Offense of Theft or to Defendant Stricken — Drug Testing Requirement Affirmed: As conditions of Lessard's conviction for the theft of carved bears from neighborhood lawns, the sentencing court required that Lessard not consume alcohol or drugs, submit to alcohol and drug testing, and refrain from entering casinos and gambling. Lessard contested the conditions as unrelated to the theft of carved bears and asserted that he had no problem with or criminal history related to substance abuse or gambling, even though a marijuana pipe was found in Lessard's bedroom during a search for the bears and Lessard admitted to smoking marijuana 2 days prior to the search. In deliberating whether the conditions had a nexus to the offense or to Lessard himself, the Supreme Court held that the alcohol and gambling conditions were too much, that requiring no conditions would be too little, but that the drug testing condition was just right. The case was remanded with instructions to strike the alcohol and gambling conditions and the alcohol testing requirement from Lessard's sentence, while leaving the drug testing requirement in effect. St. v. Lessard, 2008 MT 192, 344 M 26, 185 P3d 1013 (2008).

Sentencing Conditions for Theft Conviction, Except Requirement for Mental Health Evaluation, Affirmed: As conditions of Greensweight's sentence for theft, the sentencing court required Greensweight to obtain a chemical dependency evaluation and to attend either Alcoholics Anonymous or Narcotics Anonymous, prohibited Greensweight from possessing, using, or drinking intoxicants and from entering any place where intoxicants were the chief item of sale, and required Greensweight to participate in counseling, including mental health counseling. Greensweight contested the conditions as unrelated to the crime, and the Supreme Court considered each condition for legality and reasonableness and considered whether the conditions were related either to the crime or to Greensweight's unique background and characteristics. In light of Greensweight's history of chronic drug use, the chemical dependency evaluation and attendance at group meetings were reasonable and were affirmed. Citing St. v. Brotherton, 2008 MT 119, 342 M 511, 182 P3d 88 (2008), the court also affirmed the "no intoxicants" condition as legal because of the history of chronic drug use and as necessary for Greensweight's rehabilitation, including a requirement for drug and alcohol testing. The court also affirmed the counseling requirement, but absent any history of mental health issues or nexus to the theft crime, the requirement for mental health counseling was ordered stricken. St. v. Greensweight, 2008 MT 185, 343 M 474, 187 P3d 613 (2008), followed in St. v. O'Connell, 2011 MT 242, 362 Mont. 171, 261 P.3d 1042.

Appropriate Conditions on Probation of Delinquent and Serious Youth Sex Offender: As a youth, D.A.S. was convicted of sexual assault and placed in a youth correctional facility. When D.A.S. turned 18, jurisdiction and supervisory responsibility were transferred from Youth Court to District Court until age 25, and numerous supervisory conditions were attached, including prohibitions on the use of drugs and alcohol, a curfew, and a requirement that D.A.S. obtain a GED 1 year prior to expiration of the sentence. D.A.S. objected to these conditions on grounds that they were unrelated to the crime of sexual assault, but the Supreme Court affirmed, applying St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342, M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008), which allows imposition of conditions that have a nexus either to the offense or to the offender. In this case, both alcohol and drug prohibitions were reasonably related to D.A.S.'s rehabilitation and placement in a sexual offender program. A curfew was reasonable to ensure development of a consistent and healthy routine and was reasonable given legislative intent to provide youth offenders with additional supervision. Completion of the high school equivalency test was not an abuse of discretion because it was consistent with legislative intent to rehabilitate youth offenders through competency development, especially given D.A.S.'s expressed desire to further his education. In re D.A.S., 2008 MT 168, 343 M 360, 184 P3d 349 (2008).

Defendant Not Involved in Initial Vehicle Theft or Damage — Restitution Not Owning: Seghetti stole a vehicle and picked up Breeding and another friend for a ride, during which the vehicle was damaged while Seghetti was driving. Seghetti then revealed that the vehicle was stolen, and Breeding suggested driving the vehicle to California. During the trip, Breeding and Seghetti shared the driving. California police stopped the vehicle for a broken turn signal, and Breeding and Seghetti were subsequently charged with and convicted of felony theft. At sentencing, the District Court ordered that Breeding pay restitution for damage to the vehicle. Asserting that he was not driving when the damage occurred and thus was not responsible for the damage, Breeding appealed the restitution order. The Supreme Court reversed. Without a causal connection between Breeding's commission of theft and the damage inflicted earlier by Seghetti, there was no basis for requiring Breeding to pay restitution for that damage, so the District Court was ordered to strike the restitution requirement from Breeding's sentence. St. v. Breeding, 2008 MT 162, 343 M 323, 184 P3d 313 (2008). See also St. v. Cole, 2020 MT 259, 401 Mont. 502, 474 P.3d 323, in which restitution was reversed when the state failed to prove causal nexus.

Partial Parole Restrictions Affirmed: Rickman was sentenced to life with no parole eligibility for 55 years for deliberate homicide under the felony-murder rule. Rickman appealed the sentence on grounds that the sentencing court had no authority to restrict parole eligibility for only part of the sentence. Noting that challenges to partial parole restriction have been upheld since at least 1988, the Supreme Court disagreed with Rickman's assertion. A sentencing court has discretion to impose parole restrictions, and if a sentencing court has discretion to impose a restriction of no parole eligibility, then a sentencing court can likewise impose a restriction of limited parole eligibility. St. v. Rickman, 2008 MT 142, 343 M 120, 183 P3d 49 (2008). See also St. v. Kirkbride, 2008 MT 178, 343 M 409, 185 P3d 340 (2008), and St. v. Bullman, 2009 MT 37, 349 M 228, 203 P3d 768 (2009).

Sentence Restriction Prohibiting Alcohol Use Sufficiently Related to Defendant's History of Substance Abuse to Warrant Affirmation — Unrelated Casino Restriction Stricken: As conditions of Brotherton's sentence for criminal possession of dangerous drugs with intent to distribute, the District Court prohibited Brotherton's use of alcohol, prohibited him from entering any place where intoxicants were the chief item of sale, and also prohibited him from entering casinos or playing games of chance. Brotherton appealed the conditions on grounds that they were unrelated to the offense, given that his criminal history involved only drugs and not alcohol. The Supreme Court agreed that the casino restriction was improper and remanded with directions that the condition be stricken. However, the court affirmed the alcohol use restriction, given Brotherton's significant history of chemical dependency and the reasonable possibility that Brotherton might substitute alcohol for drugs and thus impede his rehabilitation. St. v. Brotherton, 2008 MT 119, 342 M 511, 182 P3d 88 (2008), followed in St. v. O'Connell, 2011 MT 242, 362 Mont. 171, 261 P.3d 1042.

No General or Inherent Authority of Sentencing Court to Generally Impose Parole Conditions — Parole Condition Related to Sexual Offense Authorized: There is no general or inherent authority for a sentencing court to impose parole conditions. A sentencing court may impose conditions on parole that are authorized by statute only. In this case, all conditions on Burch's suspended sentence for sexual offenses were proper, but only one parole condition, prohibiting Burch from possessing pornography or accessing the Internet, was authorized under 46-18-255. Burch's admission that he used the Internet at work to access pornography while on parole established that Burch violated a condition of his suspended sentence by a preponderance of the evidence. Thus, the sentencing court did not err in revoking Burch's suspended sentence. St. v. Burch, 2008 MT 118, 342 M 499, 182 P3d 66 (2008), followed in St. v. Dennison, 2008 MT 344, 346 M 295, 194 P3d 704, (2008), St. v. Makarchuk, 2009 MT 82, 349 M 507, 204 P3d 1213 (2009), and St. v. Heafner, 2010 MT 87, 356 Mont. 128, 231 P.3d 1087 regarding authority of sentencing court. See also St. v. Gunderson, 2010 MT 166, 357 Mont. 142, 237 P.3d 74, St. v. Birthmark, 2013 MT 86, 369 Mont. 413, 300 P.3d 1140, St. v. MacGregor, 2013 MT 297, 372 Mont. 142, 311 P.3d 428, St. v. Ring, 2014 MT 49, 374 Mont. 109, 321 P.3d 800, and St. v. Boyd, 2021 MT 323, 407 Mont. 1, 501 P.3d 409.

Conditions Including Restrictions on Alcohol Consumption and Entering Casinos Related to Drug Possession — Affirmed: As conditions of Winkel's suspended sentence for felony possession of dangerous drugs, the sentencing court prohibited Winkel from consuming alcohol and from entering any place where intoxicants were the chief item of sale and prohibited Winkel from entering casinos or playing games of chance. Winkel contended that the conditions should be stricken because alcohol and gambling were not related to the drug offense. The Supreme Court noted that sentencing conditions must be reasonably connected to the underlying offense and to the offender and concluded that in this case, that connection existed. The alcohol prohibition was connected to the drug-related nature of Winkel's drug offense and was called for, given Winkel's recent and chronic history of substance abuse and chemical dependency. Thus, the sentencing court did not err in finding that Winkel's rehabilitation would be jeopardized if Winkel had access to intoxicants like alcohol. Additionally, because alcohol is inseparable from gambling in Montana casinos, the prohibition against entering casinos achieved the same objectives of rehabilitation and protection and was also warranted. The conditions of Winkel's suspended sentence were affirmed. St. v. Winkel, 2008 MT 89, 342 M 267, 182 P3d 54 (2008), followed in St. v. Teets, 2008 MT 130, 343 M 73, 183 P3d 45 (2008), St. v. Deshazo, 2008 MT 131, 343 M 77, 183 P3d 47 (2008), St. v. Corbin, 2008 MT 146, 343 M 211, 184 P3d 287 (2008), and St. v. Sadowsky, 2008 MT 405, 347 M 192, 197 P3d 1018 (2008). See also St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008).

Probation Condition Banning Alcohol Consumption Unrelated to Crime of Issuing Bad Check Reversed — Condition Prohibiting Gambling Related to Fiscal Irresponsibility Affirmed: Probation conditions on Ashby's bad check conviction included a restriction that Ashby not gamble or consume alcohol or drugs. Ashby contested the conditions under the rule in St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), that there must be a nexus between probation conditions and the offense. The District Court denied Ashby's assertion and imposed the conditions as "stock" or standard. On appeal, the Supreme Court expanded the Ommundson nexus rule to include a nexus either to the offense or to the offender, rather than to the offense alone. In this case, there was no evidence that the bad check offense was related in any way to alcohol or drugs, that Ashby had a drinking or drug problem, or that an alcohol and drug prohibition would protect Ashby from another bout of writing bad checks. Thus, the alcohol and drug restriction was stricken from the sentence. Likewise, there was no evidence that Ashby had a gambling problem. However, citing St. v. Kroll, 2004 MT 203, 322 M 294, 95 P3d 717 (2004), the court found that because of considerable previous fiscal irresponsibility on Ashby's part, it was reasonable for the sentencing court to conclude that a prohibition on gambling was appropriate to rehabilitate Ashby's ability to manage his finances, so the gambling restriction was affirmed. The court also warned against the imposition of alcohol and gambling restrictions as standard or universal because they are not mandated by law. St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008), followed in St. v. Corbin, 2008 MT 146, 343 M 211, 184 P3d 287 (2008), St. v. Krueger, 2008 MT 265, 345 M 147, 190 P3d 318 (2008), St. v. Jones, 2008 MT 440, 347 M 512, 199 P3d 216 (2008), and, with regard to imposition of a gambling restriction in light of defendant's financial irresponsibility, in St. v. Simpson, 2009 MT 43, 349 M 275, 203 P3d 791 (2009). Kruger was followed in St. v. Smart, 2009 MT 1, 348 M 274, 201 P3d 123 (2009).

Repayment of Costs and Fees of Court-Appointed Counsel as Condition of Deferred Sentence: As a condition of Holland's deferred sentence, the District Court ordered Holland to repay $2,922 in costs and fees expended in his defense by court-appointed counsel. Holland appealed on grounds that the court was not authorized to impose such a condition on a deferred sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that because 46-8-113(1) included all costs related to a criminal defense and because the statute contained no limitation on which defense costs a judge may require a defendant to pay, the District Court did not err in requiring Holland to repay costs and fees of court-appointed counsel as a condition of the deferred sentence. (Note: A 2005 amendment provided that costs must be limited to costs incurred by the Office of State Public Defender.) St. v. Holland, 2008 MT 26, 341 M 237, 177 P3d 482 (2008).

Parenting Interference Conviction — Imposition of Conditions Restricting Alcohol Consumption and Gambling Reversed — Requirement for Mental Health Evaluation Affirmed: As a sentencing condition for conviction of parenting interference, a mother was required to refrain from consuming alcohol and frequenting casinos and was ordered to undergo a mental health evaluation. The mother appealed the imposition of the conditions. The Supreme Court noted that a sentencing condition must have some correlation or connection to the underlying offense, and in this case there was no nexus between alcohol consumption or gambling and parenting interference, so those conditions were stricken. However, the mother's past actions and the conduct forming the basis for the underlying offense revealed a correlation between the evaluation ordered and the conviction for parenting interference, so the sentencing court did not err in requiring a mental health evaluation as a sentencing condition in this case, and that requirement was affirmed. St. v. Young, 2007 MT 323, 340 M 153, 174 P3d 460 (2007), following St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999).

Youth Court Adjudication Not Considered Conviction — No Authority to Require Adjudicated Youth to Register as Sexual or Violent Offender Under Pre-2007 Law: In 1998, 16-year-old Hastings was adjudicated a delinquent youth in Youth Court, admitting one offense of sexual intercourse without consent, and was committed to the Department of Corrections (DOC). When Hastings turned 18 in 2000, his case was transferred to District Court until age 25 based on the parties' stipulation that Hastings had not completed sex offender treatment or paid restitution and was at high risk to reoffend. The District Court then determined that Hastings had violated the conditions of the Youth Court order and committed Hastings to the DOC and also required that Hastings register as a level 2 sex offender. Hastings initially registered as a sex offender, but failed to update registration after moving and was subsequently charged with failure to maintain registration. Hastings moved to dismiss the charge, asserting that he had not been convicted of a sexual offense and that neither the commitment order nor statutes required him to register after discharging his sentence. The motion was denied, and Hastings appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Although the Youth Court had the authority to require sex offender registration pursuant to 41-5-1513, no requirement was made in this case. Because the Youth Court adjudication did not constitute a conviction, the District Court could not impose registration requirements under this section. (Note that the 2007 Legislature amended 46-23-502 to include an adjudicated youth in the definition of a sexual or violent offender.) The District Court's opinion that 41-5-1513 suggests a wholesale incorporation of sexual offender registry into the Montana Youth Court Act was erroneous, and absent statutory authority, a court may not impose a registration requirement. Failure to grant Hastings' motion to dismiss was error, and the case was remanded for dismissal. St. v. Hastings, 2007 MT 294, 340 M 1, 171 P3d 726 (2007), distinguishing St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003), and St. v. Villanueva, 2005 MT 192, 328 M 135, 118 P3d 179 (2005).

No Prosecution for Breach of Suspended Sentence Only: As a condition of Letasky's suspended sentence for partner or family member assault, he was directed to have no contact with the victim. When contact allegedly occurred, Letasky was charged with criminal contempt. Letasky moved to dismiss the charge, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. A condition of a suspended sentence, unlike a court order, is not an independent mandate of the court, but instead represents a requirement that Montana law allows the court to place upon an order suspending an offender's sentence. An offender may be prosecuted for a crime if the facts that establish the offender's noncompliance with a condition of the suspended sentence also establish the elements of a crime, but an offender may not be prosecuted based only on breach of the condition itself. St. v. Letasky, 2007 MT 51, 336 M 178, 152 P3d 1288 (2007), distinguished in St. v. Fadness, 2012 MT 12, 363 Mont. 322, 268 P.3d 17.

Home Visit of Probationer's Residence by Supervising Officer Not Considered Search — Diminished Expectation of Privacy — When Reasonable Cause Required to Search Probationer's Residence: As part of Moody's conditions of probation, the sentencing court required that Moody's home be open and available for the probation and parole officer to visit as required by state policy. Moody objected to the condition on grounds that it obviated the reasonable cause requirement for searches of probationers' homes and thus violated the constitutional rights of privacy and protection from unreasonable search and seizure. The Supreme Court noted that in Montana, a probation officer may search a probationer's residence without a warrant if the officer has reasonable cause for the search. The reasonable cause standard is substantially less than the probable cause standard required for searches of other citizens' homes because probationers do not enjoy the absolute liberty and heightened expectations of privacy afforded every Montana citizen. Rather, probationers are subject to conditional liberty that is properly dependent upon special restrictions. A convicted felon who is unambiguously aware of the clearly expressed condition that the residence be open and available for home visits does not have a reasonable expectation of privacy that precludes home visits, and because there is no reasonable expectation of privacy, there is no search. Therefore, home visits conducted as a routine and reasonable element of supervising a convicted person are not searches and are not subject to the reasonable cause standard. Although a home visit has the potential to turn into a search pursuant to an officer's plain view observations, it must remain within the parameters of a home visit unless and until reasonable cause exists for the officer to engage in a search. A probationer's diminished expectation of privacy during supervision nevertheless provides that the enclosed areas of the probationer's residence, such as closets, cabinets, and drawers, cannot be searched without reasonable cause. Thus, Moody's constitutional rights to privacy and to be free from unreasonable searches were not violated by the home visit probation condition. St. v. Moody, 2006 MT 305, 334 M 517, 148 P3d 662 (2006), followed in St. v. Greeson, 2007 MT 23, 336 M 1, 152 P3d 695 (2007).

Restriction of Travel as Probation Condition Related to Rehabilitation and Protection of Society Affirmed: As part of Moody's conditions of probation, the sentencing court required that Moody obtain written permission from the probation officer before traveling outside Moody's assigned district. Moody objected to the restriction, arguing that it improperly placed Moody's rights at the mercy of the supervising officer. The Supreme Court noted that a probation condition must be reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and protection of the victim and society and have some correlation or connection to the underlying offense. In this case, the offense resulted from Moody's admitted problem with alcohol. The deferred sentence allowed Moody to address the problem under the supervision of the probation officer and properly included a travel restriction to allow the officer to effectively keep track of Moody and ensure that Moody remained on course with treatment. Imposition of the travel restriction was affirmed. St. v. Moody, 2006 MT 305, 334 M 517, 148 P3d 662 (2006).

Sentencing Condition Unrelated to Underlying Offense Stricken: Attorney Holt pleaded not guilty to five counts of felony theft of clients' funds. As a condition of a suspended sentence, the trial court prohibited Holt from possessing or consuming alcohol and from establishing a checking or credit card account. Holt appealed both sentencing conditions. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), and St. v. Lucero, 2004 MT 248, 323 M 42, 97 P3d 1106 (2004), a sentencing limitation or condition must have some correlation to the underlying offense in order to be reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and protection of the victim and society. In this case, there was no evidence that alcohol contributed to the offenses in question, so the Supreme Court struck that condition from the judgment. However, there was a correlation between Holt being allowed to establish a checking or credit card account and the crime of theft of clients' funds, so imposition of that condition was not improper and was affirmed. St. v. Holt, 2006 MT 151, 332 M 426, 139 P3d 819 (2006), followed in St. v. Armstrong, 2006 MT 334, 335 M 131, 151 P3d 46 (2006), and St. v. Greeson, 2007 MT 23, 336 M 1, 152 P3d 695 (2007).

Restitution Proper for Insurance Fraud: Borsberry was convicted of insurance fraud and ordered to pay restitution of $22,997.52 to the insurer in repayment of the fraudulently obtained amount. Borsberry appealed on grounds that restitution was not proper because the insurer was not a victim who suffered a pecuniary loss. The Supreme Court disagreed. Borsberry's policy contained a provision that his policy would be voided if a fraudulent claim was filed. The insurer paid the fraudulent claim under a reservation of rights and suffered a pecuniary loss based on Borsberry's criminal activity. Under Tyler v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 255 M 174, 841 P2d 538 (1992), insurance payments made under fraudulent claims entitle the insurer to restitution in the amount of the payments. The restitution fell within statutory parameters and was affirmed. St. v. Borsberry, 2006 MT 126, 332 M 271, 136 P3d 993 (2006).

Restitution Properly Imposed Without Suspension or Deferral of Sentence: Citing St. v. Honey, 2005 MT 107, 327 M 49, 112 P3d 983 (2005), Vernes contended that the sentencing court had no authority under this section to impose restitution costs without suspending or deferring part of Vernes' sentence. The Supreme Court noted that an alternative sentencing authority for the imposition of restitution costs, not addressed in Honey, exists in 46-18-202 that allows any limitation reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of society, as long as the restriction or condition has some connection to the underlying offense, and does not require suspension or deferral of a portion of a defendant's sentence. Thus, the sentencing court had authority to impose restitution for costs directly connected to the pecuniary loss of the victim, and restitution in this case was affirmed St. v. Vernes, 2006 MT 32, 331 M 129, 130 P3d 169 (2006). See also St. v. MacGregor, 2013 MT 297, 372 Mont. 142, 311 P.3d 428.

Improper Order to Pay Child Support as Condition of Sentence for Possession of Dangerous Drugs: Erickson entered a plea agreement on drug charges, and although it was not part of the agreement, the sentencing court ordered that Erickson also forfeit one-third of his prison earnings as restitution to be paid toward Erickson's delinquent child support. Erickson never invited or acquiesced to the child support order. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that possession of dangerous drugs is a victimless crime for which restitution cannot be owed and also noted that the amount of restitution must be determined and fixed. The court agreed with Erickson that there was no connection between drug crimes and the failure to pay child support, so ordering payment of child support arrearages as restitution was not an appropriate condition of sentencing for a drug crime. However, in this case, the sentencing court made it clear that the order to pay child support was in lieu of requiring Erickson to pay cleanup costs associated with a clandestine drug lab, attorney costs, or jury costs. The sentencing court could have imposed both costs and restitution if not for the imposition of the illegal child support obligation, so the Supreme Court was unable to determine what sentence would have been imposed if the law had been correctly applied. The case was remanded for resentencing on whether Erickson must pay restitution and costs. St. v. Erickson, 2005 MT 276, 329 M 192, 124 P3d 119 (2005).

Adoption of Sentence Recommended in Presentence Investigation Report, With Variations — No Error in Disparity Between Oral and Written Sentence: As set out in St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), the oral pronouncement of sentence is the legally effective sentence, and the written judgment and commitment serves as evidence of the sentence orally pronounced. Wiedrich contended that because his written sentence contained terms and conditions that were not orally pronounced, the extra conditions were invalid and should be removed from the sentence.

The Supreme Court disagreed. The transcript revealed that the sentencing court clearly adopted the sentence recommended in the presentence investigation report, with some variations—a fact that Wiedrich and his counsel were fully aware of—and the Supreme Court therefore declined to remand for resentencing. St. v. Wiedrich, 2005 MT 127, 327 M 214, 112 P3d 1054 (2005).

Conditioning Suspension of Part of Sentence for Failure to Register as Sex Offender on No Contact With Persons Under 18 and No Possession of Pornographic Material: Malloy, a convicted sex offender, pleaded guilty to failing to report his change of address. He appealed conditions on his suspended sentence that prohibited contact with persons under 18 years of age and access to or possession of pornographic or other material tending to arouse deviant thoughts or fantasies, claiming that the conditions were not reasonably related to the offense, as required by case law interpretation of the provision under this section allowing “reasonable restrictions or conditions considered necessary for rehabilitation or for the protection of the victim or society”. The Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act was adopted to protect the public from the recidivism of sex offenders, prevent victimization of vulnerable children, and assist law enforcement in keeping track of sex offenders. Malloy had two prior sex offense convictions and failed to complete two different sex offender programs. He had a history of inability to conform his conduct to the demands of the state’s sex offender laws and exhibited behavior placing society in danger because of his recidivism. The conditions were reasonably related to the goal of protecting society, including children. St. v. Malloy, 2004 MT 377, 325 M 86, 103 P3d 1064 (2004). See also St. v. Leyva, 2012 MT 124, 365 Mont. 204, 280 P.3d 252.

Suspension of Part of Sentence for Failure to Register as Sex Offender — Conditions in Written but Not Oral Judgment That Full Employment Be Maintained and Offender Not Have Contact With Victims: Malloy, a convicted sex offender, pleaded guilty to failing to report his change of address. The written judgment, but not the oral pronouncement of sentence, required him to maintain full-time employment and to not have contact with the victims of his offense. The court could not say that the conditions would not substantively increase his loss of liberty or sacrifice of property, and accordingly, the court ordered those conditions to be vacated. St. v. Malloy, 2004 MT 377, 325 M 86, 103 P3d 1064 (2004). See also St. v. Mehan, 2019 MT 100, 395 Mont. 383, 440 P.3d 25.

No Prejudice in Property Valuation When Less Than Full Restitution Required: The total losses incurred by individuals and businesses in a fire started by Gilbert was $5,721,684.57. In calculating the value of a building destroyed in the fire for establishing restitution, the District Court used replacement value rather than actual value. Gilbert contended that failure to use actual value was reversible error under St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000). The Supreme Court agreed that actual value should have been used but that Gilbert failed to show that any prejudice resulted from the error. Gilbert’s presentence investigation report adequately documented Gilbert’s financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, and Gilbert was ordered to pay only $24,000 in restitution, which was but a minuscule fraction of the losses. Any error by the District Court in using replacement value for the building did not prejudice Gilbert because he was not required to pay full restitution. St. v. Gilbert, 2004 MT 368, 324 M 530, 106 P3d 127 (2004), following St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Deferred Sentence, Community Service, and Restitution Properly Imposed for Sexual Intercourse Without Consent: Following Grindheim’s conviction for sexual intercourse without consent, the District Court deferred Grindheim’s sentence for 6 years, subject to 6 months in the county jail, 2,000 hours of community service, and fines and restitution totaling about $6,496.60. Grindheim appealed on grounds that the combination of the conditions rendered the sentence unreasonable and impossible to perform and constituted punishment instead of rehabilitation. The Supreme Court held that the conditions and community service were within the parameters of the sentencing statute and were reasonably related to the circumstances of the offense and that the restitution calculations were reasonable considering the victim’s long-term counseling needs. Therefore, the District Court did not err in imposing the sentence, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. Grindheim, 2004 MT 311, 323 M 519, 101 P3d 267 (2004).

Improper Inclusion of Social Security Benefits When Determining Income for Purposes of Restitution: An order that Social Security benefits be included in appellant’s net income for purposes of determining the amount of net income to be paid as restitution improperly burdened appellant’s Social Security benefits. Including Social Security benefits in income conflicts with 42 U.S.C. 407(a), which provides that the benefits cannot be subjected to execution, levy, attachment, garnishment, or other legal process. The order was an improper attempt to subject the benefits to “other legal process”. St. v. Eaton, 2004 MT 283, 323 M 287, 99 P3d 661 (2004). See also Whitefish

v. Curran, 2023 MT 118, 412 Mont. 499, 531 P.3d 547, finding that COVID-19 stimulus payments are protected similar to Social Security benefits.

Ordering Restitution When Section Required It for Deferred Sentence and Did Not Mention Suspended Sentence — Allowable When Failure to Mention Suspended Sentence Was Due to Error: Under a 1999 amendment, this section mandated restitution when a deferred sentence was imposed. Defendant was given a suspended sentence and ordered to pay restitution. An error was made in the 1999 amendments to this section, under which only a deferred sentence was referred to. The amendments were not intended to make any change in the substance or effect of the section, which required mandatory restitution when either a deferred or a suspended sentence was imposed. Therefore, it was not error to order appellant to pay restitution. St. v. Eaton, 2004 MT 283, 323 M 287, 99 P3d 661 (2004).

Review of Legality of Imposing Restitution — Failure to Raise Issue Below: If a defendant appeals a sentence in a criminal case on the grounds that it is illegal or exceeds statutory mandates, the issue may be reviewed even if no objection was made at the time of sentencing. Therefore, defendant's claim that an order to pay restitution as a condition to a suspended sentence was illegal was not waived by his failure to raise the issue below and would be reviewed on appeal. St. v. Eaton, 2004 MT 283, 323 M 287, 99 P3d 661 (2004), followed in St. v. Eaton, 2004 MT 381, 325 M 92, 103 P3d 1068 (2004).

Restitution Properly Ordered When Dismissed Charges Related to Charge for Which Defendant Convicted: McIntire was charged with felony burglary, misdemeanor theft, and misdemeanor forgery. Pursuant to a plea agreement, McIntire pleaded guilty to the burglary charge and the other charges were dismissed. The trial court ordered McIntire to pay restitution, but McIntire contended that because the forgery charges were dismissed, restitution could not be ordered to compensate for the forged checks and that the court lacked authority to impose restitution when there was no longer a victim with respect to the dismissed forgery charges. The Supreme Court disagreed. The victim was the same for both crimes, and the burglary was directly connected to the forgery, constituting an ongoing criminal transaction, so dismissal of the forgery charges did not deprive the court of authority to impose a restitution obligation on McIntire for the checks stolen from the victim during the burglary and for the pecuniary loss from the subsequent forgery of those checks. St. v. McIntire, 2004 MT 238, 322 M 496, 97 P3d 576 (2004).

Imposition of Stock Probation Requirements in Written Sentence When Not Mentioned in Oral Sentence Not Error Absent Showing of Prejudice: When Kroll was sentenced orally for a felony bad check scheme, he received a 10-year prison sentence with all but 180 days suspended and was ordered to pay restitution, not possess or consume alcohol, obtain a chemical dependency evaluation, refrain from entering casinos and playing games of chance, and undergo a sexual risk assessment because many of the materials purchased with the bad checks included pornography. The subsequent written judgment deviated from the oral pronouncement in several respects, omitting the sexual risk assessment and including several conditions not addressed at the oral sentencing, including requirements that Kroll conduct himself in a law-abiding manner, submit to reasonable searches, not own or possess firearms or deadly weapons, maintain full-time legitimate employment, have no contact with the victims, and pay a supervision fee. Kroll contested the validity of the added conditions in the written sentence and the imposition of the sexual risk assessment. The Supreme Court affirmed. The added conditions were civil restrictions that were considered stock requirements for probationers and individuals subject to a suspended sentence and did not substantively increase Kroll's loss of liberty or sacrifice of property. Given the standard nature of the sentencing conditions, Kroll suffered no actual prejudice by failure of the District Court to impose the conditions at oral sentencing, and they were therefore upheld as lawful. The state conceded that the alcohol restrictions and the chemical dependency conditions of the oral sentence were not related to the crime, and the Supreme Court ordered that those conditions be removed, leaving only the gambling and sexual risk assessment at issue. The Supreme Court affirmed those conditions because they were related to the bad check crimes and were a reasonable condition to assist Kroll's rehabilitation. St. v. Kroll, 2004 MT 203, 322 M 294, 95 P3d 717 (2004), following St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480 (2000). See also St. v. Lucero, 2004 MT 248, 323 M 42, 97 P3d 1106 (2004), in which the imposition of significant restrictions and conditions not mentioned in the oral sentence, in addition to stock sentencing conditions authorized in Kroll, was considered prejudicial, reversible error.

Order for Restitution Upon Imposition of Deferred or Suspended Sentence — 1999 Amendments to Sentencing Statute Clarified: Heath was convicted of theft and possession of burglary tools and sentenced to 10 years in prison with 2 years suspended upon conditions, including payment of restitution. Heath appealed on grounds that the 1999 amendments to this section no longer allowed a sentencing court to impose restitution as a condition of a suspended or deferred sentence. Upon amendment in 1999, an internal reference in subsection (5) of this section was not changed to reflect the renumbering of the other subsections, which resulted in an ambiguity in the plain language of this section, potentially rendered 46-18-237 and 46-18-251(2) meaningless, created uncertain directives for payment of restitution for all victims in 46-18-241(1) and 46-18-244(2), and created a potentially absurd application of subsection (1) of this section. Because of the potentially absurd consequences of the 1999 amendment, the Supreme Court looked beyond the words of the statute and inquired whether the Legislature intended to make any change in the substance and effect of this section. The court concluded that the 1999 amendment was a simple codification error that resulted in a cross-reference problem that was completely inconsistent with legislative intent to authorize sentencing courts to impose restitution when necessary for rehabilitation or for the protection of the victim or society if there is an appropriate correlation to the offense committed. Heath's argument failed, and the imposition of restitution as a condition of Heath's suspended sentence was affirmed. (Note: The erroneous internal reference in subsection (5) of this section was deleted in 2003.) St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004), followed in St. v. McDanold, 2004 MT 167, 322 M 31, 97 P3d 1076 (2004), and St. v. McIntire, 2004 MT 238, 322 M 496, 97 P3d 576 (2004).

Restitution Adequately Documented in PSI Report and Information Submitted by Victim: Heath contended that the presentence investigation report (PSI) contained insufficient information to document his ability to pay restitution and the victim's pecuniary loss, citing St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098 (1994), St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866 (1999), and St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000). The Supreme Court distinguished Brown, Hilgers, and Pritchett on grounds that the PSI report deficiencies in those cases were not present in Heath's case. Rather, the court followed St. v. Flanagan, 2003 MT 123, 316 M 1, 68 P3d 796 (2003), and St. v. Dunkerson, 2003 MT 234, 317 M 228, 76 P3d 1085 (2003), finding that the PSI report adequately addressed Heath's employability, assets and debts, and capability of paying restitution. The valuation of the victim's pecuniary loss was adequately provided in documentation submitted by the victim and, coupled with expert testimony on the value of recovered items, provided substantial credible evidence upon which to base the restitution amount. St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004), followed in St. v. Eaton, 2004 MT 381, 325 M 92, 103 P3d 1068 (2004).

Lack of Remorse Not Sole Sentence Enhancement Factor — Incest Sentence Affirmed: Defendant contended that the sentencing court erred in augmenting a sentence for incest simply because defendant did not show remorse or admit guilt. The Supreme Court noted that St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002), prohibits enhancement of a sentence solely because a defendant is not remorseful or refuses to be accountable for the defendant's conduct. However, in this case, the sentencing court did not rely solely on defendant's attitude in enhancing the incest sentence but also considered defendant's risk of reoffending, risk to society, prospects for rehabilitation, character, background, history, and mental and physical functioning. Thus, Shreves was distinguishable, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. J.C., 2004 MT 75, 320 M 411, 87 P3d 501 (2004).

Addition of Written Sentencing Conditions Not Enunciated Orally at Hearing — Johnson Applied: Drube failed to complete a sex offender program, so the District Court revoked his suspended sentence and sentenced him to a 9-year term, with commitment to the Department of Corrections for the first 5 years and the remainder to be served at the state prison. The court specified that the prison portion of the sentence be suspended as long as Drube met sentencing conditions, including completion of a long-term aftercare program. Drube appealed the sentence on grounds that the court imposed a condition on the sentence that was impossible to fulfill and because the written revocation and sentencing order differed from the oral sentence enunciated at the sentencing hearing. Reviewing the sentence for legality, the Supreme Court affirmed. Drube presented nothing establishing that it would be impossible to complete the sex offender program within the reinstated 5-year commitment to the Department. Arguing that eight written conditions added to the suspended sentence by written order should be stricken, Drube cited St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), for the proposition that when written and oral sentences differ, the oral order prevails. The Supreme Court agreed with the general rule in Lane, but noted that the rule is not absolute. Under St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480 (2000), when deciding whether a subsequent written sentencing order is unlawful because it contains conditions not enunciated orally, the court first determines whether a defendant was afforded the opportunity to respond to the inclusion upon sufficient notice at hearing and second whether the portion of the written sentence substantively increases the defendant's loss of liberty and sacrifice of property. Here, all the conditions in the 2002 written revocation and sentencing order were contained either in Drube's original sentence or in a 2001 revocation and sentencing order and thus were not new or unknown to Drube, who had the opportunity to respond to the conditions placed on the sentence, nor did Drube present any argument that the eight conditions substantively increased the loss of liberty or sacrifice of property. Thus, the 2002 sentencing order was not rendered unlawful by the addition of conditions not imposed orally at the sentencing hearing. St. v. Drube, 2003 MT 138, 316 M 156, 69 P3d 1182 (2003).

Restitution as Condition of Suspended Sentence Proper Under 1997 Version of Sentencing Statute: The District Court suspended Flanagan's 10-year sentence for felony assault and required that Flanagan pay restitution. Flanagan asserted that St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001), precluded restitution as a condition of the suspended sentence. However, Horton was decided under the 1999 version of this section, while Flanagan was sentenced under the 1997 version in effect when the assault was committed, and the 1997 version expressly authorized payment of restitution as a condition of a suspended sentence. Thus, the District Court was affirmed on the issue. St. v. Flanagan, 2003 MT 123, 316 M 1, 68 P3d 796 (2003).

Sentence Based on Refusal to Admit Guilt Violative of Right Against Self-Incrimination: Shreves was convicted of deliberate homicide and sentenced to 100 years in prison, with no parole for 60 years. At trial, Shreves chose to testify on his own behalf and assert his innocence, and at sentencing, Shreves chose not to testify, but his counsel indicated that Shreves maintained his innocence. The District Court imposed the sentence based in significant part on Shreves' failure to show remorse or responsibility. Shreves appealed on grounds that it was improper to hold his refusal to admit to the crime against him in determining the sentence. The state contended that the sentencing court properly considered the lack of remorse as a factor relevant to Shreves' rehabilitation and the danger presented to the community and argued that the lack of remorse was based on trial testimony and evidence. The Supreme Court considered whether Shreves adequately invoked the right to maintain silence, the scope of the oral sentence that controlled over the subsequent written sentence as it related to the entire sentence, and the District Court's decision to base its sentence in large part on Shreves' refusal to admit to the crime. Although lack of remorse can be considered as a sentencing factor, a sentence that is based on a refusal to admit guilt cannot be upheld. Here, the Supreme Court was unable to find a sentencing distinction between punishing Shreves for remaining silent and the proper consideration of Shreves' failure to show remorse. A sentencing court may not draw a negative inference of lack of remorse from a defendant's silence at sentencing when the defendant has maintained innocence throughout the proceedings. Shreves was improperly penalized for maintaining his innocence pursuant to the constitutional right to remain silent. The sentence was therefore illegal. Shreves' conviction was reversed, and the case was remanded for resentencing. St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002), distinguished in St. v. J.C., 2004 MT 75, 320 M 411, 87 P3d 501 (2004), and St. v. Burkhart, 2004 MT 372, 325 M 27, 103 P3d 1037 (2004). See also St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979 (1991), St. v. Garcia, 2011 MT 130, 360 Mont. 537, 254 P.3d 589.

Conditioning Suspended Portion of Incarceration Sentence Upon Entering Into Plan to Pay Fine in Installments: The court conditioned suspension of half the incarceration term upon defendant's entering into a plan for payment of a fine in installments. The court did not impose the fine as a condition on the suspended portion of the incarceration term. Thus, the Sentence Review Board's elimination of the suspended portion of the incarceration term did not eliminate the obligation to pay the fine. St. v. George, 2002 MT 300, 313 M 11, 59 P3d 1151 (2002).

Deferral of Sentence to Allow Payment of Restitution Not Violative of Due Process Rights: Benoit was charged with felony theft and entered a nonbinding plea agreement to plead guilty in exchange for a recommendation for a 2-year deferred sentence, based on the possible imposition of various conditions, including the payment of restitution. Benoit was then convicted and ordered to repay $15,933.90 in restitution. At the restitution hearing, Benoit admitted that with her current take-home salary and expenses, the restitution could not be repaid in 2 years, so the sentencing court sentenced Benoit to a 6-year deferred sentence to allow time to pay the restitution, but gave Benoit the opportunity to withdraw the guilty plea after 2 years if restitution was paid within that time. Benoit appealed on grounds that increasing the deferred sentence was a violation of due process, citing St. v. Farrell, 207 M 483, 676 P2d 168 (1984), and St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000), and asserted that the sentence should be remanded for determination of a length of sentence consistent with the charge and Benoit's history instead of the ability to pay restitution. The Supreme Court distinguished Farrell and Pritchett, noting that Benoit's sentence was not based on indigency, and coupled with the fact that Benoit was given the opportunity to withdraw the guilty plea prior to the termination of the 6-year deferred sentence, Benoit's due process rights were not violated through imposition of the conditional 6-year deferred sentence. St. v. Benoit, 2002 MT 166, 310 M 449, 51 P3d 495 (2002).

Failure to Document Victim's Pecuniary Loss and Offender's Financial Resources and Ability to Pay Restitution — Restitution Condition Vacated: Muhammad was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with a minor. One condition of sentencing was a requirement that Muhammad pay $5,000 in restitution. Under this section, a sentencing judge shall require a defendant to pay full restitution to a victim if the judge finds that the victim has sustained a pecuniary loss. Imposition of restitution is subject to detailed statutory procedures and qualifications, which include documented evidence of the victim's loss and the offender's ability to pay. The sentencing court is required to specify the amount, method, and time of each payment to the victim. Here, the presentence investigation did not document the victim's pecuniary loss or Muhammad's future ability to pay restitution, nor did the sentencing court consider Muhammad's future ability to pay because the relevant evidence was not presented to the court. Therefore, the Supreme Court held that the restitution condition of the sentence was illegal, and that condition was vacated. St. v. Muhammad, 2002 MT 47, 309 M 1, 43 P3d 318 (2002), following St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000), and followed in St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007).

Plenary Review of Criminal Sentence by Supreme Court Even Though No Objection Made at Sentencing: Brister was sentenced to 20 years for felony sexual assault with 10 years suspended, served the 10-year prison sentence, and then was released and began the 10-year suspended sentence. About 6 years into the suspended sentence, Brister was arrested for felony theft and for violating various parole conditions. The District Court then revoked the suspended sentence and reimposed another 10-year suspended sentence to run consecutively with a 5-year felony theft sentence. The new suspended sentence included 26 additional conditions. Brister did not object to any of the conditions when they were imposed, but filed a motion objecting to the sentence 2 months later, claiming that the conditions were not and could not have been included in the original suspended sentence, and thus violated double jeopardy and ex post facto laws. The state maintained that Brister waived any objections to the conditions by failing to contemporaneously object when the sentence was pronounced, and that the appeal from the sentence was not timely filed. The Supreme Court disagreed and reversed. Under St. v. Lenihan, 184 M 338, 602 P2d 997 (1979), the court will review a sentence imposed in a criminal case if it is alleged that the sentence is illegal or exceeds statutory mandates, even if no objection is made at the time of sentencing. Further, Brister provided the District Court with an opportunity to correct any sentencing errors by filing an objection under 46-18-117 (now repealed), which allowed 120 days for correction of an illegal sentence, so Brister retained the right to appeal the purportedly illegal sentence. St. v. Brister, 2002 MT 13, 308 M 154, 41 P3d 314 (2002), overruling St. v. Taylor, 2000 MT 202, 300 M 499, 5 P3d 1019 (2000), St. v. St. John, 2001 MT 1, 304 M 47, 15 P3d 970 (2001), and St. v. Smith, 2001 MT 111, 305 M 298, 27 P3d 39 (2001), to the extent that those cases held that failure to raise a contemporaneous objection to an illegal sentence at the time of hearing resulted in waiver of defendant's objection, and followed in St. v. Muhammad, 2002 MT 47, 309 M 1, 43 P3d 318 (2002). See also St. v. Southwick, 2007 MT 257, 339 M 281, 169 P3d 698 (2007).

Question Whether Parole Denied for Failure to Satisfy Additional Treatment Conditions — Remand: Ringewold pleaded guilty to two counts of felony assault and was sentenced to a total of 14 years' commitment to the Department of Corrections. The next day, Ringewold was placed in the state hospital. The placement order allowed Ringewold to petition for a conditional release from the hospital, but did not specify any conditions. About 17 months later, Ringewold petitioned for release from the hospital. The state agreed that a hearing on the petition was proper, but argued that if it was found that Ringewold no longer suffered from a mental disease or defect that presented a risk to Ringewold or others, it was appropriate to remand Ringewold to the Department. The District Court ordered an independent mental evaluation, but it was never performed. Ringewold then filed another petition for release, but about the same time, the hospital staff determined that Ringewold would no longer benefit from active inpatient treatment and transferred him to the state prison pursuant to 46-14-312. At the request of counsel, Ringewold was transferred back to the state hospital, with the state conceding that hospital placement was proper and that Ringewold should be allowed to petition for release pursuant to 46-14-312. About 4 months later, the Department Director sought an order transferring Ringewold back to the prison on grounds that Ringewold continued to suffer from a dangerous mental disorder but would no longer benefit from active inpatient treatment for the disorder. At a conditional release hearing about 9 months later, the District Court orally resentenced Ringewold to 8 years in prison. The court specified that the total sentence not exceed more than the original sentence, but the court also conditioned Ringewold's parole on completion of an anger management course, moral reconnection therapy, and chemical dependence treatment. In a written amended judgment about 1 month later, the District Court reimposed the original 14-year sentence and restated the parole conditions. Ringewold appealed. The Supreme Court held that under St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), the oral pronouncement of sentence was legally effective and constituted final judgment. However, it was not possible to determine from the record whether the additional conditions added to the sentence improperly lengthened Ringewold's sentence, so the case was remanded for supplementation of the factual record to determine if Ringewold was being denied consideration for parole because of failure to satisfy the additional treatment conditions and, if so, to strike the conditions from the amended judgment, because under those circumstances, the practical effect of the conditions would be to lengthen the sentence in violation of 46-14-312. St. v. Ringewold, 2001 MT 185, 306 M 229, 32 P3d 729 (2001).

Failure to Complete Prison Sex Offender Program Not Because of Defendant's Willful Conduct — Consideration of Incarceration Alternatives Constitutionally Required: Lee was sentenced to two concurrent 40-year terms in prison for sexual intercourse without consent and attempted sexual intercourse without consent and was ineligible for parole during the first 10 years of the sentence unless a sex offender treatment plan was successfully completed. Lee entered prison in 1995 and immediately requested enrollment in Phase I of the two-phase program. Lee was finally enrolled in Phase I after a 3-year wait, successfully completed that phase, and was placed on a waiting list for enrollment in Phase II. Because of a sitdown strike, Lee was unable to complete Phase II by his scheduled release date. The state petitioned to revoke Lee's suspended sentence because the program was not completed, and Lee moved to dismiss on grounds that the failure to complete treatment was not his fault. The District Court found that Lee's failure to complete the program was not due to any volitional conduct on Lee's part, but the court nevertheless determined that the failure constituted a violation of the terms of the suspended sentence and ordered Lee to serve the remaining 30 years on each count, declaring Lee ineligible for parole until both phases of treatment were completed. Lee appealed on grounds that the court violated his right to due process because it was impossible to complete the program during incarceration because of prison waiting periods and the length of the program. The Supreme Court agreed. In St. v. Williams, 1999 MT 240, 296 M 258, 993 P2d 1 (1999), it was held that a court could revoke a suspended sentence even though a probationer's failure to comply with the terms of the sentence was not willful, and the court in this case affirmed Williams to the extent that violations of nonfinancial probationary conditions need not necessarily be willful in order to justify revocation. However, the probationer in Williams was unable to gain acceptance into sex offender programs because of a lack of social skills, immaturity, and "acting out" behavior, whereas Lee was unable to access the programs because of actions of the state. Due process required the trial court to consider whether there were alternatives to incarceration that would further the purpose of Lee's suspended sentence. The Supreme Court remanded for a determination of whether there were any reasonable alternative measures other than continued incarceration because to do otherwise would deprive Lee of his conditional freedom simply because the state prevented him from completing the sex offender program while imprisoned. St. v. Lee, 2001 MT 176, 306 M 173, 31 P3d 998 (2001), and distinguished in St. v. Price, 2008 MT 319, 346 M 106, 193 P3d 921 (2008).

Order Not to Socialize With Females Under Age 19 Improperly Imposed as Condition of Sentence for Assault of Police Officer: Watson was sentenced to 50 years with 40 suspended for assaulting a police officer. As a condition of the suspended sentence, Watson was ordered not to socialize with females under the age of 19. Watson objected to the condition, and the Supreme Court reversed. Under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), in order to be reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of the victim and society, a sentencing limitation or condition must have some correlation or connection to the underlying offense for which the defendant is being sentenced. Watson's crime did not involve young girls, and he was never charged with any offense in which the victim was a young girl. The fact that the District Court sincerely believed in the speculation that Watson would sooner or later victimize a young girl did not provide a legal basis for imposing a sentencing condition that was unconnected to the underlying offense. St. v. Watson, 2001 MT 143, 306 M 33, 29 P3d 1026 (2001).

Attendance at Parenting Classes Improperly Imposed as Condition of Sentence for Parole Violation: Smith violated parole, and in addition to a sentence for new jail time, Smith was required to attend parenting classes and to pay the costs of incarceration as a condition of sentencing. Smith argued on appeal that the sentencing court exceeded its authority by imposing the new conditions. The Supreme Court agreed that requiring attendance at parenting classes was improper. Applying St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), the court found no nexus between the underlying charged offenses of felony theft, burglary, and unauthorized control of a motor vehicle and a requirement of participation in parenting classes. Although the classes may have been beneficial to Smith and his family, they could not be made a condition of the sentence when they bore no relation to the conduct for which Smith was convicted. The court reversed on that issue. However, because Smith did not object to the payment of incarceration costs at the revocation hearing, that issue could not be raised for the first time on appeal, so that portion of the sentence was affirmed. St. v. Smith, 2001 MT 111, 305 M 298, 27 P3d 39 (2001).

Payment of Child Support Improper Condition of Sentence for Felony DUI — Victim and Correlation to Underlying Offense Necessary for Imposition of Restitution: Horton was arrested for DUI, and a search of his driving record revealed nine prior DUI convictions. A further search showed that Horton also owed more than $47,000 in back child support. Horton was charged with felony DUI, with driving with a suspended or revoked license, as a habitual traffic offender operating a motor vehicle, and with felony nonsupport. By plea agreement, Horton agreed to plead guilty to the traffic offenses in exchange for dismissal of the nonsupport charge. The plea agreement stated that the state would recommend a 13-month sentence to be served in prerelease, followed by 4 years of probation, and, as a condition of the probationary sentence, provided that Horton would also make regular child support payments plus an additional sum monthly toward the support arrearage. As set out in the agreement, Horton pleaded guilty to the traffic offenses, and the nonsupport charge was dismissed. At sentencing, the habitual traffic offender charge was subsequently dismissed for failure of the state to prove that a valid habitual offender designation was in place at the time of the offense, and in addition, Horton's counsel objected to the court ordering payment of any child support arrearage, arguing that because the nonsupport charge had been dismissed, Horton would be paying restitution on a count for which he had not been convicted. Nevertheless, the court ordered Horton to pay support and promised to revoke his probation and sentence him to 4 years in prison with no parole if support was not paid. On appeal, Horton argued that the District Court abused its discretion and exceeded statutory mandates when it required him to pay restitution for an offense that was dismissed, citing St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098 (1994), for the position that restitution is statutorily limited to the victim of the crime and that because there was no victim who sustained pecuniary or economic loss as a result of the felony DUI or driving with a suspended or revoked license, restitution was inappropriate. The state argued that Horton was attempting to receive the benefit of the plea agreement—having the felony nonsupport charge dismissed—without holding up his end of the bargain by paying child support. The Supreme Court noted that a plea agreement is subject to contract law and that the court will not assist a defendant in escaping the obligations of a plea agreement once its benefits are received. However, the court also pointed out that a District Court's authority to impose sentences in criminal cases is defined and constrained by statute. The statutory authority for payment of restitution is in this section, which limits payment of restitution to the victim of a crime for which a defendant is convicted, and because Horton was not convicted of nonsupport, there was no victim to whom Horton could be ordered to pay restitution. The state also contended that ordering Horton to pay child support was proper because under 46-18-202(1), a sentencing court may impose any condition reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of the victim and society. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), a sentencing condition must have some correlation or connection to the underlying offense, but there was no correlation or connection between Horton's conviction for DUI and ordering him to pay child support. Thus, the Supreme Court ordered that the portion of Horton's sentence requiring payment of child support be stricken. St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001), followed in St. v. Setters, 2001 MT 101, 305 M 253, 25 P3d 893 (2001).

Revocation of Juvenile Offender's Suspended Sentence and Commitment to Department Authorized: Following a dispositional hearing, the Youth Court entered an order declaring Lesmeister a delinquent youth and serious juvenile offender, transferred the 18 year old's case to District Court, and placed the youth on probation until age 25, with the entire commitment suspended upon certain conditions. One year later, on a petition filed by the Cascade County Attorney alleging numerous probation violations, the District Court revoked Lesmeister's suspended sentence and committed the youth to the Department of Corrections until age 25. On appeal, Lesmeister challenged the legality of the court's commitment to the Department, arguing that 41-5-208 authorizes the District Court to impose only those conditions provided for in 46-18-201 through 46-18-203, which does not include a sentence to the Department of Corrections. In affirming the District Court decision, the Supreme Court ruled that state law authorizes a District Court to impose a sentence to commit an offender to the Department of Corrections when all but the first 5 years are suspended. St. v. Lesmeister, 2000 MT 318, 302 M 500, 15 P3d 392, 57 St. Rep. 1344 (2000).

Conditions Imposed in Written Judgment and Sentence Different From Those Imposed in Oral Sentence — Lane, Waters, and Simpson Reviewed — Test to Determine Which New Conditions Lawful or Unlawful — Payment of Restitution and Costs: Johnson was sentenced orally for writing bad checks and later contended that four of the conditions imposed in the written judgment and sentence by the District Court were unlawful under St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), because they were not announced orally when she was sentenced in open court. The Supreme Court reviewed its decisions in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142 (1999), and St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361 (1999), and reasoned that a written sentence would be held unlawful only if it substantively increased the defendant's loss of liberty or the defendant's sacrifice of property. Under this test, the Supreme Court held that two of the four penalties not mentioned by the District Court in its oral pronouncement of Johnson's sentence were unlawful, those being the restitution ordered to the Missoula County jail of money expended for Johnson's medical care and the requirement that Johnson pay for the costs of her prosecution in District Court. The Supreme Court held that the other two parts of the written sentence, the requirement that Johnson make restitution from money earned in prison and the imposition of certain "civil" restrictions as conditions of Johnson's suspended sentence, such as the requirement that Johnson stay out of gambling casinos, were lawfully imposed because they did not increase the amount of money that Johnson was ordered to pay or increase Johnson's deprivation of liberty in addition to those penalties imposed orally. The requirement for payment from prison earnings only specified where the money was to come from, and the "civil" restrictions were largely mentioned by the District Court at Johnson's sentencing hearing. St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000), followed in St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

Failure to Document Defendant's Financial Resources and Ability to Pay Restitution and Victim's Pecuniary Loss — Restitution Sentence Improper: The general mandate to sentencing courts is that a sentence must include full restitution whenever it is found that the victim of an offense has sustained a pecuniary loss, subject to mandatory detailed statutory procedures and qualifications. Here, although the District Court received some evidence of these amounts during the sentencing hearing, the failure of the presentence investigation report to document the victim's pecuniary loss, as well as the defendant's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, provided the court no authority to impose a sentence of restitution and rendered its judgment illegal. St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000), following St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098 (1994), and St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866 (1999), distinguished in St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Failure to Specify Amount, Method, and Time of Payment — Restitution Order Invalid: The District Court ordered defendant to make restitution payments according to a schedule to be determined by defendant's probation officer. However, 46-18-244 requires the court to specify the amount, method, and time of payments, after considering the defendant's financial resources and future ability to pay. Thus, the court failed to comply with the statutory requirements by leaving that determination to the discretion of the probation officer, invalidating the restitution order. St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000).

Sentence of Restitution Based on Defendant's Indigency Constituting Due Process Violation: Pritchett entered the garage of a former employer in an effort to return two hunting rifles that he had stolen and pawned to support his gambling habit. Pritchett dropped his flashlight and, unable to find it in the dark, lit a cigarette lighter, which ignited a leaking propane bottle and caused an explosion that destroyed the garage and its contents. Pritchett was convicted of burglary and ordered to pay restitution of $63,569.25. Noting that the amount of restitution was "enormous", the probation officer who prepared the presentence investigation report stated that Pritchett should receive a 20-year suspended sentence to allow adequate time to pay off the restitution. The District Court adopted the sentencing recommendation exactly as proposed. Although the court did not expressly state that it was sentencing Pritchett to the maximum term to provide sufficient time to pay the ordered restitution, there was sufficient evidence in the record to show that the length of the sentence was based on Pritchett's indigency because, given Pritchett's limited financial resources, no shorter time would allow payment of restitution. Under St. v. Farrell, 207 M 483, 676 P2d 168 (1984), basing a prison term on a defendant's indigency is a violation of the right to due process. Thus, the Supreme Court vacated the sentence and remanded for further proceedings. St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000).

Failure to Complete Sexual Offender Treatment Sufficient to Warrant Suspended Sentence Revocation and Continued Incarceration: Vallier received 5 years for felony assault and 20 years for felony sexual assault of an 11-year-old child, with 10 years suspended if Vallier completed the prison sexual offender program. Vallier failed to complete the program by the time of scheduled discharge of the active sentence, so the District Court revoked the suspended portion of the sentence, further classifying Vallier as a level 3 sexual offender at a high risk to reoffend. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, finding Vallier's failure to complete the sexual offender program of such a nature as to require Vallier's continued incarceration. Sufficient evidence was offered to prove that Vallier continued to be a serious community threat until the treatment was received, and Vallier did not meet the burden of showing that the District Court abused its discretion in revoking the suspended sentence. St. v. Vallier, 2000 MT 225, 301 M 228, 8 P3d 112, 57 St. Rep. 928 (2000).

Defendant Not Responsible for Restitution in Excess of Damages Caused by Criminal Conduct: During the course of a drug investigation, Beavers admitted accepting stolen property in exchange for illegal drugs. The District Court ordered Beavers to pay restitution to the victims of the thefts, even though Beavers did not actually steal the property. Under St. v. Blanchard, 270 M 11, 889 P2d 1180 (1995), an accused is liable for restitution for offenses to which the accused has admitted guilt, been found guilty, or has agreed to pay restitution, so Beavers was not responsible for restitution for offenses she did not commit. Beavers' admission of the offense of receiving stolen property was sufficient to satisfy the causal standard of 46-18-241, that the victim suffered loss as a result of Beavers' offense, so the court did not abuse its discretion in ordering restitution; however, Beavers was required to pay restitution only for the property that formed the basis of the offense, not for property that was stolen by others but not received and possessed by Beavers. When stolen property is recovered, the amount of restitution owed is the difference between the value of the property taken and the salvage value of the property returned, and the state has the burden of establishing those values. The case was remanded for calculation of the amount of restitution owed. St. v. Beavers, 2000 MT 145, 300 M 49, 3 P3d 614, 57 St. Rep. 567 (2000).

New Sentence Restriction Added Upon Revocation of Suspended Sentence Stricken: If a District Court finds that a defendant has violated the terms or conditions of a suspended sentence, the court may revoke the suspended sentence and require the defendant to serve either the sentence imposed or any lesser sentence, but nothing in 46-18-203 authorizes a court to impose additional restrictions when revoking a suspended sentence. (See 2001 amendment to this section, which allows it.) In this case, the District Court originally sentenced Richardson to 20 years in prison for felony sexual assault against a child, with all but 70 days suspended, conditioned in part upon completion of a sex offender treatment program. Richardson failed treatment and admitted violating other conditions of the suspended sentence, so the sentence was revoked, and Richardson was sentenced to prison for the remainder of the 20-year sentence. Additionally, the court conditioned Richardson's parole eligibility upon successful completion of the first two phases of sexual offender treatment in prison. The additional restriction on the sentence was error, and the case was remanded for the limited purpose of striking that condition from the sentence. St. v. Richardson, 2000 MT 72, 299 M 102, 997 P2d 786, 57 St. Rep. 320 (2000), following St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997).

When Restitution Owing: Under this section, the sentencing court is required to provide for full restitution by a defendant to the victim of a criminal offense who sustains a pecuniary loss. Here, Hilgers' issuance of more than 50 bad checks and stealing cash and diverting checks and money orders from his employer in an amount exceeding $33,500 clearly qualified as a pecuniary loss. The court found the state's witnesses more credible than Hilgers, providing adequate support in the record as to the amount owing. The restitution amount was not clearly erroneous and was affirmed on appeal. However, the Supreme Court remanded for lack of documentation, as required under 46-18-242, regarding Hilgers' financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, finding the information in the presentence report regarding Hilgers' age, education, assets and obligations, and marital and employment status inadequate in addressing Hilgers' resources and ability to pay the amount in question. St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866, 56 St. Rep. 1146 (1999), following St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996), distinguishing St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098, 51 St. Rep. 24 (1994), followed in St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000), and distinguished in St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Suspension of Sentence and Imposition of Sentence Conditions Within Discretion of Sentencing Court: Both the suspension of sentence and the imposition of conditions on a suspended sentence are discretionary with the sentencing court. Although it may be uncommon for a court to suspend part or all of a sentence without attaching conditions, it is within the court's discretion to do so. Here, the sentencing court orally sentenced Simpson to 30 years in prison with 10 years suspended, recommending that Simpson be required to complete a chemical dependency program before being eligible for parole and that appropriate measures be taken to prevent Simpson from assaulting prison staff. When the court issued its written sentence, it imposed 20 additional conditions that were not articulated in the oral pronouncement. Pursuant to St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), the oral pronouncement controls, so the additional conditions in the written sentence were held invalid and the case was reversed to conform the written sentence with the oral pronouncement. St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361, 56 St. Rep. 1032 (1999), following St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999).

Extra Conditions in Sentencing Order Not Mentioned in Oral Sentence Stricken: The District Court that sentenced Waters imposed two extra conditions in the sentencing order that were not contained in the plea agreement or presentence investigation or contained in the oral sentence: (1) payment of supervision fees; and (2) submission to Texas authorities. Pursuant to St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), the oral pronouncement controls. Thus, Waters contended that only the conditions contained in the oral sentence could be imposed. The Supreme Court clarified Lane, noting that Waters was on notice of the conditions in the plea agreement and presentence investigation and that those terms applied despite the ambiguous sentencing conditions that were imposed orally. However, the court remanded for an amendment of the written sentence to strike the submission to Texas authorities, which was never mentioned, and to strike the payment of supervision fees as well, unless it was determined that payment of the fees would not impose a significant hardship on Waters, pursuant to 46-23-1031. St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999), followed in St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000), and St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

Sentencing Condition Required to Have Correlation or Connection to Underlying Offense: Ommundson pleaded guilty to felony DUI. In imposing sentence, the District Court considered a presentence investigation that documented Ommundson's criminal history, which included more than 10 convictions for indecent exposure. The court also considered a sex offender evaluation, which determined that Ommundson qualified for community-based treatment. The court committed Ommundson to the Department of Corrections for 54 months, with all but 6 months suspended on condition that Ommundson participate in a sex offender treatment program and not have any contact with children without adult supervision. Ommundson did not object to the condition prohibiting contact with children, so that issue was not cognizable on appeal. However, on the issue of whether the District Court had authority to impose a condition of participation in a sex offender program as a penalty for DUI, the Supreme Court held that 46-18-202 allows only the imposition of sentencing limitations reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of the victim and society. That authority is broad, but not without limit. In order to be reasonably related, a sentencing limitation or condition must have some correlation or connection to the underlying offense for which the defendant is being sentenced. In the present case, the requirement that Ommundson participate in a sex offender program was not reasonably related to the rehabilitation of a DUI offender or to the protection of society from drunk drivers. The Supreme Court reversed the part of Ommundson's sentence requiring that he participate in a sex offender program. St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620, 56 St. Rep. 70 (1999), following St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982), and St. v. Black, 245 M 39, 798 P2d 530, 47 St. Rep. 1677 (1990), distinguishing Dahlman v. District Court, 215 M 470, 698 P2d 423, 42 St. Rep. 550 (1985), St. v. Shaver, 233 M 438, 760 P2d 1230, 45 St. Rep. 1617 (1988), and St. v. Blanchard, 270 M 11, 889 P2d 1180, 52 St. Rep. 54 (1995), and followed in St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001), St. v. Setters, 2001 MT 101, 305 M 253, 25 P3d 893 (2001), St. v. Smith, 2001 MT 111, 305 M 298, 27 P3d 39 (2001), St. v. Watson, 2001 MT 143, 306 M 33, 29 P3d 1026 (2001), and St. v. Armstrong, 2006 MT 334, 335 M 131, 151 P3d 46 (2006). In St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008), the Ommundson nexus rule was expanded to allow a sentencing judge to impose a particular condition of probation as long as the condition has a nexus either to the offense for which the offender is being sentenced or to the offender. However, offender-related conditions may be imposed only in cases in which the history or pattern of conduct to be restricted is recent and significant or chronic. A passing, isolated, or stale instance of behavior or conduct is insufficient to support a restrictive probation condition imposed in the name of offender rehabilitation. Ashby was followed in St. v. Stiles, 2008 MT 390, 347 M 95, 197 P3d 966 (2008), St. v. Sadowsky, 2008 MT 405, 347 M 192, 197 P3d 1018 (2008), and St. v. Mehan, 2019 MT 100, 395 Mont. 383, 440 P.3d 25.

Discovery of Shotgun Case During Routine Walk-Through of Probationer's Residence Constituting Reasonable Grounds for Further Warrantless Search: Probationer Stucker allowed a voluntary tour of his residence by probation officers, who discovered two weapons cases in plain view in the master bedroom. One case contained a bow, which Stucker was allowed to possess under the terms of his probation; the other contained a semiautomatic shotgun, which constituted contraband under the probation conditions. The discovery of the shotgun case in plain view constituted reasonable grounds for the officers to conduct a warrantless search of the residence to determine if additional weapons were present. The District Court did not err in denying Stucker's motion to suppress the fruits of the search. St. v. Stucker, 1999 MT 14, 293 M 123, 973 P2d 835, 56 St. Rep. 65 (1999).

Oral Pronouncement as Legally Effective Sentence — Correction of Error in Written Judgment by Nunc Pro Tunc Order — Due Process and Double Jeopardy Rights Not Violated: The oral pronouncement of sentence is the legally effective sentence. The written judgment and commitment serves as evidence of the sentence orally pronounced. In the event of a conflict between the oral and written sentence, the oral controls. The sentencing court may correct an error in a written judgment and commitment by a nunc pro tunc order, pursuant to 46-18-117 (now repealed), to accurately reflect what was orally pronounced at the sentencing hearing. Absent evidence of a tangible detriment or concrete injury to defendant, a clarifying nunc pro tunc order does not jeopardize a defendant's due process rights or constitute double jeopardy. St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), overruling St. v. Enfinger, 222 M 438, 722 P2d 1170 (1986), St. v. Wirtala, 231 M 264, 752 P2d 177 (1988), St. v. Mason, 253 M 419, 833 P2d 1058 (1992), and St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915 P2d 184 (1996), to the extent that those cases held that the written judgment and commitment, rather than the oral pronouncement of sentence, was to be considered the final, valid order, and followed and applied retroactively in St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361, 56 St. Rep. 1032 (1999). The Supreme Court amended former Rule 5, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), to reflect the Lane decision in In re Amending Rule 5 of the Mont. Rules of Appellate Procedure, 55 St. Rep. 1267 (1998). The Lane rule was applied retroactively in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999). Lane was also followed in St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001), and St. v. Ringewold, 2001 MT 185, 306 M 229, 32 P3d 729 (2001). See also St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000), and St. v. Cleveland, 2018 MT 199, 392 Mont. 338, 423 P.3d 1074.

Abuse of Discretion for Court to Correct Failure to Sentence by Nunc Pro Tunc Order: The District Court failed to sentence Winterrowd, in either open court or by written judgment, on his misdemeanor theft conviction. Four months later, the court issued an order nunc pro tunc, sentencing Winterrowd to 6 months' imprisonment. It is within a District Court's power to enter an order nunc pro tunc modifying or amending a judgment in order to remedy certain types of clerical errors or to make the record reflect what was actually decided. However, in this case, not only was the sentence omitted from the written sentencing order, but the sentence was not even discussed at the sentencing hearing. The Supreme Court reversed and vacated the nunc pro tunc order and sentence. St. v. Winterrowd, 1998 MT 74, 288 M 208, 957 P2d 522, 55 St. Rep. 307 (1998).

Reservation of Right to Specify Ineligibility for Parole Upon Subsequent Revocation of Suspended Sentence — Lack of Authority in District Court: When Lindeman was sentenced for sexual assault and incest, the District Court reserved the right, in the event that Lindeman ever violated a condition of probation and his suspended sentence was imposed, to specify that Lindeman would be ineligible for parole until he completed a sex offender treatment program. When Lindeman failed to complete the program and the state requested that Lindeman's probation be revoked and the suspended sentence imposed, Lindeman objected to the District Court's imposition of the condition preventing parole. The Supreme Court held that under St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996), the only punishment that the District Court could impose was the suspended sentence or a lesser penalty and that the District Court was without authority to impose the additional condition. The Supreme Court noted that 46-18-202, the statutory provision relied upon by the District Court when it reserved the right to impose the condition, applies only to the original sentence under this section and that the District Court had no authority to impose the condition upon subsequently revoking the suspended sentence. St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997), followed, with regard to the impropriety of new sentence restrictions added upon revocation, in St. v. Richardson, 2000 MT 72, 299 M 102, 997 P2d 786, 57 St. Rep. 320 (2000).

Improper to Reserve Right, at Time of Sentencing, to Impose Additional Restrictions on Probation: The District Court, which sentenced defendant to an imprisonment term and suspended the sentence, had no authority to reserve the right to impose additional restrictions during the term of probation. St. v. Wilson, 279 M 34, 926 P2d 712, 53 St. Rep. 1034 (1996).

"Street Time" While on Out-of-State Probation Properly Denied: In 1989, Hardy pleaded guilty to four counts of burglary and was sentenced to four concurrent terms of 10 years in prison with 9 years suspended. In 1990, Hardy was released on probation to serve the suspended portion of his sentence, and pursuant to the Uniform Act for Out-of-State Parolee Supervision, supervision of his parole was transferred to Utah. While in Utah, Hardy committed other crimes, and Utah refused to continue parole supervision. After judgment and sentencing in Utah, Hardy was extradited back to Montana where his suspended sentence was revoked, he was sentenced to four concurrent terms of 9 years in prison, and he was not given credit for the 2 years he spent on probation in Utah. Hardy contended that the District Court improperly denied credit for his "street time" while on probation in Utah when it failed to sufficiently set forth reasons for the denial in the record. The denial of credit for Hardy's street time was an express provision of his sentence. The reasons for the sentence included the reasons for the denial of credit. The District Court adequately considered this section and sufficiently stated its reasons for denying the credit. Therefore, Hardy was not arbitrarily denied credit for his street time. St. v. Hardy, 278 M 516, 926 P2d 700, 53 St. Rep. 998 (1996).

Racial Bias of Judge Who Illegally Made Deportation Condition of Parole Not Shown by Mere Unsupported Speculation: Upon an aggravated kidnapping and assault conviction of a native of Bangladesh, the court ordered deportation as a condition of parole. This was an illegal condition but did not alone show the judge was racially biased against defendant. A claim of bias was not upheld when it was supported by mere speculation or conjecture by defendant. St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996).

Restitution Not Conditioned on Suspended or Deferred Sentence — Restitution Upheld as Additional Restrictions on Sentence: Collier was arrested and charged with solicitation of deliberate homicide, which was reduced to criminal endangerment by a plea bargain. At the District Court level and on appeal, Collier challenged the District Court's recommendation that she be required to make restitution if she was released on parole or supervised release. The Supreme Court noted that it had previously held in St. v. Bourne, 259 M 274, 856 P2d 222 (1993), that a District Court has the power under 46-18-202 to recommend restitution and payment of supervision fees as a condition of parole. St. v. Collier, 277 M 46, 919 P2d 376, 53 St. Rep. 534 (1996).

Illegal Search of Person but Lawful Search of Vehicle — Vehicle Search Upheld as Probation Search and Not "Fruit of Poisonous Tree": Deputy Turner watched New make several turns in his vehicle without signaling and, after determining by his vehicle license plate that New was on probation, stopped the vehicle and searched New. Upon discovering drugs in New's pocket, Turner impounded the vehicle. Detective Jacobs questioned New, and New gave Jacobs approval to search the vehicle. Then Jacobs talked to Forsyth, New's probation officer, who conducted the search of New's vehicle with Jacobs. Turner's search of New's pockets was subsequently held illegal but the District Court refused to quash evidence taken from the vehicle as a result of Forsyth's search. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the search of the vehicle was not the "fruit of the poisonous tree", the illegal personal search of New, but was justified upon the independent grounds that Forsyth had previously determined that he wanted to search New's vehicle because of pending charges of violations of the conditions of New's probation. St. v. New, 276 M 529, 917 P2d 919, 53 St. Rep. 510 (1996).

Revocation of Suspension of Part of Sentence While Nonsuspended Part Being Served: The District Court had authority to revoke suspension of part of a sentence when, prior to having begun to serve the suspended part, the prisoner was released on parole before serving the whole of the nonsuspended part of the sentence and violated conditions of probation relating to the suspended part. Christofferson v. St., 272 M 518, 901 P2d 588, 52 St. Rep. 909 (1995).

Error to Impose Prosecution Legal Fees as Condition of Suspended Sentence: Henry was convicted of driving under the influence, first in City Court and then in District Court. As part of Henry's suspended sentence, the District Court imposed certain conditions, including payment of $10,550 to the town of Darby for legal fees incurred in prosecuting the case and for additional legal fees incurred in defending the appeal. The Supreme Court held that the imposition of prosecution legal fees is neither expressly nor implicitly authorized by statute and that the District Court abused its discretion in imposing the payment of prosecution legal fees as a condition of Henry's suspended sentence. St. v. Henry, 271 M 491, 898 P2d 1195, 52 St. Rep. 516 (1995).

Requiring Defendant to Pay Restitution for Admitted Offenses for Which Defendant Is Not Charged or Convicted: Blanchard argued that the lower court erred in requiring him, as part of the plea bargain, to pay restitution for offenses that he admitted committing but for which he was never charged or convicted. The Supreme Court held that the issue is one of first impression in Montana but that other jurisdictions have held that an accused is liable for restitution for offenses admitted to even if the accused is not charged or convicted of the crimes and especially in cases in which the accused has agreed to pay the restitution as part of a plea bargain. The Supreme Court also held that the lower court had not erred in ordering the restitution when it was intended to serve a rehabilitative purpose. St. v. Blanchard, 270 M 11, 889 P2d 1180, 52 St. Rep. 54 (1995), followed in St. v. Beavers, 2000 MT 145, 300 M 49, 3 P3d 614, 57 St. Rep. 567 (2000). See also St. v. Simpson, 2014 MT 175, 375 Mont. 393, 328 P.3d 1144, disallowing restitution for offenses to which the defendant did not admit and for which the defendant was not charged or convicted.

Completion of Sexual Offender Treatment Program Proper Condition of Sentence for Sex Crime: The District Court did not err in requiring the completion of a sex offender treatment program as a condition of sentence upon conviction for sexual assault when the condition related to defendant's need for rehabilitation and to the protection of society. St. v. Larson, 266 M 28, 878 P2d 886, 51 St. Rep. 638 (1994).

Restitution Order for Present Asset Forfeiture Reversed — Condition of Present Sentence Void: Brown was convicted of felony criminal endangerment and negligent homicide after killing one pedestrian and injuring another when he lost control of his vehicle. The District Court sentenced Brown to a 30-year prison term, with 10 years suspended, and ordered Brown to make restitution. As part of the order for restitution, the District Court ordered that several of Brown's assets be sold and that the proceeds be turned over to his victims. The Supreme Court held that the statutory provisions relied on by the District Court to impose forfeiture were improperly relied on in that they limited the District Court only to conditions that could be imposed during the suspended portion of Brown's sentence. Because Brown was required to first serve a prison term, forfeiture could not be immediately ordered. St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098, 51 St. Rep. 24 (1994).

180 Days Maximum Total Jail Time Allowed — No Power to Impose Sentence in Absence of Specific Statutory Authority: The District Court erred when it ordered a suspended sentence that included 30 days in jail plus a possible additional 180 days in jail to be served at the discretion of the supervising probation officer. Maximum jail time allowed under this section is 180 days. Further, 46-18-202, which allows additional restrictions on sentence, does not authorize a District Court to delegate sentencing discretion to a probation officer. St. v. Hatfield, 256 M 340, 846 P2d 1025, 50 St. Rep. 101 (1993), followed in St. v. Long, 274 M 228, 907 P2d 945, 52 St. Rep. 1204 (1995), and St. v. Phelps, 2000 MT 18, 298 M 135, 995 P2d 963, 57 St. Rep. 105 (2000).

Warrantless Search by Probation Officer Lawful if Based on Reasonable Suspicion of Probation Violation: Defendant's deferred sentence was revoked after a warrantless search initiated by her probation officer pursuant to the terms of her probation revealed that defendant possessed dangerous drugs in violation of the terms of her probation. Search by a probation officer of his probationer's car, premises, or other belongings is lawful if it is based on the probation officer's reasonable suspicion of a probation violation. St. v. Small, 235 M 309, 767 P2d 316, 46 St. Rep. 9 (1989), followed in St. v. New, 276 M 529, 917 P2d 919, 53 St. Rep. 510 (1996), and St. v. Olmsted, 1998 MT 301, 292 M 66, 968 P2d 1154, 55 St. Rep. 1235 (1998).

Warrantless Police Search of Probationers' Car and Residence Allowed — Reasonable Grounds Standard — Fogarty Overruled: A police officer's warrantless search of the probationers' car and residence based on the officer's observations and with permission of the probation officer, in compliance with probationary conditions, did not violate the fourth amendment. St. v. Fogarty, 187 M 393, 610 P2d 140 (1980), is specifically overruled and the "reasonable grounds" standard of Griffin v. Wis., 483 US 868, 97 L Ed 2d 709, 107 S Ct 3164 (1987), is adopted. Police cooperation with probation officers is to be encouraged as an important aid to effective administration of the probation system. To impose a warrant requirement for residential searches, on the basis of rights enjoyed by persons not on probation, would artificially raise a probationer's privacy interest to a level inconsistent with conditional liberty status. St. v. Burke, 235 M 165, 766 P2d 254, 45 St. Rep. 2278 (1988), clarified, regarding the fact that probation officers, other than the one assigned to a probationer, are not precluded from authorizing a probationary search, in St. v. Olmsted, 1998 MT 301, 292 M 66, 968 P2d 1154, 55 St. Rep. 1235 (1998), and followed in St. v. Boston, 269 M 300, 889 P2d 814, 51 St. Rep. 1142 (1994), St. v. Burchett, 277 M 192, 921 P2d 854, 53 St. Rep. 590 (1996), St. v. Beaudry, 282 M 225, 937 P2d 459, 54 St. Rep. 324 (1997), St. v. Stucker, 1999 MT 14, 293 M 123, 973 P2d 835, 56 St. Rep. 65 (1999), St. v. Moody, 2006 MT 305, 334 M 517, 148 P3d 662 (2006), and St. v. Fischer, 2014 MT 112, 374 Mont. 533, 323 P.3d 891.

Child Support as Restitution and Condition of Probation: Child support violations were noted in the presentence investigation. Defendant should have known that they might be considered by the court, so there was no due process violation. The District Court properly ordered payment of child support as a form of restitution and rehabilitation and as a legitimate condition of parole. St. v. Shaver, 233 M 438, 760 P2d 1230, 45 St. Rep. 1617 (1988).

Order to Complete Sex Offender Program Not Abuse of Discretion: It was not an abuse of discretion for the sentencing judge to order defendant to complete a sex offender program despite expert testimony that defendant was not likely to benefit from the program. St. v. Pease, 233 M 65, 758 P2d 764, 45 St. Rep. 1296 (1988).

Inability to Pay Restitution — Not Violative of Equal Protection in Light of State Correctional Policy and Previous Offenses: A defendant convicted of felony theft was sentenced to 5 years in the state prison with 2 years suspended and, in addition, was ordered to pay restitution. The defendant asserted on appeal that he was sentenced to a prison term because of his indigency, in violation of his right to equal protection. However, the District Judge specifically noted the prison term was necessary to protect the property of others and that the defendant's criminal record contained three previous misdemeanor thefts. The Supreme Court found these to be sufficient reasons to support incarceration and upheld the state's correctional policy outlined in 46-18-101. The court noted that the sentence was well within the parameters of punishment for felony theft in 45-6-301. Finding no abuse of discretion or violation of the defendant's constitutional rights, the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Carroll, 220 M 466, 716 P2d 212, 43 St. Rep. 531 (1986).

Error in Sentencing Order — Correction "Nunc Pro Tunc" Two Years Later Upheld: The District Court, as a condition of sentence, ordered defendant to pay certain medical expenses and called the required payment "restitution" in the order. The payment was not restitution, but the court did have statutory authority to require payment. The court's effort to correct nunc pro tunc the original order 2 years after it was entered was proper. The error was clerical in nature. Every court has the inherent right to correct clerical errors. Dahlman v. District Court, 215 M 470, 698 P2d 423, 42 St. Rep. 550 (1985).

Medical Expenses for Self-Inflicted Injuries — Payment by Defendant Reasonable Condition of Sentence: A sentencing court acted properly in ordering a defendant to reimburse a local government for medical expenses incurred for injuries defendant inflicted upon himself while in jail after his arrest. This section permits the imposition of reasonable conditions on sentences for rehabilitation purposes. Dahlman v. District Court, 215 M 470, 698 P2d 423, 42 St. Rep. 550 (1985).

Valid Condition of Sentence — Incorrect Basis Given in Order — Condition Upheld: When there was statutory authority to require defendant, as part of his sentence, to pay the medical expenses incurred for injuries he inflicted upon himself while in jail after his arrest, but neither the District Court's original order nor corrected order cited the proper authority, the Supreme Court held defendant liable for the medical expenses. Dahlman v. District Court, 215 M 470, 698 P2d 423, 42 St. Rep. 550 (1985).

Restitution — Persons Not Direct Victims of Specified Crime: To be eligible for restitution by one convicted of a crime, one must be within the class of persons injured by the crime. This section's provision for restitution does not define the class or state its breadth, but the Crime Victims Compensation Act of Montana defines a victim as, among other things, one who suffers bodily injury or death as a result of criminally injurious conduct, without the necessity of a direct relationship to a crime for which a conviction was obtained. That is a persuasive approach, and where defendant driver was convicted of negligent homicide, killing two persons in the other auto, it was proper to order him to make restitution to three girls who were also in the other auto and were injured but not killed. St. v. Morgan, 198 M 391, 646 P2d 1177, 39 St. Rep. 1072 (1982).

Restitution — Standards — Findings to Be Stated: Restitution under this section may be allowed by payment of money equivalent to the loss resulting from property taken, destroyed, broken, or otherwise harmed, and of out-of-pocket losses such as medical expenses. Where the District Court ordered restitution but did not state what it was for or determine the amount of the losses, Supreme Court could not determine the propriety of the restitution order and vacated that part of the sentence and remanded for resentencing on this matter. The District Court on remand should set forth written findings, stating its basis for the restitution ordered and whether appellant will be able to pay it; the appellant may petition the District Court for remission of all or part of the payments upon a showing to the satisfaction of the court that the payments impose manifest hardship on appellant or his immediate family. St. v. Morgan, 198 M 391, 646 P2d 1177, 39 St. Rep. 1072 (1982).

Alcoholics — Refraining as Valid Condition of Suspended Sentence: One who, because of addiction or character disorder, is unable to control his excessive drinking of alcoholic beverages has no constitutional or statutory right to release free from limitations on his use of alcohol, either on parole or pursuant to a suspended sentence. There was no merit to appellant's contention that it was vindictive and unreasonable or illegal to require him, an acknowledged alcoholic, to refrain from drinking as a condition of his probation or parole. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982), followed, with regard to the requirement for nexus between the sentencing limitation or condition and the underlying offense, in St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620, 56 St. Rep. 70 (1999).

Parole Conditions — Application to Suspended Portion of Sentence: Parole conditions set by Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) also applied to period of suspended sentence where court passing sentence did not set conditions upon suspended portion of sentence, particularly where that court expressly directed that when defendant was not in prison he was to be under the supervision of the Board and court could revoke the suspended sentence for violation of those conditions. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982).

Unlimited Search and Polygraph Provisions on Probation Unconstitutional: As conditions for imposition of a suspended sentence, defendant was required to submit to an unlimited search provision by any lawful authorities and to submit to a polygraph examination upon the request of any law enforcement officer. The Supreme Court when reviewing the revocation of defendant's suspended sentence held that the unlimited polygraph examination condition was overly broad and thus an invalid condition of probation and that the unlimited warrantless search provision is an unconstitutional condition of probation. The Supreme Court said that a sentencing court cannot inject prosecuting attorneys or law enforcement officials into the probation process by granting them direct rights to search the probationer, his home, or vehicle. A type of probable cause or some identifiable reason is required before a search clause may be exercised to search the probationer or his vehicle. The legal interests of innocent third persons living with a probationer are to be protected by requiring a search warrant before searching the probationer's home. Polygraph examinations as a condition of probation can be effectively contained within constitutional parameters by confining the right to demand a polygraph examination to the probation officer. St. v. Fogarty, 187 M 393, 610 P2d 140 (1980), overruled in St. v. Burke, 235 M 165, 766 P2d 254, 45 St. Rep. 2278 (1988).

Suspended Sentence Conditioned on Restitution Not Cruel and Unusual Punishment: Conditioning the suspension of the last 30 years of a 56-year sentence on restitution [in 1983 an amendment provided for a maximum 6-year deferral for a felony if restitution is imposed], which included restitution for three counts for which the defendant was acquitted, did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment or an excessive fine considering the defendant's indigent status. Restitution, particularly in theft-type convictions, is a proper condition for suspension on probation. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Deferred Sentence Conditioned on Repayment of Attorney's Fees: Lenihan pleaded guilty to a charge of burglary and received a deferred sentence [prior to 1981 amendment adding provisions allowing court to require defendant to pay costs and fines]. One of the conditions of his deferred sentence was that he pay the county $250 as reimbursement for his court-appointed attorney. The Supreme Court found that the repayment of attorney's fees is not permitted when no consideration was given to the defendant's ability to pay or to the consequences in the event of default. This repayment condition revives the fears espoused by the court in St. v. Babbit, 175 M 433, 574 P2d 998 (1978), and must be vacated. St. v. Lenihan, 184 M 338, 602 P2d 997 (1979).

Other Charges: Subsection (2) does not apply to incarceration for other charges. In re Davis, 179 M 196, 587 P2d 30 (1979).

Fine Imposed Unreasonable — Possession of Drugs: The fine provision in 45-9-102, in itself, does not allow the sentencing court to make payment of a fine a condition to suspended execution of a sentence. Additionally, the Supreme Court found no reasonable association between the finer imposed and the offenses committed, nor did it find the fines to be reasonable or necessary conditions of probation or for the protection of the public. St. v. Cripps, 177 M 410, 582 P2d 312 (1978).

Improper Condition of Probation — Fine:

The Supreme Court held the imposition of a $500 fine or payment as a condition of probation after deferred imposition of sentence to be a nullity and of no force or effect and that the same be vacated and set aside to conform with St. v. Babbit, 175 M 433, 574 P2d 998 (1978). St. v. Petko, 177 M 229, 581 P2d 425 (1978). [But see 1981 amendment allowing payment of a fine as a condition of probation.]

The imposition of a condition of probation that requires the payment of a fine having no reasonable association to the crime committed or to public protection is a nullity and of no force or effect. St. v. Babbit, 175 M 433, 574 P2d 998 (1978). [But see 1981 amendment allowing payment of a fine as a condition of probation.]

Probationer Search Clause: Execution of a probationer search clause by law enforcement personnel, being instrumental in achieving the objectives of probation, is a proper condition of probation. St. v. Means, 177 M 193, 581 P2d 406 (1978).

Condition of Probation: Under former law, provisions in a probation order permitting the petitioner to have employment outside the county jail, absolving the Sheriff from liability in permitting the petitioner to be absent from his custody without bail, and requiring that the petitioner pay his own board at the jail from his earnings, while similar to some former provisions relating to convicted misdemeanants serving county jail sentences, did not convert a condition of probation into a term of imprisonment. In re Williams' Petition, 145 M 45, 399 P2d 732 (1965).

Subsequent Imprisonment: When the order placing the petitioner on probation provided that he would be "jailed" and referred to him as a "prisoner", the substance of the order and not its form or descriptive terminology determined its effect and meaning so that his subsequent imprisonment did not place the petitioner in double jeopardy in violation of the federal constitution or Art. II, sec. 25, Mont. Const. In re Williams' Petition, 145 M 45, 399 P2d 732 (1965).

Improper Condition of Probation — Sentence to Leave County: Suspending a sentence on the condition that the defendant leave and remain out of the county has no force or effect other than to suspend the sentence; the court has no power to pronounce a sentence in the absence of specific statutory authority. The prisoner is by law subject only to the rules and regulations of the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole), and floating is void as an attempted exercise of pardoning power. Ex parte Sheehan, 100 M 244, 49 P2d 438 (1935).

NONVIOLENT OFFENDER PRISON ALTERNATIVES

District Court Required to Consider Alternatives — Alternative Sentences Allowed to Be Imposed: Alden pleaded guilty to several offenses, and at the sentencing hearing, the District Court considered but rejected alternatives to terms of imprisonment. The District Court's rejection was based upon testimony and written documents. Because there was testimony supporting Alden's contention that he should not have been sentenced to prison, Alden appealed the sentence. The Supreme Court held that the standard applicable to the exercise of the District Court's discretion is whether the law was incorrectly applied or whether the District Court's findings are clearly erroneous. The Supreme Court noted that the applicable statutes require the District Court to consider an alternative to imprisonment but only allow and do not require the District Court to impose that alternative. The Supreme Court found that the District Court had considered the alternatives but that the presentence investigation, Alden's admission, the absence of a reason or excuse for the offenses, the risk that Alden would reoffend, the need to protect society, the seriousness of the crime charged, and the ineffective nature of prior treatment all supported the District Court's view that imprisonment was necessary notwithstanding testimony supporting an opposite view. For these reasons, the Supreme Court affirmed the sentence. St. v. Alden, 282 M 45, 934 P2d 210, 54 St. Rep. 234 (1997).

Sentence Within Maximum for Crime — Failure to Object at Trial as Precluding Consideration on Appeal: Montana law requires a sentencing court to consider alternatives to incarceration when sentencing nonviolent offenders. In this case, Goulet's own counsel recommended a prison term and did not object to a 10-year sentence for felony escape or move for reconsideration of the sentence. The sentence did not exceed the maximum allowed for the crime, and failure to object precluded consideration of the issue on appeal. St. v. Goulet, 277 M 308, 921 P2d 1245, 53 St. Rep. 739 (1996), following St. v. Nelson, 274 M 11, 906 P2d 663 (1995).

Requirements for Sentencing Nonviolent Felony Offenders Mandatory: Savaria was convicted in District Court on seven counts of felony theft and was sentenced to 10 years in the state prison. Savaria appealed, claiming that the District Court had failed to consider the obligations imposed upon a District Court by 46-18-225 and this section in sentencing a nonviolent felony offender. The Supreme Court held that those considerations are mandatory and that under the circumstances, the District Court failed to properly sentence Savaria. St. v. Savaria, 274 M 197, 906 P2d 215, 52 St. Rep. 1153 (1995).

Failure to State Reasons for Not Selecting Alternatives to Imprisonment Must Be Objected to if Sentence Not Illegal: Nelson argued that the lower court failed to consider alternatives to imprisonment for a nonviolent offender as required by statute. The Supreme Court held that the lower court had failed to consider alternatives as required but that the sentence imposed by the lower court was not in excess of the maximum allowed by law and therefore was not illegal. The Supreme Court further held that since the sentence was not illegal, Nelson could not raise the consideration of alternatives on appeal when he had failed to object to the sentence when it was entered. St. v. Nelson, 274 M 349, 906 P2d 663, 52 St. Rep. 1069 (1995), distinguishing St. v. Lenihan, 184 M 338, 602 P2d 997 (1979), and St. v. Hatfield, 256 M 340, 846 P2d 1025 (1993), and following St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307 (1994). Nelson was followed, with respect to the District Court's failure to consider alternatives being raised for the first time on appeal, in St. v. Harper, 284 M 185, 943 P2d 1255, 54 St. Rep. 837 (1997). Nelson was followed, with respect to the exception arising when a defendant alleges that a sentence is illegal or exceeds statutory mandates, even if no objection is made at the time of sentencing, in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999). See also St. v. St. John, 2001 MT 1, 304 M 47, 15 P3d 970 (2001).

Procedure for Considering Alternatives to Prison for Nonviolent Offender: Because the District Court did not consider alternatives to prison as required by this section, did not take into account the criteria contained in 46-18-225 and this section that require examination of alternatives to prison, and did not, as required by this section, state its reasons why alternatives to imprisonment were not selected, the prison sentence was vacated and the case remanded. St. v. Pence, 273 M 223, 902 P2d 41, 52 St. Rep. 937 (1995). However, see St. v. Wilson, 2011 MT 277, 362 Mont. 416, 264 P.3d 1146, in which the defendant argued that had the District Court explicitly considered each of the criteria enumerated in 46-18-225, the defendant would have received a more lenient sentence. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the sentence was fully supported by the criteria contained in 46-18-225 and that had the District Court explicitly addressed each criterion, a different sentence would not have resulted.

Failure to Consider Sentencing Alternatives to Incarceration for Nonviolent Felony Offense — Remand: Criminal sentencing alternatives are strictly matters of statute in Montana. This section requires a trial court to consider alternatives to imprisonment when sentencing a nonviolent felony offender, and 46-18-225 sets out 10 criteria that the court must consider. The court has no discretion in making these considerations. Therefore, when the court in this case considered pertinent facts concerning defendant's background but did not specifically consider any alternatives to incarceration, failure to consider the sentencing alternatives warranted remand for resentencing. St. v. Lamere, 272 M 355, 900 P2d 926, 52 St. Rep. 828 (1995), following St. v. Stevens, 259 M 114, 854 P2d 336 (1993).

Failure to State Reasons for Not Selecting Alternatives to Imprisonment as Error: The Supreme Court reversed a lower court's sentence for a nonviolent felony offender because the lower court had failed to state its reasons for not selecting alternatives to imprisonment and failed to indicate that it had examined the statutory sentencing criteria. St. v. Stevens, 259 M 114, 854 P2d 336, 50 St. Rep. 707 (1993).

Attorney General's Opinions

Restitution Not to Be Made From Forfeited Appearance Bond: A judge is without the authority to order restitution to be made from a forfeited appearance bond. Restitution is not a "cost" of the case that may be defrayed. Section 46-18-603 refers specifically to costs incurred by the county, not by the victim. The money from the forfeited bond is to be paid to the County Treasurer. 38 A.G. Op. 96 (1980).

Case Notes

DUI Conviction — Sentence to Surrender Medical Marijuana Card Supported by Sufficient Evidence in Record: The defendant was convicted of felony DUI. In his sentence, the District Court ordered the defendant to surrender his medical marijuana card, citing a nexus between the defendant’s use of alcohol and marijuana and the crime. The defendant objected, claiming that the condition deprived him of his right to “seek health” and was unrelated to his crime. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, noting that there is no affirmative right to access medical marijuana and holding that substantial evidence in the record established a sufficient nexus to support the sentence. St. v. Corriher, 2021 MT 275, 406 Mont. 120, 497 P.3d 579.

Terms of Sentencing Restricting Defendant's Contact With Minors — Defendant's Viewing of Pornography Insufficient Nexus to Underlying Offense: The defendant pleaded guilty to sexual intercourse without consent. Part of the presentence investigation recommended restricting the defendant's contact with minors. The defendant objected, arguing that the victim was not a minor and there was an insufficient nexus between the defendant, his offense, and the conditions protecting minors. The District Court disagreed, reasoning that the charging affidavit and the reports from two experts indicated that the defendant's viewing of pornography distorted his view of what a reasonable woman would consent to. On appeal, the Supreme Court overruled the District Court. The court held that a condition of sentence that generally relates to rehabilitation is insufficient; rather, there must be a correlation between the crime for which the defendant was convicted and the conditions imposed. Since nothing in the record related to minors, the District Court's restriction on the defendant's contact with minors did not correlate. St. v. Mehan, 2019 MT 100, 395 Mont. 383, 440 P.3d 25.

As-Applied Constitutional Challenge Raised for First Time on Appeal — Unreviewable: A convicted defendant moved to strike a probationary condition from his sentence that prohibited him from possessing a cell phone or other such device with photo, video, or internet capabilities because he claimed the prohibition constituted an overly broad restriction on his first amendment freedom of speech. The Supreme Court declined to allow the challenge because the defendant was challenging the constitutionality of the provision as applied to him rather than facially challenging the constitutionality of the sentencing statute. The challenge therefore could not be raised for the first time on appeal. The Supreme Court also declined to exercise plain error review. St. v. Coleman, 2018 MT 290, 393 Mont. 375, 431 P.3d 26.

Partner or Family Member Assault — Contact Restrictions Prohibiting Contact With Common-Law Wife Victim Proper: The defendant was convicted of partner or family member assault. At sentencing, the defendant objected to a restriction prohibiting him from having contact with the victim, whom he considered to be his common-law wife. Nevertheless, the District Court imposed the restriction. The defendant appealed, claiming that the restriction constituted an illegal sentencing condition. The Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed, holding that there was a sufficient nexus between the assault and the restriction. The Supreme Court also agreed with the District Court's rationale that protection of the victim warranted the restriction. St. v. Parkhill, 2018 MT 69, 391 Mont. 114, 414 P.3d 1244.

Erroneous Sentence — Imposition of Department of Corrections Commitment — Restriction on Release: Under 46-18-202, a sentencing court may restrict parole eligibility if a defendant is sentenced to imprisonment in a state prison for a term exceeding 1 year. However, when imposing a Department of Corrections (DOC) commitment, a sentencing court may not restrict release because a DOC commitment does not constitute an accompanying sentence of incarceration under 46-18-202. St. v. Day, 2018 MT 51, 390 Mont. 388, 414 P.3d 267.

Sentencing Condition Prohibiting Contact With Children Valid — Nexus Established Because Children Witnessed Abuse: The defendant was charged with kidnapping the mother of his children, misdemeanor endangering the welfare of children, and two counts of felony partner and family member assault. Ultimately, the state dropped all charges except a single offense of felony criminal endangerment, and the District Court sentenced the defendant to the custody of the Department of Corrections. One condition of probation provided that the defendant was not permitted to have any contact with his children unless the contact was voluntarily initiated by the children and approved by the probation and parole officer. On appeal, the defendant challenged the probation restriction on various grounds, including his constitutional right to parent his children, a lack of procedural safeguard by issuing the conditions outside of a parenting action or dependency and neglect proceeding, and the fact that his conviction did not arise out of an offense against his children. The Supreme Court determined that the constitutional issues were not raised in District Court and that the two exceptions that allow issues to be considered for the first time on appeal did not apply. The Supreme Court also held that although the District Court could have imposed less restrictive conditions to protect the children, the conditions it did impose were not an abuse of the District Court's broad discretion. The Supreme Court reasoned that there was a nexus between the conditions as related to the children given the abuse of the mother that the children witnessed. St. v. Robertson, 2015 MT 266, 381 Mont. 75, 364 P.3d 580, distinguishing St. v. Muhammad, 2002 MT 47, 309 Mont. 1, 43 P.3d 318, and St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 Mont. 490, 87 P.3d 1017.

Probation Search of Purse Based on Reasonable Suspicion — Motion to Suppress Correctly Denied: As a condition of her probation, the defendant was required to inform her probation officer of her prescriptions. During a home visit, the officer searched her purse because of her suspicious behavior. Her purse contained illegal pills, and the state filed a petition to revoke her probation. The defendant filed a motion to suppress the evidence from the purse search, contending that the officer lacked reasonable grounds to search it. The District Court denied the motion to suppress and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the denial. While a probation officer may not go through a probationer's belongings unless there is reasonable suspicion of a violation, in this case, the defendant's nervous behavior and excuses about her pills constituted reasonable grounds. St. v. Fischer, 2014 MT 112, 374 Mont. 533, 323 P.3d 891.

Sentencing Condition Lacked Nexus — No History of Substance Use or Abuse: A 17-year-old defendant was charged as an adult with one count of sexual intercourse without consent and one count of sexual assault. Subsequently, the defendant was sentenced and one of the conditions required him to report the conviction to all medical providers, as well as reporting addiction history and prescriptions for narcotics or medical marijuana. On appeal, the Supreme Court relied on St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 Mont. 187, 179 P.3d 1164, and reversed the reporting requirement on the grounds that the sentencing conditions lacked a nexus to either the offense or the offender. St. v. Dietsch, 2013 MT 245, 371 Mont. 460, 308 P.3d 111. See also St. v. Mehan, 2019 MT 100, 395 Mont. 383, 440 P.3d 25.

Parole Restriction to Hold Defendant Accountable for Homicide Justified — Conviction Affirmed: The defendant, who was convicted of deliberate homicide and sentenced to life in prison without the possibility of parole after he shot and killed his girlfriend, argued the District Court imposed an illegal sentence by restricting his parole eligibility when the District Court did not find that he could not be rehabilitated or was a danger to society. However, a sentencing determination will not be disturbed when the statutory requirements for imposing sentencing restrictions are satisfied and the court's findings are adequately supported by the record. St. v. Paulsrud, 2012 MT 180, 366 Mont. 62, 285 P.3d 505.

Court Authorized to Impose Parole Restriction — Plea Agreement Subject to Contract Law Standards — Parole Restriction Not Addressed in Plea Agreement: The state prosecutor and the defendant entered into a plea agreement that did not restrict the defendant's eligibility for parole and contained no commitment from the state regarding such a restriction. The District Court accepted the plea agreement and ordered the sentence to be served without parole. On appeal, the defendant claimed that the prosecutor represented that parole eligibility would not be restricted and that the District Court erred by accepting the agreement without giving the defendant the opportunity to withdraw the plea. The Supreme Court held that the District Court did not err because the defendant based his claim of error solely on the unsupported argument that the court lacked authority to restrict his release. Moreover, the prosecutor was free to either seek a parole restriction or abstain from seeking a restriction based on the unambiguous language of the agreement. A plea agreement is a contract subject to contract law standards. When the contractual language is clear and unambiguous on its face it is the court's duty to enforce the contract as drafted and executed by the parties. St. v. Lewis, 2012 MT 157, 365 Mont. 431, 282 P.3d 679.

District Court's Failure to Follow Sentencing Statute Not Critical — Sentence Not Illegal: The District Court failed to provide specific reasons for imposing a parole restriction pursuant to 46-18-202. However, the sentence restriction was not illegal and did not exceed statutory mandates. Consequently, the Supreme Court declined to apply the exception enunciated in St. v. Lenihan, 184 Mont. 338, 602 P.2d 997 (1979), that would permit review of an issue that was not raised in District Court. St. v. Lewis, 2012 MT 157, 365 Mont. 431, 282 P.3d 679, following St. v. Nelson, 274 Mont. 11, 906 P.2d 663 (1995), St. v. Swoboda, 276 Mont. 479, 918 P.2d 296 (1996), and St. v. Kotwicki, 2007 MT 17, 335 Mont. 344, 151 P.3d 892, and distinguishing St. v. Garrymore, 2006 MT 245, 334 Mont. 1, 145 P.3d 946, and St. v. Olivares-Coster, 2011 MT 196, 361 Mont. 380, 259 P.3d 760. See also St. v. Tippetts, 2022 MT 81, 408 Mont. 249, 509 P.3d 1.

Sentence Not Reviewed — Failure to Timely Raise Issue — No Error Regarding Fundamental Constitutional Rights: On appeal, the defendant asserted that the prosecutor breached a plea agreement at the District Court level during sentencing. The Supreme Court declined to consider the claimed error because it was not advanced in District Court and raised no question concerning fundamental fairness of the trial court proceeding; a party may not change its theory on appeal from that advanced in the trial court or raise an argument for the first time on appeal. St. v. Lewis, 2012 MT 157, 365 Mont. 431, 282 P.3d 679.

Burglary Conviction — Conditions Related to Sexual Offense Affirmed: The defendant appealed the District Court's imposition of conditions on the defendant's suspended sentence for burglary, which included designating the defendant a level 2 sexual offender and requiring that the defendant undergo sexual offender treatment, a psychosexual evaluation, and HIV testing and provided for employment and occupational restrictions, arguing that the conditions should be stricken because the conditions were permissible only when the conviction involved a sexual offense. The Supreme Court reversed the designation as a sexual offender but affirmed the other conditions, concluding that the statutes requiring certain conditions of probation for persons convicted of a sexual offense did restrict those conditions to sexual offenses alone but did not otherwise limit the broad discretion of a sentencing court. St. v. Leyva, 2012 MT 124, 365 Mont. 204, 280 P.3d 252.

Alcohol-Related Sentencing Conditions Reasonable for Aggravated Assault Conviction: The defendant pleaded guilty to aggravated assault but challenged the District Court's sentencing conditions, which prohibited him from possessing and consuming alcohol even though he had no history of alcohol abuse. The Supreme Court affirmed the conditions, ruling that there was a sufficient nexus between the offense and the conditions and that the defendant's consumption of alcohol would be detrimental to his rehabilitation given his anger issues. St. v. Green, 2012 MT 87, 364 Mont. 515, 276 P.3d 929.

Condition of Sentence for Failure to Register — Restriction on Unsupervised Contact With Children Reasonably Related to Sentencing Objectives: The defendant pleaded guilty to failure to register as a sexual offender and received a 2-year suspended sentence but challenged the condition of his sentence that prohibited him from being in a place where children other than his own were present unless he was supervised by a trained chaperone. Given that the underlying crime for which he had to register was the rape of a minor, the District Court concluded, and the Supreme Court affirmed, that there was a sufficient nexus between the crime and the condition and that the condition was necessary to protect society. St. v. Melton, 2012 MT 84, 364 Mont. 482, 276 P.3d 900, followed in St. v. Nauman, 2014 MT 248, 376 Mont. 326, 334 P.3d 368.

Restriction on Parole Eligibility Upheld: After the District Court imposed a sentence of 40 years in prison and declared the defendant ineligible for parole, the defendant appealed, arguing that the District Court failed to comply with 46-18-202(2) and that his sentence was based on misinformation as to his drug and alcohol use. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the District Court's reasons for restricting the defendant's parole eligibility, although brief, complied with 46-18-202(2) and that the defendant failed to demonstrate that the information before the District Court regarding his drug and alcohol use was materially inaccurate. St. v. Branham, 2012 MT 1, 363 Mont. 281, 269 P.3d 891.

Legality of Sentence Not Reviewed if Defendant Fails to Object: As a condition of his sentence for burglary, Holt agreed to complete phases I and II of the sex offender treatment program at the Montana State Prison. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that if the defendant failed to object to a sentence, it would not review a sentence to determine if the sentence was improper, unreasonable, or an abuse of discretion. St. v. Holt, 2011 MT 42, 359 Mont. 308, 249 P.3d 470. See also St. v. Bullplume, 2013 MT 169, 370 Mont. 453, 305 P.3d 753, in which the Supreme Court held that the defendant waived appellate review when he failed to object to a requirement to pay evaluation and treatment costs.

No-Contact Provision With Spouse Advances Compelling State Interest — No Violation of Fundamental Marriage Rights: Evidence at trial demonstrated that the defendant was totally controlled by her spouse and as a result had participated in the ongoing sexual abuse of the spouse's daughter. Expert evidence indicated that rehabilitation of the defendant would not be possible if the spouse was allowed to continue control over the defendant. The trial court as part of the sentence ordered the defendant to have no contact with her spouse. The Supreme Court upheld the order, stating that although marriage rights were fundamental and were subject to strict scrutiny, the state had a compelling interest in the rehabilitation of offenders, protection of victims, and protection of society and the no-contact restriction advanced those goals. St. v. Guill, 2011 MT 32, 359 Mont. 225, 225, 248 P.3d 826.

Remand Appropriate Remedy for Partially Illegal Sentence: In order to reconcile disparate past decisions regarding the appropriate remedy for a partially illegal sentence, the Supreme Court adopted a rule that when a portion of a sentence is illegal, the best remedy is to remand the case to the District Court to correct the illegal provision unless, under the particular circumstances of the case, the illegal portion of the sentence cannot be corrected. In those instances, the case will be remanded with instructions to strike the illegal conditions. St. v. Heafner, 2010 MT 87, 356 Mont. 128, 231 P.3d 1087, followed in St. v. Ring, 2014 MT 49, 374 Mont. 109, 321 P.3d 800, and Kalispell v. Salsgiver, 2019 MT 126, 396 Mont. 57, 443 P.3d 504. See also St. v. Boyd, 2021 MT 323, 407 Mont. 1, 501 P.3d 409.

Requirement That Defendant Remove Indoor Pets From County as Sentencing Condition for Public Nuisance Affirmed: As a condition of deferred sentencing for maintaining a public nuisance, Zimmerman was ordered to remove his indoor house pets from a dilapidated house he looked after in Dutton. Each day, Zimmerman drove from Great Falls to Dutton to feed his indoor pets; he had been feeding a clowder of feral cats in and around Dutton as well, and neighbors complained about the proliferation of cats in town. The jury returned a guilty verdict, and Zimmerman was forbidden to feed the feral cats. At sentencing, the state recommended a $500 fine and a 2-year deferred sentence, which included a condition that Zimmerman also remove his house pets from the county. Zimmerman appealed this condition on grounds that his house pets were his personal property, that their removal would cause irreparable harm, and that the condition had no nexus to him or to the crime of maintaining a public nuisance. The Supreme Court disagreed. Even though the pets were not the basis of the charge, they were an integral part of Zimmerman's established feeding routine for more than 3 years. By ordering that the indoor pets be removed, the District Court minimized the likelihood that Zimmerman would bring cat food to Dutton, which in turn reduced the likelihood that Zimmerman would return to feeding feral cats, so it was plausible that removal of the indoor pets was reasonably related to protecting the citizens of Dutton from further nuisances. Further, Zimmerman was not deprived of his personal pets, but only required to remove them from the county. The sentencing requirement had a nexus to the crime and was not so unduly punitive that it amounted to an abuse of the sentencing court's discretion, so the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Zimmerman, 2010 MT 44, 355 Mont. 286, 228 P.3d 1109.

Restriction on Financial Transactions as Condition for Suspended Sentence for Sexual Assault Affirmed: As a condition for a suspended sentence for sexual assault of a child, Hernandez was required to obtain permission from the probation officer before engaging in financial transactions to finance or purchase a vehicle, engage in business, or incur debt. Hernandez appealed on grounds that the condition was unrelated to the crime. The Supreme Court noted that the sentencing condition was authorized by statute and Department of Corrections rule, so the Ashby requirement of a nexus to the offender or the offense did not apply. The financial transaction restriction was considered a standard condition of the Department, and Hernandez offered nothing indicating that the condition would impose a hardship; because Hernandez's priority financial obligations while serving the suspended sentence would be restitution, child support, fines, and fees, the imposition of the condition was appropriate and not an abuse of discretion. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Hernandez, 2009 MT 341, 353 M 111, 220 P.3d 25 (2009), followed in St. v. Holt, 2011 MT 42, 359 Mont. 308, 249 P.3d 470.

Prohibition Against Firearms as Condition of Deferred Sentence for Stalking Affirmed: As a condition of Essig's deferred sentence for stalking, the District Court prohibited Essig from owning, possessing, or being in control of firearms. Essig appealed the prohibition, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Several years earlier Essig was convicted of a concealed weapon violation, and considering the threatening nature of the stalking violation, the District Court did not abuse its discretion by restricting Essig's firearms use to obtain the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of the victim and society. St. v. Essig, 2009 MT 340, 353 M 99, 218 P.3d 838 (2009).

Defendant's Fathering of Own Child Following Assault of Child — Sentencing Condition That Defendant Not Engage in Contact With Children Under 15 Years of Age Affirmed: Rowe was convicted of felony criminal endangerment and misdemeanor negligent endangerment after assaulting a 2-year-old child whom Rowe was babysitting. As a condition of sentence, the District Court prohibited Rowe from having contact with any child under 15 years of age unless supervised by an approved adult. Rowe appealed the sentencing condition on grounds that because he married and fathered a child following conviction, the sentencing condition effectively precluded him from contact with his own child and violated his fundamental right to parent. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court affirmed. Citing In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P.3d 185 (2001), the court noted that the child abuse and neglect statutes reflect the tension between the need to protect family unity whenever possible and the need to provide for the protection of children whose health and welfare are or may be adversely affected and further threatened by the conduct of those responsible for their care and protection, including a parent. Undisputedly, Rowe had an anger problem, and he participated in anger management for several years before the assault but voluntarily stopped taking his medications 2 to 3 weeks prior to the assault. Rowe also committed other incidents of violence in addition to the assault and posed a substantial risk of harm to his own child, so the District Court did not abuse its discretion by imposing a sentencing condition precluding Rowe's contact with his own child. St. v. Rowe, 2009 MT 225, 351 M 334, 217 P3d 471 (2009).

Sufficient Nexus of Sentencing Condition to Offense of Sexual Intercourse Without Consent: Brinson was sentenced to 20 years with 10 years suspended for sexual intercourse without consent, and the sentencing court also attached 56 terms and conditions to the sentence. Brinson challenged three conditions. The Supreme Court applied the nexus test in St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008), to determine whether the conditions lacked a nexus either to the offense or to Brinson. In this case a sufficient nexus was established to affirm imposition of conditions: (1) that Brinson's contact with his daughter be supervised; (2) prohibiting Brinson from having a cell phone, with exceptions, or other technology or device with photo, video, or internet capabilities; and (3) prohibiting Brinson from viewing television or motion pictures that were geared toward Brinson's offending cycle or as a stimulus to arouse deviant thoughts or fantasies. St. v. Brinson, 2009 MT 200, 351 M 136, 210 P3d 164 (2009).

Failure of Defendant to Admit Incest — Sentence Not Considered More Harsh Given Relevant Sentencing Factors: Bullman consistently maintained that he was not guilty of incest with his stepdaughter because he was never married to her mother. Because Bullman refused to admit guilt and was thus ineligible for community-based treatment, he asserted that he was sentenced more harshly by being sentenced to prison. The Supreme Court examined the record and disagreed. The sentencing court was aware of the prohibition against sentencing a defendant to prison because the defendant does not admit guilt, but the court also considered numerous other relevant factors in sentencing Bullman to prison in addition to the expert opinion that Bullman was not a candidate for community-based treatment, including: (1) the significant impact of the crime on the victim; (2) the need to protect society; (3) Bullman's need for appropriate treatment; (4) Bullman's criminal history; and (5) Bullman's long history of substance abuse. Given these sentencing factors, the Supreme Court could not conclude that Bullman was sentenced to prison for failure to admit guilt, and the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Bullman, 2009 MT 37, 349 M 228, 203 P3d 768 (2009).

Parole Restriction Based on Defendant's Danger to Society Warranted: Following conviction for kidnapping and sexual assault, Dunning was sentenced to 10 years in prison and designated as ineligible for parole. Dunning argued on appeal that the parole restriction was unwarranted, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Two psychosexual evaluations confirmed Dunning's high risk to reoffend equivalent to a level 3 offender, and Dunning remained an untreated sexual offender who was considered a danger to society based on a 30-year history of sexually related offenses. The factual evidence presented to the sentencing court provided a sufficient basis to support the court's conclusion that the parole restriction was proper. St. v. Dunning, 2008 MT 427, 347 M 443, 198 P3d 828 (2008).

Alcohol-Related Sentencing Condition for Incest Conviction Affirmed: As sentencing conditions following conviction for felony incest, the sentencing court required Heddings to abstain from and be tested for alcohol and drugs. Heddings argued that the alcohol-related conditions should be stricken because they were unrelated to the crime or to Heddings himself. Citing St. v. Stephenson, 2008 MT 64, 342 M 60, 179 P3d 502 (2008), the Supreme Court noted that a sentencing condition is illegal if: (1) the sentencing court lacked statutory authority to impose it; (2) the condition falls outside the parameters of the applicable sentencing statutes; or (3) the sentencing court did not adhere to affirmative mandates of the applicable sentencing statutes. Here, the presentence investigation revealed that Heddings was a situational, opportunistic child molester and that allowing him to drink would give him more opportunities to fail and increase the likelihood of reoffending. Heddings maintained that the incest did not involve the use of alcohol, but he did not challenge the accuracy of the findings. Thus, there was a nexus between the alcohol-related conditions and Heddings as an offender. It was within the sentencing court's discretion to impose conditions that were reasonable and necessary for rehabilitation or for the protection of the victim or society, and the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Heddings, 2008 MT 402, 347 M 169, 198 P3d 242 (2008). See also St. v. Green, 2012 MT 87, 364 Mont. 515, 276 P.3d 929 (alcohol-related conditions upheld when the defendant pleaded guilty to aggravated assault).

Alcohol-Related Sentencing Conditions for Fraudulently Obtaining Dangerous Drugs Affirmed: Following conviction for fraudulently obtaining dangerous drugs, Hunter challenged two sentencing conditions that prohibited the possession and consumption of alcohol and that required chemical testing for drugs and alcohol. The Supreme Court affirmed. Prohibiting and monitoring Hunter's consumption of both alcohol and drugs would help prevent Hunter from repeating the same criminal conduct that gave rise to the sentence. A sufficient nexus was established between the offense and the alcohol-related sentence conditions. St. v. Hunter, 2008

MT 395, 347 M 155, 197 P3d 998 (2008), following St. v. Winkel, 2008 MT 89, 342 M 267, 182 P3d 54 (2008). See also St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008).

Alcohol-Related Conditions Unrelated to Felony Theft Stricken From Sentence: As a condition of Stiles' sentence for felony theft, the sentencing court prohibited Stiles from possessing or consuming intoxicants and entering places where intoxicants are sold and required Stiles to submit to drug and alcohol testing. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), and its progeny, a nexus must exist between a sentencing condition and the offense and offender. Because there was no nexus between the sentencing condition and Stiles and the offense of felony theft, the alcohol-related condition was stricken from Stiles' sentence. St. v. Stiles, 2008 MT 390, 347 M 95, 197 P3d 966 (2008).

Revocation of Youth Court Probation and Imposition of Suspended Sentence Proper: When Hinkle was 17 years old, he pleaded true to the charge of negligent homicide. The case was tried in District Court, and Hinkle was committed to the Youth Court for suspended placement in a treatment facility until age 18, placed on formal juvenile probation until age 25, and given a stayed adult sentence of 20 years with the Department of Corrections, pursuant to 22 probation conditions, including requirements that Hinkle not violate the dispositional order, possess or consume alcohol, or commit a new offense. Twelve days after the sentencing hearing, Hinkle was cited for being a minor in possession of alcohol. The Youth Court revoked Hinkle's probation and transferred the case back to District Court for further proceedings. After considering numerous balancing factors, the District Court imposed the 20-year adult sentence that had been stayed, but suspended the sentence subject to 19 conditions, including prohibiting Hinkle from entering casinos and gambling. Hinkle appealed on grounds that his probation was improperly revoked, that the 20-year sentence was improperly imposed, and that the casino and gambling restriction was illegal. The Supreme Court affirmed on all issues. The District Court did not err in concluding that simply continuing Hinkle's youth probation for the probation violations would be no more than a slap on the wrist and would be inappropriate given the seriousness of the underlying homicide offense. Imposing a suspended adult sentence was in fact a further act of grace, in light of the fact that the court could have imposed a 20-year sentence of confinement, but Hinkle ignored the act of grace in asserting that the suspended sentence was unduly harsh. Additionally, Hinkle's personal characteristics made him particularly vulnerable to the pitfalls of irresponsible gambling, so the casino and gambling restriction was appropriate. Thus, the District Court's order was "neither arbitrary nor without conscientious judgment or exceeding the bounds of reason and was an appropriate exercise of discretion". St. v. Hinkle, 2008 MT 217, 344 M 236, 186 P3d 1279 (2008).

Restrictions Against Gambling and Use of Alcohol Unrelated to Offense of Theft or to Defendant Stricken — Drug Testing Requirement Affirmed: As conditions of Lessard's conviction for the theft of carved bears from neighborhood lawns, the sentencing court required that Lessard not consume alcohol or drugs, submit to alcohol and drug testing, and refrain from entering casinos and gambling. Lessard contested the conditions as unrelated to the theft of carved bears and asserted that he had no problem with or criminal history related to substance abuse or gambling, even though a marijuana pipe was found in Lessard's bedroom during a search for the bears and Lessard admitted to smoking marijuana 2 days prior to the search. In deliberating whether the conditions had a nexus to the offense or to Lessard himself, the Supreme Court held that the alcohol and gambling conditions were too much, that requiring no conditions would be too little, but that the drug testing condition was just right. The case was remanded with instructions to strike the alcohol and gambling conditions and the alcohol testing requirement from Lessard's sentence, while leaving the drug testing requirement in effect. St. v. Lessard, 2008 MT 192, 344 M 26, 185 P3d 1013 (2008).

Sentencing Conditions for Theft Conviction, Except Requirement for Mental Health Evaluation, Affirmed: As conditions of Greensweight's sentence for theft, the sentencing court required Greensweight to obtain a chemical dependency evaluation and to attend either Alcoholics Anonymous or Narcotics Anonymous, prohibited Greensweight from possessing, using, or drinking intoxicants and from entering any place where intoxicants were the chief item of sale, and required Greensweight to participate in counseling, including mental health counseling. Greensweight contested the conditions as unrelated to the crime, and the Supreme Court considered each condition for legality and reasonableness and considered whether the conditions were related either to the crime or to Greensweight's unique background and characteristics. In light of Greensweight's history of chronic drug use, the chemical dependency evaluation and attendance at group meetings were reasonable and were affirmed. Citing St. v. Brotherton, 2008 MT 119, 342 M 511, 182 P3d 88 (2008), the court also affirmed the "no intoxicants" condition as legal because of the history of chronic drug use and as necessary for Greensweight's rehabilitation, including a requirement for drug and alcohol testing. The court also affirmed the counseling requirement, but absent any history of mental health issues or nexus to the theft crime, the requirement for mental health counseling was ordered stricken. St. v. Greensweight, 2008 MT 185, 343 M 474, 187 P3d 613 (2008), followed in St. v. O'Connell, 2011 MT 242, 362 Mont. 171, 261 P.3d 1042.

Partial Parole Restrictions Affirmed: Rickman was sentenced to life with no parole eligibility for 55 years for deliberate homicide under the felony-murder rule. Rickman appealed the sentence on grounds that the sentencing court had no authority to restrict parole eligibility for only part of the sentence. Noting that challenges to partial parole restriction have been upheld since at least 1988, the Supreme Court disagreed with Rickman's assertion. A sentencing court has discretion to impose parole restrictions, and if a sentencing court has discretion to impose a restriction of no parole eligibility, then a sentencing court can likewise impose a restriction of limited parole eligibility. St. v. Rickman, 2008 MT 142, 343 M 120, 183 P3d 49 (2008). See also St. v. Kirkbride, 2008 MT 178, 343 M 409, 185 P3d 340 (2008), and St. v. Bullman, 2009 MT 37, 349 M 228, 203 P3d 768 (2009).

Sentence Restriction Prohibiting Alcohol Use Sufficiently Related to Defendant's History of Substance Abuse to Warrant Affirmation — Unrelated Casino Restriction Stricken: As conditions of Brotherton's sentence for criminal possession of dangerous drugs with intent to distribute, the District Court prohibited Brotherton's use of alcohol, prohibited him from entering any place where intoxicants were the chief item of sale, and also prohibited him from entering casinos or playing games of chance. Brotherton appealed the conditions on grounds that they were unrelated to the offense, given that his criminal history involved only drugs and not alcohol. The Supreme Court agreed that the casino restriction was improper and remanded with directions that the condition be stricken. However, the court affirmed the alcohol use restriction, given Brotherton's significant history of chemical dependency and the reasonable possibility that Brotherton might substitute alcohol for drugs and thus impede his rehabilitation. St. v. Brotherton, 2008 MT 119, 342 M 511, 182 P3d 88 (2008), followed in St. v. O'Connell, 2011 MT 242, 362 Mont. 171, 261 P.3d 1042.

No General or Inherent Authority of Sentencing Court to Generally Impose Parole Conditions — Parole Condition Related to Sexual Offense Authorized: There is no general or inherent authority for a sentencing court to impose parole conditions. A sentencing court may impose conditions on parole that are authorized by statute only. In this case, all conditions on Burch's suspended sentence for sexual offenses were proper, but only one parole condition, prohibiting Burch from possessing pornography or accessing the Internet, was authorized under 46-18-255. Burch's admission that he used the Internet at work to access pornography while on parole established that Burch violated a condition of his suspended sentence by a preponderance of the evidence. Thus, the sentencing court did not err in revoking Burch's suspended sentence. St. v. Burch, 2008 MT 118, 342 M 499, 182 P3d 66 (2008), followed in St. v. Dennison, 2008 MT 344, 346 M 295, 194 P3d 704, (2008), St. v. Makarchuk, 2009 MT 82, 349 M 507, 204 P3d 1213 (2009), and St. v. Heafner, 2010 MT 87, 356 Mont. 128, 231 P.3d 1087 regarding authority of sentencing court. See also St. v. Birthmark, 2013 MT 86, 369 Mont. 413, 300 P.3d 1140, and St. v. Boyd, 2021 MT 323, 407 Mont. 1, 501 P.3d 409.

Conditions Including Restrictions on Alcohol Consumption and Entering Casinos Related to Drug Possession — Affirmed: As conditions of Winkel's suspended sentence for felony possession of dangerous drugs, the sentencing court prohibited Winkel from consuming alcohol and from entering any place where intoxicants were the chief item of sale and prohibited Winkel from entering casinos or playing games of chance. Winkel contended that the conditions should be stricken because alcohol and gambling were not related to the drug offense. The Supreme Court noted that sentencing conditions must be reasonably connected to the underlying offense and to the offender and concluded that in this case, that connection existed. The alcohol prohibition was connected to the drug-related nature of Winkel's drug offense and was called for, given Winkel's recent and chronic history of substance abuse and chemical dependency. Thus, the sentencing court did not err in finding that Winkel's rehabilitation would be jeopardized if Winkel had access to intoxicants like alcohol. Additionally, because alcohol is inseparable from gambling in Montana casinos, the prohibition against entering casinos achieved the same objectives of rehabilitation and protection and was also warranted. The conditions of Winkel's suspended sentence were affirmed. St. v. Winkel, 2008 MT 89, 342 M 267, 182 P3d 54 (2008), followed in St. v. Teets, 2008 MT 130, 343 M 73, 183 P3d 45 (2008), St. v. Deshazo, 2008 MT 131, 343 M 77, 183 P3d 47 (2008), St. v. Corbin, 2008 MT 146, 343 M 211, 184 P3d 287 (2008), and St. v. Sadowsky, 2008 MT 405, 347 M 192, 197 P3d 1018 (2008). See also St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008).

Adoption of Herd Standard of Review of Challenges to Legality or Propriety of Probation Conditions: The appropriate standard of review for cases challenging the legality or propriety of probation conditions is the two-pronged standard set out in St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 M 490, 87 P3d 1017 (2004). The sentencing condition is first reviewed for legality. Then, because sentencing statutes authorize the imposition of conditions on deferred or suspended sentences that constitute reasonable restrictions or conditions considered necessary for the rehabilitation or for the protection of the victim or society, the reasonableness of the conditions is reviewed for an abuse of discretion. St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008).

Probation Condition Banning Alcohol Consumption Unrelated to Crime of Issuing Bad Check Reversed — Condition Prohibiting Gambling Related to Fiscal Irresponsibility Affirmed: Probation conditions on Ashby's bad check conviction included a restriction that Ashby not gamble or consume alcohol or drugs. Ashby contested the conditions under the rule in St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), that there must be a nexus between probation conditions and the offense. The District Court denied Ashby's assertion and imposed the conditions as "stock" or standard. On appeal, the Supreme Court expanded the Ommundson nexus rule to include a nexus either to the offense or to the offender, rather than to the offense alone. In this case, there was no evidence that the bad check offense was related in any way to alcohol or drugs, that Ashby had a drinking or drug problem, or that an alcohol and drug prohibition would protect Ashby from another bout of writing bad checks. Thus, the alcohol and drug restriction was stricken from the sentence. Likewise, there was no evidence that Ashby had a gambling problem. However, citing St. v. Kroll, 2004 MT 203, 322 M 294, 95 P3d 717 (2004), the court found that because of considerable previous fiscal irresponsibility on Ashby's part, it was reasonable for the sentencing court to conclude that a prohibition on gambling was appropriate to rehabilitate Ashby's ability to manage his finances, so the gambling restriction was affirmed. The court also warned against the imposition of alcohol and gambling restrictions as standard or universal because they are not mandated by law. St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008), followed in St. v. Corbin, 2008 MT 146, 343 M 211, 184 P3d 287 (2008), St. v. Krueger, 2008 MT 265, 345 M 147, 190 P3d 318 (2008), St. v. Jones, 2008 MT 440, 347 M 512, 199 P3d 216 (2008), and St. v. Simpson, 2009 MT 43, 349 M 275, 203 P3d 791 (2009), with regard to imposition of a gambling restriction in light of defendant's financial irresponsibility. Krueger was followed in St. v. Smart, 2009 MT 1, 348 M 274, 201 P3d 123 (2009).

Open-Ended Restitution Condition Reversed: As a condition of Meyers' sentence for assaulting his child, it was ordered that Meyers pay restitution to all the victims in an amount to remain open until the victims received any help that they needed. However, 46-18-244 requires that the sentencing court specify the total amount of restitution that the offender shall pay. Thus, it was reversible error for the sentencing court to leave the amount of restitution open, and the Supreme Court remanded for reimposition of the restitution requirement in a specified amount. St. v. Meyers, 2007 MT 230, 339 M 160, 168 P3d 645 (2007).

Residency Restriction in Sentence Affirmed: As a condition of Meyers' sentence for assaulting his child, it was ordered that Meyers not reside in Broadwater County unless he was employed in that county. Meyers appealed the residency restriction, likening the sentencing condition to the banishment condition addressed in St. v. Muhammad, 2002 MT 47, 309 M 1, 43 P3d 318 (2002). However, the Supreme Court distinguished Muhammad because Meyers was not banished from Broadwater County, but could in fact live there if he was employed in the county. The residency restriction was designed to protect the victims and yet allow Meyers limited ability to be in the county. Because the residency restriction was an appropriately tailored condition satisfying the requirement to be reasonably related to the protection of the victims and society, the sentencing condition was affirmed. St. v. Meyers, 2007 MT 230, 339 M 160, 168 P3d 645 (2007).

Order That Defendant Pay "Assessments" to Community Entities as Part of Sentence for Sexual Assault Illegal: As part of Krum's sentence for two counts of felony sexual assault, the District Court ordered Krum to pay a $5,000 assessment to the Park County Court Automation Fund, $2,500 to the Tri-County Network for Domestic Violence, and $2,500 to the Park County Big Brothers and Sisters in order to give back to society and to those who assist victims of these types of crimes. Krum appealed the assessments, and the Supreme Court reversed. Although the sentencing court had authority to fine Krum up to $50,000 for each conviction, the court did not include a fine per se in Krum's sentence, but instead ordered the payment of assessments to the community entities. However, 46-18-235 provides that all fines and costs collected from a criminal defendant be paid to the Department of Revenue for deposit in the general fund, and a District Court may not redirect money collected from a defendant simply by labeling the money as an assessment instead of a fine. The state argued that the assessments were authorized as a condition of sentencing pursuant to this section because the assessments were reasonably related to the underlying crimes, but the Supreme Court held that this section does not provide the necessary authority for imposing assessments in the first place. The assessments were not limitations on Krum's conduct and could not be considered restitution because the money was not payable to the victims. Thus, the assessment portion of the sentence was unauthorized and illegal. The remainder of the sentence was affirmed, but the case was remanded with instructions to strike the illegal assessments from the sentence. St. v. Krum, 2007 MT 229, 339 M 154, 168 P3d 658 (2007), followed in St. v. Stephenson, 2008 MT 64, 342 M 60, 179 P3d 502 (2008), to the extent that a fine or surcharge payable to the community service program that is imposed without statutory authority is illegal. Stephenson was followed in St. v. VanWinkle, 2008 MT 208, 344 M 175, 186 P3d 1258 (2008).

Restriction of Travel as Probation Condition Related to Rehabilitation and Protection of Society Affirmed: As part of Moody's conditions of probation, the sentencing court required that Moody obtain written permission from the probation officer before traveling outside Moody's assigned district. Moody objected to the restriction, arguing that it improperly placed Moody's rights at the mercy of the supervising officer. The Supreme Court noted that a probation condition must be reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and protection of the victim and society and have some correlation or connection to the underlying offense. In this case, the offense resulted from Moody's admitted problem with alcohol. The deferred sentence allowed Moody to address the problem under the supervision of the probation officer and properly included a travel restriction to allow the officer to effectively keep track of Moody and ensure that Moody remained on course with treatment. Imposition of the travel restriction was affirmed. St. v. Moody, 2006 MT 305, 334 M 517, 148 P3d 662 (2006).

Dangerous Offender Designation as Part of Life Sentence Without Parole — No Error: Gratzner was sentenced to life without parole and contended that the sentencing court erred by also designating him a dangerous offender for all purposes. Gratzner argued that the designation cannot be applied to a life sentence because the only purpose for a dangerous offender designation is to affect a prisoner's parole eligibility. The Supreme Court held that the designation in this case had no effect on the time that Gratzner had to serve before becoming parole eligible because Gratzner's life sentence and ineligibility for parole precluded Gratzner from ever becoming eligible for parole, so no rights were violated by designating Gratzner as a dangerous offender for all purposes. Gratzner v. Mahoney, 2006 MT 282, 334 M 297, 150 P3d 343 (2006).

Federal Prohibition Against Penalty Beyond Statutory Maximum Not Retroactively Applicable: Following Gratzner's 1982 conviction for deliberate homicide, the District Court sentenced Gratzner to a consecutive 10-year term for using a weapon in committing the crime. The U.S. Supreme Court subsequently decided Apprendi v. N.J., 530 US 466 (2000) (followed in Ring v. Ariz., 536 US 584 (2002), and Blakely v. Wash., 542 US 296 (2004)), holding that other than the fact of a prior conviction, any fact that increases a penalty for a crime beyond the prescribed statutory maximum must be submitted to a jury and proved beyond a reasonable doubt. Gratzner later petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus on grounds that the consecutive sentence for use of a weapon was a violation of Gratzner's constitutional rights. Gratzner's sentence enhancement was not submitted to the jury, so Apprendi was potentially applicable. Notwithstanding that Gratzner's conviction became final in 1984, long before Apprendi and its progeny were decided, the Supreme Court nevertheless considered Gratzner's claim pursuant to Teague v. Lane, 498 US 288 (1989), on grounds of whether Apprendi and its progeny applied retroactively. Under Teague, a new constitutional rule of criminal procedure does not apply retroactively to cases on collateral review unless the rule: (1) places certain kinds of primary, private individual conduct beyond the power of the criminal lawmaking authority to proscribe; or (2) qualifies as a watershed rule of criminal procedure. Noting that the U.S. Supreme Court held that Ring (and by implication Apprendi and Blakely) did not apply retroactively in Schriro v. Summerlin, 542 US 348 (2004), the court applied the Schriro rationale to Gratzner's case, holding that Apprendi failed to satisfy the first Teague exception for retroactivity because Apprendi announced a rule that did not inhibit the state's ability to substantively proscribe and punish a defendant for using a weapon in the commission of an offense, but merely established procedures that the state must follow in doing so, nor did the Apprendi rule qualify as a watershed rule of criminal procedure without which the likelihood of an accurate conviction would be seriously diminished. Federal courts of appeals nearly unanimously agree that the Apprendi line of cases do not apply retroactively to cases on collateral review, and the Supreme Court concurred. Gratzner's petition was denied. Gratzner v. Mahoney, 2006 MT 282, 334 M 297, 150 P3d 343 (2006).

Life Sentence Without Parole Not Violative of Constitutional Rights: Gratzner asserted that the sentencing court exceeded its authority and violated the constitutional right to habeas corpus when the court sentenced Gratzner to life without the possibility of parole. Gratzner's argument was that use of the word "term" implied that there was a distinction between sentences imposed for a specific time and indeterminate life sentences and that the statutory sentencing scheme does not authorize a court to remove a prisoner's eligibility for parole if the prisoner is serving a life sentence. The Supreme Court declined to recognize the distinction. "Term" is used throughout the criminal code to refer to the duration of a sentence without any indication that it is meant to refer exclusively to determinate time sentences, and the language in this section that allows a court to impose the parole eligibility exception applies equally to time sentences and life sentences. A sentence of imprisonment in the state prison for a term exceeding 1 year refers to all felonies, including those punishable by a life sentence, rather than a cryptic means of limiting a sentencing court's ability to restrict the parole eligibility of prisoners serving life sentences. The District Court did not violate Gratzner's rights, and the sentence of life without parole was affirmed. Gratzner v. Mahoney, 2006 MT 282, 334 M 297, 150 P3d 343 (2006).

Maximum Statutory Sentence for Deliberate Homicide When Death Penalty Not Sought: Because subsection (2) of this section does not remove from the jury a determination of facts necessary to restrict parole, the statutory maximum for deliberate homicide when the death penalty is not sought is life imprisonment without the possibility of parole. St. v. Garrymore, 2006 MT 245, 334 M 1, 145 P3d 946 (2006), followed in St. v. Giddings, 2009 MT 61, 349 M 347, 208 P3d 363 (2009).

No Implied Presumption of Parole Eligibility — Federal Constitutional Protections Not Violated by Sentence of Life Imprisonment Without Parole — Montana Constitutional Protections Not Addressed: Garrymore was sentenced to life in prison without parole for the deliberate homicide of his adopted infant child. Garrymore appealed the parole restriction and sought to have the sentence vacated on grounds that 45-5-102(2) contains an implicit presumption of parole eligibility. Garrymore contended that under the statute, standing alone and without the operation of this section, he was entitled to a parole-eligible sentence, subject to 46-23-201, that was taken away by the sentencing judge in violation of due process and a trial by jury. The Supreme Court found nothing in sentencing statutes that creates a presumption in favor of parole eligibility that must be overcome in order for a sentencing judge to impose a parole restriction. Rather, sentencing courts have broad discretion under this section to impose parole eligibility restrictions on felony sentences, and the Legislature has placed no limitation on the exercise of that authority. A parole-eligible sentence was not taken away from Garrymore because he was not entitled to such a sentence to begin with. Additionally, although the judge must state the reasons for a parole eligibility restriction when one is imposed, no particular finding of fact need be included among those reasons. Therefore, because the statutory maximum for violating 45-5-102(1)(a) is life in prison without parole, restricting Garrymore's parole eligibility did not violate any federal constitutional rights. The Supreme Court also declined to address Garrymore's undeveloped argument that the parole eligibility restriction violated the Montana Constitution's greater jury trial right absent a compelling reason why Montana's greater jury trial right dictated a different result. St. v. Garrymore, 2006 MT 245, 334 M 1, 145 P3d 946 (2006), followed in St. v. Rosling, 2008 MT 62, 342 M 1, 180 P3d 1102 (2008).

Sentencing Court Neither Allowed nor Required to Increase Punishment for Charged Offense: Garrymore contended that this section allowed or required the sentencing court to add on to the sentence imposed by 45-5-102(2), in violation of 46-1-401. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under 45-5-102, a District Court may impose both life imprisonment and life imprisonment without the possibility of parole. Thus, subsection (2) of this section does not, vis-a-vis an act, omission, or fact, allow or require a sentencing court to increase punishment for a charged offense. St. v. Garrymore, 2006 MT 245, 334 M 1, 145 P3d 946 (2006).

Sentencing Condition Unrelated to Underlying Offense Stricken: Attorney Holt pleaded not guilty to five counts of felony theft of clients' funds. As a condition of a suspended sentence, the trial court prohibited Holt from possessing or consuming alcohol and from establishing a checking or credit card account. Holt appealed both sentencing conditions. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), and St. v. Lucero, 2004 MT 248, 323 M 42, 97 P3d 1106 (2004), a sentencing limitation or condition must have some correlation to the underlying offense in order to be reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and protection of the victim and society. In this case, there was no evidence that alcohol contributed to the offenses in question, so the Supreme Court struck that condition from the judgment. However, there was a correlation between Holt being allowed to establish a checking or credit card account and the crime of theft of clients' funds, so imposition of that condition was not improper and was affirmed. St. v. Holt, 2006 MT 151, 332 M 426, 139 P3d 819 (2006), followed in St. v. Armstrong, 2006 MT 334, 335 M 131, 151 P3d 46 (2006), and St. v. Greeson, 2007 MT 23, 336 M 1, 152 P3d 695 (2007).

Restitution Properly Imposed Without Suspension or Deferral of Sentence: Citing St. v. Honey, 2005 MT 107, 327 M 49, 112 P3d 983 (2005), Vernes contended that the sentencing court had no authority under 46-18-201 to impose restitution costs without suspending or deferring part of Vernes' sentence. The Supreme Court noted that an alternative sentencing authority for the imposition of restitution costs, not addressed in Honey, exists in this section that allows any limitation reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of society, as long as the restriction or condition has some connection to the underlying offense, and does not require suspension or deferral of a portion of a defendant's sentence. Thus, the sentencing court had authority to impose restitution for costs directly connected to the pecuniary loss of the victim, and restitution in this case was affirmed St. v. Vernes, 2006 MT 32, 331 M 129, 130 P3d 169 (2006).

Requirement That Any Correctional Placement Be Outside Area Where Aggravated Assault Occurred Not Error: As a restriction on Dunfee's correctional placement, the sentencing court ordered that any correctional placement of Dunfee be outside the area where Dunfee's aggravated assault occurred. Dunfee argued that the correctional placement condition was error because it was not reasonably related to the goals of rehabilitation. However, the record amply supported the condition for purposes of rehabilitation and for the protection of the victim and society. The condition fell within the parameters set by this section and was not erroneous, and Dunfee's commitment was affirmed. St. v. Dunfee, 2005 MT 147, 327 M 335, 114 P3d 217 (2005).

Adoption of Sentence Recommended in Presentence Investigation Report, With Variations — No Error in Disparity Between Oral and Written Sentence: As set out in St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), the oral pronouncement of sentence is the legally effective sentence, and the written judgment and commitment serves as evidence of the sentence orally pronounced. Wiedrich contended that because his written sentence contained terms and conditions that were not orally pronounced, the extra conditions were invalid and should be removed from the sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed. The transcript revealed that the sentencing court clearly adopted the sentence recommended in the presentence investigation report, with some variations—a fact that Wiedrich and his counsel were fully aware of—and the Supreme Court therefore declined to remand for resentencing. St. v. Wiedrich, 2005 MT 127, 327 M 214, 112 P3d 1054 (2005).

Ten-Year Suspension of Accompaniment and Nongame Hunting Privileges Affirmed: Ruiz was convicted on numerous counts related to hunting, fishing, and outfitting. The District Court suspended Ruiz's privileges to accompany others and partake in nongame hunting for 10 years. Ruiz appealed on grounds that the 10-year suspension of privileges had little connection to and were not statutorily authorized for the underlying charges. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under 87-1-102 (repealed and replaced in 2011), a long suspension period is authorized when warranted, and this section also allows imposition of sentencing conditions that are reasonably related to the rehabilitation of the offender and the protection of the victim and society. The sentencing court was influenced by the fact that Ruiz attended college and majored in forestry, resource conservation, and wildlife biology and yet deliberately disregarded the hunting laws and regulations, in which he was well-versed, for money and personal benefit. In order to protect wildlife and slow down Ruiz's behavior, the significant restrictions of Ruiz's ability to engage in hunting were warranted. The 10-year suspension of privileges was legal and was affirmed. St. v. Ruiz, 2005 MT 117, 327 M 109, 112 P3d 1001 (2005).

Restitution Properly Ordered When Dismissed Charges Related to Charge for Which Defendant Convicted: McIntire was charged with felony burglary, misdemeanor theft, and misdemeanor forgery. Pursuant to a plea agreement, McIntire pleaded guilty to the burglary charge and the other charges were dismissed. The trial court ordered McIntire to pay restitution, but McIntire contended that because the forgery charges were dismissed, restitution could not be ordered to compensate for the forged checks and that the court lacked authority to impose restitution when there was no longer a victim with respect to the dismissed forgery charges. The Supreme Court disagreed. The victim was the same for both crimes, and the burglary was directly connected to the forgery, constituting an ongoing criminal transaction, so dismissal of the forgery charges did not deprive the court of authority to impose a restitution obligation on McIntire for the checks stolen from the victim during the burglary and for the pecuniary loss from the subsequent forgery of those checks. St. v. McIntire, 2004 MT 238, 322 M 496, 97 P3d 576 (2004).

Imposition of Stock Probation Requirements in Written Sentence When Not Mentioned in Oral Sentence Not Error Absent Showing of Prejudice: When Kroll was sentenced orally for a felony bad check scheme, he received a 10-year prison sentence with all but 180 days suspended and was ordered to pay restitution, not possess or consume alcohol, obtain a chemical dependency evaluation, refrain from entering casinos and playing games of chance, and undergo a sexual risk assessment because many of the materials purchased with the bad checks included pornography. The subsequent written judgment deviated from the oral pronouncement in several respects, omitting the sexual risk assessment and including several conditions not addressed at the oral sentencing, including requirements that Kroll conduct himself in a law-abiding manner, submit to reasonable searches, not own or possess firearms or deadly weapons, maintain full-time legitimate employment, have no contact with the victims, and pay a supervision fee. Kroll contested the validity of the added conditions in the written sentence and the imposition of the sexual risk assessment. The Supreme Court affirmed. The added conditions were civil restrictions that were considered stock requirements for probationers and individuals subject to a suspended sentence and did not substantively increase Kroll's loss of liberty or sacrifice of property. Given the standard nature of the sentencing conditions, Kroll suffered no actual prejudice by failure of the District Court to impose the conditions at oral sentencing, and they were therefore upheld as lawful. The state conceded that the alcohol restrictions and the chemical dependency conditions of the oral sentence were not related to the crime, and the Supreme Court ordered that those conditions be removed, leaving only the gambling and sexual risk assessment at issue. The Supreme Court affirmed those conditions because they were related to the bad check crimes and were a reasonable condition to assist Kroll's rehabilitation. St. v. Kroll, 2004 MT 203, 322 M 294, 95 P3d 717 (2004), following St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480 (2000). See also St. v. Lucero, 2004 MT 248, 323 M 42, 97 P3d 1106 (2004), in which the imposition of significant restrictions and conditions not mentioned in the oral sentence, in addition to stock sentencing conditions authorized in Kroll, was considered prejudicial, reversible error.

Forty-Year Driving Ban for Multiple Negligent Vehicular Homicides Reversed: Following conviction on four counts of negligent vehicular homicide, Herd was sentenced to: (1) two concurrent 20-year sentences, all suspended; (2) enter and successfully complete a prerelease program; (3) remain under the jurisdiction of the Probation and Parole Bureau for the 40-year term; (4) pay $200 a month in restitution for 20 years; (5) not own or be in control of firearms for 40 years; (6) not enter any bars or casinos for 40 years; (7) not drink or possess alcoholic beverages for 40 years; (8) obtain any counseling requested by Herd's probation officer; (9) submit to drug and alcohol testing at any time that the probation officer had reasonable grounds to suspect that testing would reveal a probation violation; and (10) not drive during the entire 40-year sentence. Herd appealed the length of the driving restriction, and the Supreme Court reversed on grounds that the prohibition was unnecessary to protect a victim or society as a whole; and drastically inhibited Herd's ability to make a living, serve the needs of her family, and pay restitution; and impaired the prospects of rehabilitation. St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 M 490, 87 P3d 1017 (2004).

Lack of Remorse Not Sole Sentence Enhancement Factor—Incest Sentence Affirmed: Defendant contended that the sentencing court erred in augmenting a sentence for incest simply because defendant did not show remorse or admit guilt. The Supreme Court noted that St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002), prohibits enhancement of a sentence solely because a defendant is not remorseful or refuses to be accountable for the defendant's conduct. However, in this case, the sentencing court did not rely solely on defendant's attitude in enhancing the incest sentence but also considered defendant's risk of reoffending, risk to society, prospects for rehabilitation, character, background, history, and mental and physical functioning. Thus, Shreves was distinguishable, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. J.C., 2004 MT 75, 320 M 411, 87 P3d 501 (2004).

Driver's License Suspension Limited to One Year When Original Sentence and Suspension Discharged: Following his involvement in a fatal car accident in 1994, Parpart was sentenced to a 2-year prison sentence followed by an 8-year placement in an appropriate program, and Parpart's driver's license was suspended for the entire 10-year period. In 1999, Parpart's sentence was discharged, and he requested reinstatement of his driver's license in 2000, but the request was denied. During the following year, Parpart was twice convicted of driving with a suspended license. The Department of Justice, Motor Vehicle Division, assumed that Parpart's 1994 suspension extended through 2004 and that any subsequent violations required continuation for a like period under 61-5-212, so two additional 10-year suspension periods were added for each violation, extending the suspension to 2024. Parpart challenged the constitutionality of the initial license suspension and the two subsequent license suspensions. The District Court granted summary judgment for the Department, and Parpart appealed. Without addressing the constitutional issues, the Supreme Court held that the sentencing court had the authority to impose the initial license suspension as a condition of the sentence, but once the sentence was discharged in 1999, the suspension was discharged as well. Parpart should have appealed the denial of his request for reinstatement rather than disregarding it and driving without a license, but because the 1994 sentence was discharged, the Department's authority to suspend Parpart's license for each of the subsequent violations was limited to 1 year, pursuant to 61-5-208. Thus, because Parpart's two 1-year suspensions would have ended in 2002, Parpart was entitled to reinstatement of driving privileges upon compliance with 61-5-218. Parpart v. Dept. of Justice, 2004 MT 4, 319 M 182, 84 P3d 1 (2004).

Addition of Written Sentencing Conditions Not Enunciated Orally at Hearing — Johnson Applied: Drube failed to complete a sex offender program, so the District Court revoked his suspended sentence and sentenced him to a 9-year term, with commitment to the Department of Corrections for the first 5 years and the remainder to be served at the state prison. The court specified that the prison portion of the sentence be suspended as long as Drube met sentencing conditions, including completion of a long-term aftercare program. Drube appealed the sentence on grounds that the court imposed a condition on the sentence that was impossible to fulfill and because the written revocation and sentencing order differed from the oral sentence enunciated at the sentencing hearing. Reviewing the sentence for legality, the Supreme Court affirmed. Drube presented nothing establishing that it would be impossible to complete the sex offender program within the reinstated 5-year commitment to the Department. Arguing that eight written conditions added to the suspended sentence by written order should be stricken, Drube cited St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), for the proposition that when written and oral sentences differ, the oral order prevails. The Supreme Court agreed with the general rule in Lane, but noted that the rule is not absolute. Under St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480 (2000), when deciding whether a subsequent written sentencing order is unlawful because it contains conditions not enunciated orally, the court first determines whether a defendant was afforded the opportunity to respond to the inclusion upon sufficient notice at hearing and second whether the portion of the written sentence substantively increases the defendant's loss of liberty and sacrifice of property. Here, all the conditions in the 2002 written revocation and sentencing order were contained either in Drube's original sentence or in a 2001 revocation and sentencing order and thus were not new or unknown to Drube, who had the opportunity to respond to the conditions placed on the sentence, nor did Drube present any argument that the eight conditions substantively increased the loss of liberty or sacrifice of property. Thus, the 2002 sentencing order was not rendered unlawful by the addition of conditions not imposed orally at the sentencing hearing. St. v. Drube, 2003 MT 138, 316 M 156, 69 P3d 1182 (2003).

Adequate Nexus Between Alcohol Consumption and Sexual Assault on Warrant Substance Monitoring as Sentencing Condition for Sex Crime: As a condition of probation for Flanagan's 10-year suspended sentence for felony sexual assault, the District Court required that Flanagan: (1) submit to alcohol and drug testing at the probation officer's request; (2) undergo a chemical dependency evaluation and, if recommended, chemical dependency treatment; and (3) not possess alcohol or drugs or frequent places where alcohol is the main item of sale. Citing St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), Flanagan protested the conditions on grounds that they had no nexus to the offense or the environment in which it was committed. The Supreme Court distinguished Ommundson, noting that Flanagan himself connected the assault charge to his alcohol consumption in requesting a mental evaluation to determine whether his substance use rendered him capable of acting knowingly. There was a sufficient connection between the offense and Flanagan's chronic alcohol consumption to warrant imposition of the parole conditions, and the sentencing court was affirmed. St. v. Flanagan, 2003 MT 123, 316 M 1, 68 P3d 796 (2003).

Sentence Based on Refusal to Admit Guilt Violative of Right Against Self-Incrimination: Shreves was convicted of deliberate homicide and sentenced to 100 years in prison, with no parole for 60 years. At trial, Shreves chose to testify on his own behalf and assert his innocence, and at sentencing, Shreves chose not to testify, but his counsel indicated that Shreves maintained his innocence. The District Court imposed the sentence based in significant part on Shreves' failure to show remorse or responsibility. Shreves appealed on grounds that it was improper to hold his refusal to admit to the crime against him in determining the sentence. The state contended that the sentencing court properly considered the lack of remorse as a factor relevant to Shreves'

rehabilitation and the danger presented to the community and argued that the lack of remorse was based on trial testimony and evidence. The Supreme Court considered whether Shreves adequately invoked the right to maintain silence, the scope of the oral sentence that controlled over the subsequent written sentence as it related to the entire sentence, and the District Court's decision to base its sentence in large part on Shreves' refusal to admit to the crime. Although lack of remorse can be considered as a sentencing factor, a sentence that is based on a refusal to admit guilt cannot be upheld. Here, the Supreme Court was unable to find a sentencing distinction between punishing Shreves for remaining silent and the proper consideration of Shreves' failure to show remorse. A sentencing court may not draw a negative inference of lack of remorse from a defendant's silence at sentencing when the defendant has maintained innocence throughout the proceedings. Shreves was improperly penalized for maintaining his innocence pursuant to the constitutional right to remain silent. The sentence was therefore illegal. Shreves' conviction was reversed, and the case was remanded for resentencing. St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002), distinguished in *St. v. District Court Error in Sentence Providing for No Parole and Setting Out Conditions for Parole: The District Court sentenced Gilbert to serve 5 years without the possibility of parole because of his extensive criminal history. The District Court also stipulated that upon complying with certain conditions Gilbert could be eligible for parole. The Supreme Court held that absent statutory authority, the District Court could not retain jurisdiction to alter Gilbert's sentence. The Supreme Court also held that it would not attempt to determine the District Court's intent with respect to the contradictory sentence provisions and remanded the case for the District Court to clarify its sentence. Gilbert v. St., 2002 MT 258, 312 M 189, 59 P3d 24 (2002).

Repeal of Dangerous Offender Statute Retroactively Applied: In 1995, the Legislature repealed 46-18-404, which required sentencing judges to determine whether an offender was dangerous or nondangerous for parole eligibility purposes. Parker was designated a dangerous offender for parole eligibility when initially sentenced in 1986, and when the District Court resentenced Parker in 1999 after his suspended sentence was revoked, he was again designated a dangerous offender, even though 46-18-404 had been repealed. The state conceded that the District Court had no authority to impose a dangerous offender designation in 1999 when the designation was repealed in 1995, but contended that the error was harmless because the District Court had the authority to provide the same result by restricting parole eligibility pursuant to this section. The Supreme Court disagreed. The proper remedy was to strike the portion of the sentence that was illegal and amend the judgment to that limited extent. Thus, the portion of the sentence designating Parker as a dangerous offender was vacated. St. v. Parker, 2002 MT 162, 310 M 418, 51 P3d 484 (2002).

No Requirement That Defendant Be Informed of Federal Firearms Prohibitions Resulting From State Conviction of Partner Assault — Direct Versus Collateral Consequences of Plea — Denial of Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea Affirmed: Liefert pleaded guilty in Justice's Court to charges of partner assault and was subsequently charged under federal law 18 U.S.C. 922 with unlawfully possessing a firearm, following a hunting investigation. After federal charges were filed, Liefert moved to withdraw the guilty plea, contending that good cause existed because the Justice's Court did not inform him of the federal prohibition on possessing a firearm as a result of the plea under Montana law. The motion was denied in Justice's Court and in District Court, which cited St. v. Reynolds, 253 M 386, 833 P2d 153 (1992), and held that Liefert did not need to be informed of the federal prohibition because it was a collateral consequence of Liefert's sentence. Liefert appealed to the Supreme Court, which affirmed. Although the Supreme Court has previously held that there is no appeal to District Court from the denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea in Justice's Court, in this case, Liefert's appeal was treated as a motion for postconviction relief, and the Supreme Court proceeded to determine whether Liefert had good cause to withdraw the plea. The court determined whether the District Court erred in disallowing withdrawal of the plea by applying the factors in St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997). The only applicable Bowley factor was the adequacy of the plea colloquy. Liefert did not assert that a judge must inform every defendant of the effect of a guilty plea on gun possession, but presented only the issue of whether a defendant must be informed when charged with partner assault and contended that state sentencing statutes require a judge to inform a defendant of the punishment that can result from a violation. Although never explicitly adopted, the Supreme Court has previously applied the prevailing rule in Torrey v. Estelle, 842 F.2d 234 (9th Cir. 1988), that because it is impossible for a judge to inform a defendant of every possible consequence of a guilty plea, judges are required to inform defendants of direct consequences, but are not required to inform of collateral consequences. A consequence is considered direct if it has a definite, immediate, and largely automatic effect and is considered collateral if a defendant has control over whether or not the consequence occurs, if it is not under the control of the sentencing judge, or if it is a procedure under the control of a different sovereign or agency. Notwithstanding Liefert's due process, federal preemption, and negative implication arguments, Liefert had discretionary control over whether he would be in violation of federal law upon entry of a guilty plea for partner assault, and the consequence in this case was under the control of the federal government and thus collateral. Further, the guilty plea was not involuntary simply because it may have been entered to avoid the possibility of a greater punishment at trial or because Liefert may have viewed punishment under the guilty plea as lesser than his immediate personal consequences. Therefore, the District Court did not err in denying Liefert's motion to withdraw the plea. St. v. Liefert, 2002 MT 48, 309 M 19, 43 P3d 329 (2002), followed in Duffy v. St., 2005 MT 228, 328 M 369, 120 P3d 398 (2005).

Sentencing Condition Imposing Banishment From County Not Reasonably Related to Objectives of Rehabilitation and Protection: Muhammad was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with a minor. One condition of sentencing was banishment from Cascade County. Muhammad contested the condition as violations of his constitutional right to freedom of travel, association, and assembly. In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court declined to address the constitutional arguments, but concluded that the banishment condition was not reasonably related to the goals of rehabilitation and was broader than necessary to protect the victim and society, in violation of the 1997 version of this section, and vacated the banishment condition. St. v. Muhammad, 2002 MT 47, 309 M 1, 43 P3d 318 (2002).

Sentencing Condition Requiring Posting of Warning Signs at Entrances to Sex Offender's Residence Not Reasonably Related to Objectives of Rehabilitation and Protection: Muhammad was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with a minor. One condition of sentencing was that Muhammad post a prominent sign at every entrance to his residence stating that children under age 18 were not allowed by court order. Muhammad argued that the sentencing condition violated his constitutional right to privacy and exceeded the statutory parameters regarding the dissemination of information concerning sexual offenders. The state contended that even if the signs revealed confidential criminal justice information, the District Court was allowed to disseminate the information if necessary under 44-5-302 or after finding that the demands of individual privacy did not clearly exceed the merits of public disclosure under 44-5-303. In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court declined to address the constitutional argument, but concluded that the posting requirement was not reasonably related to the goals of rehabilitation and the protection of the victim and society, as required in this section. The condition was unduly severe and punitive to the point of being unrelated to rehabilitation, such a scarlet letter condition tending to overshadow any rehabilitative potential that it might generate. Thus, the posting condition was vacated. St. v. Muhammad, 2002 MT 47, 309 M 1, 43 P3d 318 (2002).

Order Not to Socialize With Females Under Age 19 Improperly Imposed as Condition of Sentence for Assault of Police Officer: Watson was sentenced to 50 years with 40 suspended for assaulting a police officer. As a condition of the suspended sentence, Watson was ordered not to socialize with females under the age of 19. Watson objected to the condition, and the Supreme Court reversed. Under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), in order to be reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of the victim and society, a sentencing limitation or condition must have some correlation or connection to the underlying offense for which the defendant is being sentenced. Watson's crime did not involve young girls, and he was never charged with any offense in which the victim was a young girl. The fact that the District Court sincerely believed in the speculation that Watson would sooner or later victimize a young girl did not provide a legal basis for imposing a sentencing condition that was unconnected to the underlying offense. St. v. Watson, 2001 MT 143, 306 M 33, 29 P3d 1026 (2001).

Attendance at Parenting Classes Improperly Imposed as Condition of Sentence for Parole Violation: Smith violated parole, and in addition to a sentence for new jail time, Smith was required to attend parenting classes and to pay the costs of incarceration as a condition of sentencing. Smith argued on appeal that the sentencing court exceeded its authority by imposing the new conditions. The Supreme Court agreed that requiring attendance at parenting classes was improper. Applying St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), the court found no nexus between the underlying charged offenses of felony theft, burglary, and unauthorized control of a motor vehicle and a requirement of participation in parenting classes. Although the classes may have been beneficial to Smith and his family, they could not be made a condition of the sentence when they bore no relation to the conduct for which Smith was convicted. The court reversed on that issue. However, because Smith did not object to the payment of incarceration costs at the revocation hearing, that issue could not be raised for the first time on appeal, so that portion of the sentence was affirmed. St. v. Smith, 2001 MT 111, 305 M 298, 27 P3d 39 (2001).

Payment of Child Support Improper Condition of Sentence for Felony DUI — Victim and Correlation to Underlying Offense Necessary for Imposition of Restitution: Horton was arrested for DUI, and a search of his driving record revealed nine prior DUI convictions. A further search showed that Horton also owed more than $47,000 in back child support. Horton was charged with felony DUI, with driving with a suspended or revoked license, as a habitual traffic offender operating a motor vehicle, and with felony nonsupport. By plea agreement, Horton agreed to plead guilty to the traffic offenses in exchange for dismissal of the nonsupport charge. The plea agreement stated that the state would recommend a 13-month sentence to be served in prerelease, followed by 4 years of probation, and, as a condition of the probationary sentence, provided that Horton would also make regular child support payments plus an additional sum monthly toward the support arrearage. As set out in the agreement, Horton pleaded guilty to the traffic offenses, and the nonsupport charge was dismissed. At sentencing, the habitual traffic offender charge was subsequently dismissed for failure of the state to prove that a valid habitual offender designation was in place at the time of the offense, and in addition, Horton's counsel objected to the court ordering payment of any child support arrearage, arguing that because the nonsupport charge had been dismissed, Horton would be paying restitution on a count for which he had not been convicted. Nevertheless, the court ordered Horton to pay support and promised to revoke his probation and sentence him to 4 years in prison with no parole if support was not paid. On appeal, Horton argued that the District Court abused its discretion and exceeded statutory mandates when it required him to pay restitution for an offense that was dismissed, citing St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098 (1994), for the position that restitution is statutorily limited to the victim of the crime and that because there was no victim who sustained pecuniary or economic loss as a result of the felony DUI or driving with a suspended or revoked license, restitution was inappropriate. The state argued that Horton was attempting to receive the benefit of the plea agreement—having the felony nonsupport charge dismissed—without holding up his end of the bargain by paying child support. The Supreme Court noted that a plea agreement is subject to contract law and that the court will not assist a defendant in escaping the obligations of a plea agreement once its benefits are received. However, the court also pointed out that a District Court's authority to impose sentences in criminal cases is defined and constrained by statute. The statutory authority for payment of restitution is in 46-18-201, which limits payment of restitution to the victim of a crime for which a defendant is convicted, and because Horton was not convicted of nonsupport, there was no victim to whom Horton could be ordered to pay restitution. The state also contended that ordering Horton to pay child support was proper because under subsection (1) of this section, a sentencing court may impose any condition reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of the victim and society. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), a sentencing condition must have some correlation or connection to the underlying offense, but there was no correlation or connection between Horton's conviction for DUI and ordering him to pay child support. Thus, the Supreme Court ordered that the portion of Horton's sentence requiring payment of child support be stricken. St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001), followed in St. v. Setters, 2001 MT 101, 305 M 253, 25 P3d 893 (2001).

Denial of Eligibility for Parole for Aggravated Kidnapping — Designation as Dangerous Offender Upheld: When the court found and petitioner did not contest the fact that petitioner participated in a brutal criminal episode, that petitioner is an alcoholic, that alcohol played a role in the offenses, and that there is no guarantee of continued sobriety, the District Court did not err in designating petitioner as a dangerous offender for purposes of parole eligibility. When petitioner's conduct in connection with the crime of aggravated kidnapping was an integral part of the events leading to the victim's death and because petitioner had the opportunity to take action to terminate the kidnapping and thereby prevent the victim's brutal and needless death, the District Court did not err when it denied petitioner eligibility for parole with respect to the conviction for aggravated kidnapping. Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

Conditions Imposed in Written Judgment and Sentence Different From Those Imposed in Oral Sentence — Lane, Waters, and Simpson Reviewed — Test to Determine Which New Conditions Lawful or Unlawful — Payment of Restitution and Costs: Johnson was sentenced orally for writing bad checks and later contended that four of the conditions imposed in the written judgment and sentence by the District Court were unlawful under St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), because they were not announced orally when she was sentenced in open court. The Supreme Court reviewed its decisions in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142 (1999), and St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361 (1999), and reasoned that a written sentence would be held unlawful only if it substantively increased the defendant's loss of liberty or the defendant's sacrifice of property. Under this test, the Supreme Court held that two of the four penalties not mentioned by the District Court in its oral pronouncement of Johnson's sentence were unlawful, those being the restitution ordered to the Missoula County jail of money expended for Johnson's medical care and the requirement that Johnson pay for the costs of her prosecution in District Court. The Supreme Court held that the other two parts of the written sentence, the requirement that Johnson make restitution from money earned in prison and the imposition of certain "civil" restrictions as conditions of Johnson's suspended sentence, such as the requirement that Johnson stay out of gambling casinos, were lawfully imposed because they did not increase the amount of money that Johnson was ordered to pay or increase Johnson's deprivation of liberty in addition to those penalties imposed orally. The requirement for payment from prison earnings only specified where the money was to come from, and the "civil" restrictions were largely mentioned by the District Court at Johnson's sentencing hearing. St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000), followed in St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

No Departmental Authority to Modify Sentence During Term of Sentence Through Special Probationary Conditions: Field was sentenced to 16 years in prison with 8 years suspended for felony deviate sexual conduct. After serving a portion of the sentence, Field was placed on probation. The sentencing judge attempted to incorporate conditions that might be imposed on probation by providing that any agent of the Montana Probation and Parole Bureau (now Department of Corrections) was authorized to arrange and establish rules necessary for Field's probation and to modify, increase, or reduce the requirements of the rules. Based on that authority, 4 years after the sentence, a Department probation officer added a handwritten special parole condition that Field not be alone with minor children. When Field violated the special condition, the probationary sentence was revoked. As amended in 1995, 46-18-801 allows a sentencing judge to incorporate by reference conditions of parole established by the Department at the time that the sentence is imposed, but does not authorize a judge to grant to the Department the power to modify a sentence by imposing subsequent constitutional infringements, such as a restriction on the freedom of association, after the judgment and sentence have been signed. Here, no evidence was offered that the special condition imposed on Field was a standard Department rule at the time of sentencing, and nothing in the sentence allowed for the special condition that Field not be alone with a minor; therefore, Field's incarceration for parole violation was premised on a violation of a special condition that was never imposed by a court. Reversing, the Supreme Court held that sentencing of a defendant to an abridgment of a constitutionally protected interest must be performed by the District Court and articulated at the time of sentencing, not modified by a probation officer 4 years after a sentence is imposed. St. v. Field, 2000 MT 268, 302 M 62, 11 P3d 1203, 57 St. Rep. 1123 (2000).

New Sentence Restriction Added Upon Revocation of Suspended Sentence Stricken: If a District Court finds that a defendant has violated the terms or conditions of a suspended sentence, the court may revoke the suspended sentence and require the defendant to serve either the sentence imposed or any lesser sentence, but nothing in 46-18-203 authorizes a court to impose additional restrictions when revoking a suspended sentence. (See 2001 amendment to this section, which allows it.) In this case, the District Court originally sentenced Richardson to 20 years in prison for felony sexual assault against a child, with all but 70 days suspended, conditioned in part upon completion of a sex offender treatment program. Richardson failed treatment and admitted violating other conditions of the suspended sentence, so the sentence was revoked, and Richardson was sentenced to prison for the remainder of the 20-year sentence. Additionally, the court conditioned Richardson's parole eligibility upon successful completion of the first two phases of sexual offender treatment in prison. The additional restriction on the sentence was error, and the case was remanded for the limited purpose of striking that condition from the sentence. St. v. Richardson, 2000 MT 72, 299 M 102, 997 P2d 786, 57 St. Rep. 320 (2000), following St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997).

No Sentence Enhancement for Use of Weapon in Assault on Police Officer: Because a conviction for assault on a police officer requires proof of use of a weapon, an additional sentence for use of a weapon under 46-18-221 violates the double jeopardy provision of the Montana Constitution. St. v. Smith, 2000 MT 57, 299 M 6, 997 P2d 768, 57 St. Rep. 272 (2000), following St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999).

Authority to Amend Written Judgment to List Reasons for Parole Restriction: Defendant contended that the District Court erred in failing to state its reasons for restricting parole eligibility in the court's original written judgment and that further error occurred when the court amended the written judgment, following remand from the Sentence Review Division, to list the reasons parole was restricted. Under 46-18-117 (now repealed), the District Court may correct an erroneous sentence at any time to correct clerical errors and to make the record reflect what was actually decided, as long as the correction does not set aside the judgment or change what was originally intended. Here, the amended judgment was consistent with the oral pronouncement of judgment and merely set forth the reasons for imposing the parole restriction. Further, 46-18-117 (now repealed) allows correction of a sentence following remand from an appellate court. The Sentence Review Division functions as part of the appellate process. Thus, when the Division remanded the matter to the District Court for clarification, the court had the express statutory authority to issue an order amending the written judgment to list its reasons for imposing the parole eligibility restriction. St. v. Christianson, 1999 MT 156, 295 M 100, 983 P2d 909, 56 St. Rep. 613 (1999).

Heinous Nature of Crime Alone Justifying Parole Restriction: Defendant raised several contentions in arguing that the District Court improperly imposed a parole eligibility restriction as part of a sentence for the mitigated deliberate homicide of his 3-year-old daughter. The District Court commented at sentencing that it felt "somewhat as the representative of [the] now deceased child". Defendant alleged that the statement showed undue partisanship and indicated failure of the court to act as an objective judicial officer. However, when viewed in the context of the entire proceeding, the comment underscored the court's conclusion that the heinous, brutal nature of the crime was sufficient reason alone to withdraw the privilege of parole eligibility. Citing St. v. Heit, 242 M 488, 791 P2d 1379 (1990), the Supreme Court also noted that it had in the past upheld parole restrictions based upon the heinous nature of the offense. Imposition of the restriction was not an abuse of the court's broad sentencing discretion. St. v. Christianson, 1999 MT 156, 295 M 100, 983 P2d 909, 56 St. Rep. 613 (1999). See also St. v. Rosling, 2008 MT 62, 342 M 1, 180 P3d 1102 (2008).

Parole Period Not to Be Reduced by Good Time Credit — Good Time Allowance Properly Limited: The sentencing court restricted Wilson's right to earn any good time against a 30-year term during which Wilson was ordered ineligible for parole. Wilson maintained that this section contained no language that would allow the District Court to restrict a defendant's right to earn a good time allowance. Good time allowances were authorized by 53-30-105 (now repealed) and operated as a credit on a prisoner's sentence. Upon review of the sentencing order, the Supreme Court concluded that Wilson was not limited in earning good time against the sentence, but rather that the 30-year period of ineligibility for parole was not to be reduced by any good time credits that Wilson received toward the total sentence. The restriction was within the sentencing court's authority, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. Wilson, 1999 MT 52, 293 M 429, 976 P2d 962, 56 St. Rep. 220 (1999).

Application of Weapon Enhancement Statute to Felony Conviction When Underlying Offense Requires Proof of Weapon Use Unconstitutional Under Montana Double Jeopardy Provision: When presented with the question of whether the weapon enhancement statute, 46-18-221, violates the double jeopardy provisions of Art. II, sec. 25, Mont. Const., the Supreme Court held that the Montana Constitution affords greater protection against multiple punishment than the federal constitution and that application of the weapon enhancement statute to felony convictions when the underlying offense requires proof of the use of a weapon violates Montana's constitutional double jeopardy provision. In the instant case, the only factor raising Guillaume's charge from misdemeanor assault to felony assault (now assault with a weapon) was the use of a weapon. The distinction between the two offenses and the different penalties imposed by each offense is the Legislature's way of punishing a criminal defendant for the use of a weapon in committing an assault. Thus, when the weapon enhancement statute was applied to the felony assault (now assault with a weapon) conviction, Guillaume was subjected to double punishment—once when the charge was elevated from misdemeanor assault to felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and again when the weapon enhancement statute was applied. This is exactly what double jeopardy was intended to prevent. The state's argument, that double jeopardy did not protect against multiple punishments for the same offense because that protection is not explicit in the constitutional language, failed because the fifth amendment to the U.S. Constitution has been held in N.C. v. Pearce, 393 US 711, 23 L Ed 2d 656, 89 S Ct 2072 (1969), to protect against multiple punishments for the same offense, and the Montana Constitution provides at least the same protection or greater. Further, the fact that legislative modification of the felony assault (now assault with a weapon) statute could achieve the same result as the present sentencing scheme did not mean that double jeopardy did not apply in this case. St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312, 56 St. Rep. 117 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980), and St. v. Zabawa, 279 M 307, 928 P2d 151, 53 St. Rep. 1162 (1996), followed in St. v. Brown, 1999 MT 31, 293 M 268, 975 P2d 321, 56 St. Rep. 139 (1999), St. v. Gustafson, 2000 MT 364, 303 M 386, 15 P3d 944, 57 St. Rep. 1554 (2000), and distinguished in St. v. Park, 2001 MT 157, 306 M 98, 30 P3d 1062 (2001). Aguilar was followed in St. v. Gustafson, 2000 MT 364, 303 M 386, 15 P3d 944, 57 St. Rep. 1554 (2000). Guillaume will not be retroactively applied to cases not pending on direct appeal or to cases that were final when that opinion was issued. St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999). Nichols was overruled in St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002), to the extent that the Supreme Court refused to retroactively apply Guillaume.

Sentencing Condition Required to Have Correlation or Connection to Underlying Offense: Ommundson pleaded guilty to felony DUI. In imposing sentence, the District Court considered a presentence investigation that documented Ommundson's criminal history, which included more than 10 convictions for indecent exposure. The court also considered a sex offender evaluation, which determined that Ommundson qualified for community-based treatment. The court committed Ommundson to the Department of Corrections for 54 months, with all but 6 months suspended on condition that Ommundson participate in a sex offender treatment program and not have any contact with children without adult supervision. Ommundson did not object to the condition prohibiting contact with children, so that issue was not cognizable on appeal. However, on the issue of whether the District Court had authority to impose a condition of participation in a sex offender program as a penalty for DUI, the Supreme Court held that this section allows only the imposition of sentencing limitations reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of the victim and society. That authority is broad, but not without limit. In order to be reasonably related, a sentencing limitation or condition must have some correlation or connection to the underlying offense for which the defendant is being sentenced. In the present case, the requirement that Ommundson participate in a sex offender program was not reasonably related to the rehabilitation of a DUI offender or to the protection of society from drunk drivers. The Supreme Court reversed the part of Ommundson's sentence requiring that he participate in a sex offender program. St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620, 56 St. Rep. 70 (1999), following St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982), and St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008), the Ommundson nexus rule was expanded to allow a sentencing judge to impose a particular condition of probation as long as the condition has a nexus either to the offense for which the offender is being sentenced or to the offender. However, offender-related conditions may be imposed only in cases in which the history or pattern of conduct to be restricted is recent and significant or chronic. A passing, isolated, or stale instance of behavior or conduct is insufficient to support a restrictive probation condition imposed in the name of offender rehabilitation. Ashby was followed in *St. v. Discovery of Shotgun Case During Routine Walk-Through of Probationer's Residence Constituting Reasonable Grounds for Further Warrantless Search: Probationer Stucker allowed a voluntary tour of his residence by probation officers, who discovered two weapons cases in plain view in the master bedroom. One case contained a bow, which Stucker was allowed to possess under the terms of his probation; the other contained a semiautomatic shotgun, which constituted contraband under the probation conditions. The discovery of the shotgun case in plain view constituted reasonable grounds for the officers to conduct a warrantless search of the residence to determine if additional weapons were present. The District Court did not err in denying Stucker's motion to suppress the fruits of the search. St. v. Stucker, 1999 MT 14, 293 M 123, 973 P2d 835, 56 St. Rep. 65 (1999).

Reservation of Right to Specify Ineligibility for Parole Upon Subsequent Revocation of Suspended Sentence — Lack of Authority in District Court: When Lindeman was sentenced for sexual assault and incest, the District Court reserved the right, in the event that Lindeman ever violated a condition of probation and his suspended sentence was imposed, to specify that Lindeman would be ineligible for parole until he completed a sex offender treatment program. When Lindeman failed to complete the program and the state requested that Lindeman's probation be revoked and the suspended sentence imposed, Lindeman objected to the District Court's imposition of the condition preventing parole. The Supreme Court held that under St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996), the only punishment that the District Court could impose was the suspended sentence or a lesser penalty and that the District Court was without authority to impose the additional condition. The Supreme Court noted that this section, the statutory provision relied upon by the District Court when it reserved the right to impose the condition, applies only to the original sentence under 46-18-201 and that the District Court had no authority to impose the condition upon subsequently revoking the suspended sentence. St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997), followed, with regard to the impropriety of new sentence restrictions added upon revocation, in St. v. Richardson, 2000 MT 72, 299 M 102, 997 P2d 786, 57 St. Rep. 320 (2000).

Improper to Reserve Right, at Time of Sentencing, to Impose Additional Restrictions on Probation: The District Court, which sentenced defendant to an imprisonment term and suspended the sentence, had no authority to reserve the right to impose additional restrictions during the term of probation. St. v. Wilson, 279 M 34, 926 P2d 712, 53 St. Rep. 1034 (1996).

Restitution Not Conditioned on Suspended or Deferred Sentence — Restitution Upheld as Additional Restrictions on Sentence: Collier was arrested and charged with solicitation of deliberate homicide, which was reduced to criminal endangerment by a plea bargain. At the District Court level and on appeal, Collier challenged the District Court's recommendation that she be required to make restitution if she was released on parole or supervised release. The Supreme Court noted that it had previously held in St. v. Bourne, 259 M 274, 856 P2d 222 (1993), that a District Court has the power under this section to recommend restitution and payment of supervision fees as a condition of parole. St. v. Collier, 277 M 46, 919 P2d 376, 53 St. Rep. 534 (1996).

Illegal Search of Person but Lawful Search of Vehicle — Vehicle Search Upheld as Probation Search and Not "Fruit of Poisonous Tree": Deputy Turner watched New make several turns in his vehicle without signaling and, after determining by his vehicle license plate that New was on probation, stopped the vehicle and searched New. Upon discovering drugs in New's pocket, Turner impounded the vehicle. Detective Jacobs questioned New, and New gave Jacobs approval to search the vehicle. Then Jacobs talked to Forsyth, New's probation officer, who conducted the search of New's vehicle with Jacobs. Turner's search of New's pockets was subsequently held illegal but the District Court refused to quash evidence taken from the vehicle as a result of Forsyth's search. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the search of the vehicle was not the "fruit of the poisonous tree", the illegal personal search of New, but was justified upon the independent grounds that Forsyth had previously determined that he wanted to search New's vehicle because of pending charges of violations of the conditions of New's probation. St. v. New, 276 M 529, 917 P2d 919, 53 St. Rep. 510 (1996).

Lack of Authority to Determine Parole Eligibility — Reversible Error: When the District Court lacked the statutory authority to reserve the right to determine a defendant's parole eligibility but did so anyway, reversible error was committed. St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep. 310 (1996), distinguished in St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997), and followed in St. v. Rennick, 1999 MT 155, 295 M 97, 983 P2d 907, 56 St. Rep. 611 (1999).

Eligibility for Parole or Supervised Release Properly Denied — Danger to Society: The District Court properly denied Blake eligibility for parole or participation in a supervised release program based on evidence that in committing murder, Blake acted unpredictably and without motivation, showed no true remorse for the crime, and, if released, would be a further danger to society. St. v. Blake, 274 M 349, 908 P2d 676, 52 St. Rep. 1269 (1995).

Completion of Sexual Offender Treatment Program Proper Condition of Sentence for Sex Crime: The District Court did not err in requiring the completion of a sex offender treatment program as a condition of sentence upon conviction for sexual assault when the condition related to defendant's need for rehabilitation and to the protection of society. St. v. Larson, 266 M 28, 878 P2d 886, 51 St. Rep. 638 (1994).

Restitution Order for Present Asset Forfeiture Reversed — Condition of Present Sentence Void: Brown was convicted of felony criminal endangerment and negligent homicide after killing one pedestrian and injuring another when he lost control of his vehicle. The District Court sentenced Brown to a 30-year prison term, with 10 years suspended, and ordered Brown to make restitution. As part of the order for restitution, the District Court ordered that several of Brown's assets be sold and that the proceeds be turned over to his victims. The Supreme Court held that the statutory provisions relied on by the District Court to impose forfeiture were improperly relied on in that they limited the District Court only to conditions that could be imposed during the suspended portion of Brown's sentence. Because Brown was required to first serve a prison term, forfeiture could not be immediately ordered. St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098, 51 St. Rep. 24 (1994).

Delegation of Sentencing and Incarceration Power to Probation Officer — No Power to Impose Sentence in Absence of Specific Statutory Authority: The District Court erred when it ordered a suspended sentence that included 30 days in jail plus a possible additional 180 days in jail to be served at the discretion of the supervising probation officer. Maximum jail time allowed under 46-18-201 is 180 days. Further, this section, which allows additional restrictions on sentence, does not authorize a District Court to delegate sentencing discretion to a probation officer. The Supreme Court refused to expand statutory authority for a District Court to impose conditions that it considers necessary for rehabilitation to allow delegation of the actual and direct power and discretion to incarcerate for extended periods of time from the court to a probation officer. St. v. Hatfield, 256 M 340, 846 P2d 1025, 50 St. Rep. 101 (1993).

Designation as Extremely Dangerous Person — Limitation of Eligibility of Parole: In its reasons for sentence, the District Court characterized defendant as "shrewd, self-serving, deceitful, extremely dangerous, a high risk for escape and for future crimes". This designation was sufficient to take defendant out of the category of nondangerous offender (designation under 46-18-404, repealed in 1995) and to warrant limiting his eligibility for parole for 25 years. St. v. Evans, 247 M 218, 806 P2d 512, 48 St. Rep. 170 (1991), followed in St. v. Peck, 263 M 1, 865 P2d 304, 50 St. Rep. 1692 (1993).

Sexual Offender's Course Proper Additional Limitation for Sexual Assault: In imposing additional limitations and sentence, there must be a correlation between the limitations and either the rehabilitation of the offender or the protection of society. The nature of a sexual assault constituted a significant connection between the crime and the need for defendant to attend a sexual offenders program. Therefore, imposition of attendance at the course as a condition of sentence was proper. St. v. Black, 245 M 39, 798 P2d 530, 47 St. Rep. 1677 (1990), followed in St. v. Evans, 247 M 218, 806 P2d 512, 48 St. Rep. 170 (1991), and St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620, 56 St. Rep. 70 (1999).

Factual Basis of Brutality of Crime Not Specified as Rationale for Parole Denial — No Error in Case of Heinous Crime: In its findings of fact, the trial court thoroughly laid out the events constituting the perpetuation of a homicide, clearly demonstrating the pointless and brutal nature of the act. While the court failed to articulate that the brutality of the crime distinguished the defendant from others convicted of deliberate homicide, it did state that the defendant possessed violent tendencies and felt no remorse and that the sentence was imposed because of the obvious importance of protecting society. Although the factual basis for this conclusion was not precisely specified as the rationale for parole denial, the heinous nature of the crime made the rationale for the denial obvious. St. v. Heit, 242 M 488, 791 P2d 1379, 47 St. Rep. 919 (1990).

Setting Parole Conditions When Imposing Maximum Sentence: In an embezzlement case, the judge imposed the maximum sentence without suspending or deferring any portion of it. The court also ordered restitution and that an auto parts store owned by the defendant be sold with the proceeds going towards restitution. The defendant argued that the court could not order the sale of his business or restitution because it had imposed the maximum sentence. The Supreme Court ruled that the judge could impose the restitution conditions but that the conditions could only take effect at the time, if ever, the defendant was paroled. St. v. Klippenstein, 239 M 42, 778

P2d 892, 46 St. Rep. 1498 (1989), followed in St. v. Todd, 257 M 321, 849 P2d 175, 50 St. Rep. 288 (1993), and in St. v. Bourne, 259 M 274, 855 P2d 222, 50 St. Rep. 791 (1993).

Failure to Appear for Probation Officer-Ordered Urine Sample — Minimal Grounds Required to Order Testing: It was error for the District Court to dismiss a petition for revocation of suspended sentence based on the defendant's failure to appear for purposes of providing a urine sample because the probation officer did not have some articulable reasons for requesting the test. Under the standard established in St. v. Burke, 235 M 165, 766 P2d 254, 45 St. Rep. 2278 (1988), the Supreme Court held that a probation officer's opinion that rehabilitation could not begin until the defendant was free of drugs and the fact that the defendant had not passed a drug test since his arrest constituted sufficient evidence to establish reasonable grounds for requiring a urine sample. St. v. Sigler, 236 M 137, 769 P2d 703, 46 St. Rep. 244 (1989).

Warrantless Search by Probation Officer Lawful if Based on Reasonable Suspicion of Probation Violation: Defendant's deferred sentence was revoked after a warrantless search initiated by her probation officer pursuant to the terms of her probation revealed that defendant possessed dangerous drugs in violation of the terms of her probation. Search by a probation officer of his probationer's car, premises, or other belongings is lawful if it is based on the probation officer's reasonable suspicion of a probation violation. St. v. Small, 235 M 309, 767 P2d 316, 46 St. Rep. 9 (1989), followed in St. v. New, 276 M 529, 917 P2d 919, 53 St. Rep. 510 (1996), and St. v. Olmsted, 1998 MT 301, 292 M 66, 968 P2d 1154, 55 St. Rep. 1235 (1998).

Warrantless Police Search of Probationers' Car and Residence Allowed — Reasonable Grounds Standard — Fogarty Overruled: A police officer's warrantless search of the probationers' car and residence based on the officer's observations and with permission of the probation officer, in compliance with probationary conditions, did not violate the fourth amendment. St. v. Fogarty, 187 M 393, 610 P2d 140 (1980), is specifically overruled and the "reasonable grounds" standard of Griffin v. Wis., 483 US 868, 97 L Ed 2d 709, 107 S Ct 3164 (1987), is adopted. Police cooperation with probation officers is to be encouraged as an important aid to effective administration of the probation system. To impose a warrant requirement for residential searches, on the basis of rights enjoyed by persons not on probation, would artificially raise a probationer's privacy interest to a level inconsistent with conditional liberty status. St. v. Burke, 235 M 165, 766 P2d 254, 45 St. Rep. 2278 (1988), clarified, regarding the fact that probation officers, other than the one assigned to a probationer, are not precluded from authorizing a probationary search, in St. v. Olmsted, 1998 MT 301, 292 M 66, 968 P2d 1154, 55 St. Rep. 1235 (1998), and followed in St. v. Boston, 269 M 300, 889 P2d 814, 51 St. Rep. 1142 (1994), St. v. Burchett, 277 M 192, 921 P2d 854, 53 St. Rep. 590 (1996), St. v. Beaudry, 282 M 225, 937 P2d 459, 54 St. Rep. 324 (1997), St. v. Stucker, 1999 MT 14, 293 M 123, 973 P2d 835, 56 St. Rep. 65 (1999), St. v. Moody, 2006 MT 305, 334 M 517, 148 P3d 662 (2006), and St. v. Fischer, 2014 MT 112, 374 Mont. 533, 323 P.3d 891.

Ineligibility for Parole Not in Conflict With Rehabilitation: Defendant asserted that his designation as ineligible for parole conflicted with society's desire to rehabilitate him because serving a minimum 40-year term would make him a permanent public charge, discourage his pursuit of education and development of skills, and whither his religious faith. However, it was within the discretion of the District Court, in light of the violence associated with defendant's crimes and the frequency of their commission, to restrict defendant's opportunity for parole in order to protect society. In re Petition of Arledge, 232 M 450, 756 P2d 1169, 45 St. Rep. 1188 (1988).

Three Hundred-Year Prison Sentence of Mentally Ill Defendant Upheld: Sentencing defendant, who was found mentally ill but criminally culpable, to the Montana State Prison for a term of 300 years without the possibility of parole or furlough was not cruel and unusual punishment. The District Court had stated, among other things, that defendant was very dangerous and there was no treatment program that would alter his behavior. St. v. Watson, 211 M 401, 686 P2d 879, 41 St. Rep. 1452 (1984).

Prison's Custody Classification as Alleged Violation of Plea Bargaining Agreement — Withdrawal of Plea Denied: Under a plea bargain agreement, defendant was sentenced to 10 years as a nondangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) without parole. Upon entering prison, he was held in close custody for 24 months under prison rules calling for dangerous offenders and those sentenced without parole to serve 24 months in close custody prior to being considered for transfer to lower, more amenable custody levels. The prosecution, defense counsel, defendant, and judge were all unaware of those rules. Defendant was not entitled to withdraw his plea on the ground he was kept in close custody for 24 months in violation of his plea agreement. There was no violation of the agreement, nor was he entitled to the additional good time credits he would have received had he not been held so long in close custody. Prison officials take many factors into account in making custody reclassifications, and there was no guarantee he would have been held in close custody only for the time he claimed he should have been upon entry to the prison. St. v. Mesler, 210 M 92, 682 P2d 714, 41 St. Rep. 939 (1984).

Alcoholics — Refraining as Valid Condition of Suspended Sentence: One who, because of addiction or character disorder, is unable to control his excessive drinking of alcoholic beverages has no constitutional or statutory right to release free from limitations on his use of alcohol, either on parole or pursuant to a suspended sentence. There was no merit to appellant's contention that it was vindictive and unreasonable or illegal to require him, an acknowledged alcoholic, to refrain from drinking as a condition of his probation or parole. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982), followed, with regard to the requirement for nexus between the sentencing limitation or condition and the underlying offense, in St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620, 56 St. Rep. 70 (1999).

Parole Conditions — Application to Suspended Portion of Sentence: Parole conditions set by Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) also applied to period of suspended sentence where court passing sentence did not set conditions upon suspended portion of sentence, particularly where that court expressly directed that when defendant was not in prison he was to be under the supervision of the Board and court could revoke the suspended sentence for violation of those conditions. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982).

Parole Eligibility — Ex Post Facto Application: Defendant committed a crime in 1975 for which he was tried and convicted in 1979. In sentencing defendant, the trial court declared him a dangerous offender under 46-18-404 (now repealed), and declared him ineligible for parole under 46-18-202. Both of these statutes became effective July 1, 1977. Application of a law which eliminates or delays a defendant's parole eligibility after the criminal offense has been committed is ex post facto as applied to that defendant and is therefore unconstitutional. St. v. Beachman, 189 M 400, 616 P2d 337 (1980).

Sentencing — Ineligibility for Parole or Supervised Release — Vagueness: Petitioners contend that this section's provision allowing a judge who imposes a sentence of more than 1 year in prison to add a restriction barring parole and supervised release is invalid because it is too vague in defining the supposed offense. This section does not define an offense. It does not create a new offense, nor does it forbid or require the doing of an act. Its sole purpose is to permit a District Judge, in the course of ordinary sentencing, to determine that a defendant should serve his full sentence for the protection of society. Cavanaugh v. Crist, 189 M 274, 615 P2d 890 (1980).

Sentencing — Not Delegation of Legislative Authority: Petitioners contend that 46-18-202(2) unlawfully delegates legislative authority to the judicial and executive branches of government. The thrust of this argument appears to be that the section vests too much discretion in District Judges and prosecuting attorneys. A District Judge is particularly well positioned to predict whether the restriction (ineligibility for parole or supervised release) is necessary for the protection of society. The determination of whether to impose the restriction is manifestly with the District Judge alone. Cavanaugh v. Crist, 189 M 274, 615 P2d 890 (1980).

Sentencing — Restrictions on Parole and Supervised Release Permissible: Section 46-18-202 provides that whenever a sentence of imprisonment in the state prison for a term exceeding 1 year is given, the court may impose the restriction that the defendant be ineligible for parole and participation in the supervised release program while serving his term. If the court finds the restriction necessary, it shall impose the restriction as part of the sentence and set forth its reasons for imposing the restrictions in writing. This statute is not a sentence enhancement statute. It does not permit District Judges to add any time beyond the statutory maximum underlying the offense. Petitioners, who both pleaded guilty, were represented by counsel and were given presentence hearings. Parole and participation in the supervised release program are privileges, not rights. Petitioners were not denied due process or equal protection in being sentenced under 46-18-202. Cavanaugh v. Crist, 189 M 274, 615 P2d 890 (1980).

Review of Reversed Convictions: The defendant argued that his 10-year sentence without an opportunity for parole or participation in the supervised release program is improper because the District Court relied on a presentence investigation report that contained false and misleading information. The defendant asserts that the court relied on a felony conviction in Washington that was reversed, an Oregon felony conviction that was reversed, and a Wyoming felony conviction that was constitutionally infirm. The defendant also contends that his "rap" sheet with 45 entries was prejudicial because only 16 of the entries reflect convictions. On review, the Supreme Court held that in light of the defendant's extensive criminal background he experienced no material prejudice or substantial interference with his rights because of the trial court's consideration of convictions that were later reversed. St. v. Olsen, 189 M 43, 614 P2d 1061 (1980).

Unlimited Search and Polygraph Provisions on Probation Unconstitutional: As conditions for imposition of a suspended sentence, defendant was required to submit to an unlimited search provision by any lawful authorities and to submit to a polygraph examination upon the request of any law enforcement officer. The Supreme Court, when reviewing the revocation of defendant's suspended sentence, held that the unlimited polygraph examination condition was overly broad and thus an invalid condition of probation and that the unlimited warrantless search provision is an unconstitutional condition of probation. The Supreme Court said that a sentencing court cannot inject prosecuting attorneys or law enforcement officials into the probation process by granting them direct rights to search the probationer, his home, or his vehicle. A type of probable cause or some identifiable reason is required before a search clause may be exercised to search the probationer or his vehicle. The legal interests of innocent third persons living with a probationer are to be protected by requiring a search warrant before searching the probationer's home. Polygraph examinations as a condition of probation can be effectively contained within constitutional parameters by confining the right to demand a polygraph examination to the probation officer. St. v. Fogarty, 187 M 393, 610 P2d 140 (1980), overruled in St. v. Burke, 235 M 165, 766 P2d 254, 45 St. Rep. 2278 (1988).

Improper Sentencings — Excess of Maximum — Failure to Prove Essential Element: Where the District Court sentenced defendant to 20 years for burglary and the maximum possible sentence was 10 years, the Supreme Court reduced the sentence to 10 years. The Supreme Court also reversed the 10-year sentence the defendant received upon his conviction for felony theft, as the State failed to prove the essential element that the value of the property taken exceeded $150. All other sentences received by the defendant, as well as the provision of the sentence for no parole or supervised release, were within the maximum allowed by law and as such were within the discretion of the sentencing judge and were not overturned. St. v. Sunday, 187 M 292, 609 P2d 1188 (1980).

Persistent Felony Offender Sentence — Presumption of Constitutionality: Following a conviction for attempted deliberate homicide, the defendant was sentenced as a persistent felony offender to 30 years in prison without parole. While the defendant claims the sentence to be unconstitutional, it was held in St. v. Karathanos, 158 M 461, 493 P2d 326 (1972), that a sentence within statutory limits is presumed to be constitutional. The defendant has the burden of overcoming the presumption and has not done so. St. v. Kirkland, 184 M 229, 602 P2d 586 (1979).

Ex Post Facto Application of Sentencing Statute: The provision in the sentence rendering the defendant ineligible for parole or supervised release until one-half of his sentence was served was improper since the law authorizing such a provision did not become effective until after the commission of the crime of which the defendant was convicted. St. v. Azure, 179 M 281, 587 P2d 1297 (1978); St. v. Gone, 179 M 271, 587 P2d 1291 (1978).

Improper Condition of Probation — Fine:

The Supreme Court held the imposition of $500 fine or payment as a condition of probation after deferred imposition of sentence to be a nullity and of no force or effect and that the same be vacated and set aside to conform with St. v. Babbit, 175 M 433, 574 P2d 998 (1978). St. v. Petko, 177 M 229, 581 P2d 425 (1978). [But see 1981 amendment to 46-18-201 allowing payment of a fine as a condition of probation.]

The imposition of a condition of probation that requires the payment of a fine having no reasonable association to the crime committed or to public protection is a nullity and of no force or effect. St. v. Babbit, 175 M 433, 574 P2d 998 (1978). [But see 1981 amendment to 46-18-201 allowing payment of a fine as a condition of probation.]

Probationer Search Clause: Execution of a probationer search clause by law enforcement personnel, being instrumental in achieving the objectives of probation, is a proper condition of probation. St. v. Means, 177 M 193, 581 P2d 406 (1978).

Improper Condition of Probation — Sentence to Leave County: Suspending a sentence on the condition that the defendant leave and remain out of the county has no force or effect other than to suspend the sentence; the court has no power to pronounce a sentence in the absence of specific statutory authority. The prisoner is by law subject only to the rules and regulations of the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole), and floating is void as an attempted exercise of pardoning power. Ex parte Sheehan, 100 M 244, 49 P2d 438 (1935).

Amendment effective May 19, 2017.

2003 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 345 inserted (9) providing that the provisions of this section apply to any offender whose suspended or deferred sentence is subject to revocation regardless of the date of the offender's conviction and regardless of the terms and conditions of the offender's original sentence. Amendment effective April 15, 2003.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 10, Ch. 493, L. 2001, provided: “[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to offenders who are under the custody or supervision of the department of corrections on [the effective date of this act].” Effective May 1, 2001.

1999 Amendment — Code Commissioner Correction: Chapter 52 throughout section substituted references to sentencing judge for references to district court and substituted references to offender for references to defendant; inserted (7)(b) regarding consideration of elapsed time as credit against the sentence; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

In last sentence of (7)(b) the Code Commissioner substituted “time served in a detention center” for “jail” pursuant to the authority contained in sec. 14, Ch. 52, L. 1999.

WHEREAS, the Committee contracted for a review of Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, sentencing statutes; and

WHEREAS, the Committee found that the statutes providing for sentencing and judgment regarding criminal procedures are confusing and rife with cross-references, internal references, and inconsistent terminology that make the statutes difficult to read and understand; and

WHEREAS, the Committee recommended that a bill be drafted to amend Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, to make nonsubstantive changes to clarify and streamline the statutes to eliminate contradictions, confusion, inconsistent terminology, and excessive internal references.

THEREFORE, the Legislature of the State of Montana finds it appropriate to so amend certain sentencing-related statutes.”

1993 Amendment: Chapter 262 near beginning of (1), after “revocation”, deleted “accompanied by an affidavit”.

1991 Amendments — Instructions to Code Commissioner: The Code Commissioner changed “department of institutions” to “department of corrections and human services” (deleted by Ch. 800), pursuant to sec. 1, Ch. 262, L. 1991, directing the Code Commissioner to make the change wherever necessary in the Montana Code Annotated. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Chapter 800 substituted (1) concerning petition for revocation, order for revocation, and issuance of warrant for former text that read: “A judge, magistrate, or justice of the peace who has suspended the execution of a sentence or deferred the imposition of a sentence of imprisonment under 46-18-201 or his successor is authorized in his discretion to revoke the suspension or impose sentence and order the person committed. He may also, in his discretion, order the prisoner placed under the jurisdiction of the department of institutions as provided by law or retain such jurisdiction with his court”; in (2), after “revocation”, deleted “of a suspended sentence or imposition of a sentence previously deferred”; deleted former (3) that read: “(3) Prior to the revocation of an order suspending or deferring the imposition of sentence, the person affected shall be given a hearing”; inserted (3) concerning applicability of bail provisions; inserted (4) concerning advising defendant of certain rights; inserted (5) concerning when hearing is not required; inserted (6) requiring proof of terms and conditions of suspended or deferred sentence other than failure to pay restitution; inserted (7) concerning authority of court; inserted (8) concerning release of defendant; and made minor changes in style.

1983 Amendment: Near middle of (1), after “successor is authorized” deleted “during the period of the suspended sentence or deferred imposition of sentence”; and inserted (2) relating to filing of and jurisdiction over a petition to revoke.

Applicability of 1983 Amendment: Section 2, Ch. 204, L. 1983, provided that “Section 1 applies to any petition filed after the effective date of this act.” The act was effective March 23, 1983, and section 1 amended this section.

1981 Amendment: Substituted “department of institutions (now department of corrections)” for “board of pardons” after “under the jurisdiction of the” in the second sentence.

GENERAL

Credit Not Applied for Time Served to Each Count in Revocation — Not Illegal When Sentences for Multiple Counts and Some Were Designated in Sentencing Order as Consecutive. St. v. Souther, 2022 MT 203, 410 Mont. 330, 519 P.3d 1.

Revocation of Deferred Sentence for Felony Offense — District Court Had Full Authority to Reimpose 10-Year Sentence — Deferred Sentence Violated Through Compliance Violations — Further Efforts Under Montana Incentives and Intervention Grid Futile. St. v. Pennington, 2022 MT 180, 410 Mont. 104, 517 P.3d 894.

District Court Failed to Give Defendant Credit for Elapsed Time Served — Decision Not Based on Specific Probation Violations as Required by Amended Statute — Order Too General — Order Referenced Only “Repeated Violations of Terms and Conditions” — Reversed and Remanded for Claimed Elapsed Time. St. v. Gudmundsen, 2022 MT 178, 410 Mont. 67, 517 P.3d 146, followed in St. v. Pennington, 2022 MT 180, 410 Mont. 104, 517 P.3d 894.

Requirement That Credit Must Be Allowed for Time Served in Detention Center — Definition of Detention Center Met by Sanction, Treatment, Assessment, Revocation, and Transition (START) Facility. St. v. Tippetts, 2022 MT 81, 408 Mont. 249, 509 P.3d 1.

Revocation of Suspended Sentence — Award of Elapsed Time Nondiscretionary: The District Court declined to award credit for street time served under the defendant’s suspended sentence. The Supreme Court expressly noted that the 2017 amendments to 46-18-203 remove the court’s discretion to deny credit for street time served unless there is specific evidence in the record of a violation. The District Court’s sentence was ultimately affirmed because in its oral pronouncement of sentence the District Court described evidence of a probation violation that occurred during the relevant time period. St. v. Jardee, 2020 MT 81, 399 Mont. 459, 461 P.3d 108. See also St. v. Kortan, 2022 MT 204, 410 Mont. 336, 518 P.3d 1283.

Erroneous to Deny Credit for Time Served in Federal Custody on Concurrent Federal Sentence: While on federal parole after time spent in federal prison following a murder conviction in federal court, the defendant was convicted of robbery — a parole violation — in state District Court and sentenced to 15 years with 10 years suspended and credit for time served. The state judgment expressly stated that the sentence would run concurrently with any other sentence that the defendant was then serving. After the unsuspended portion of his state sentence was discharged, the defendant was transferred to federal prison until he was released on federal parole and concurrent state probation. The following year, the state District Court revoked the defendant’s suspended state sentence due to probation violations and resentenced him to 10 years. The District Court failed to specify whether the new sentence on revocation ran concurrently or consecutively with the defendant’s federal sentence. The defendant appealed the District Court order revoking his suspended sentence. The Supreme Court held that the District Court erroneously failed to credit the defendant for time served in federal custody after he was discharged on to state probation. Unrelated sentences merge when a court orders that one runs concurrently with the other, and a term of commitment on a new sentence on revocation may not exceed the original term of commitment. St. v. Youpee, 2018 MT 102, 391 Mont. 246, 416 P.3d 1050.

Failure to Specify Whether Sentence Runs Concurrently or Consecutively — Sentence Illegal: While on federal parole after time spent in federal prison following a murder conviction in federal court, the defendant was convicted of robbery — a parole violation — in state District Court and sentenced to 15 years with 10 years suspended and credit for time served. The state judgment expressly stated that the sentence would run concurrently with any other sentence that the defendant was then serving. After the unsuspended portion of his state sentence was discharged, the defendant was transferred to federal prison until he was released on federal parole and concurrent state probation. The following year, the state District Court revoked the defendant's suspended state sentence due to probation violations and resentenced him to 10 years. The District Court failed to specify whether the new sentence on revocation ran concurrently or consecutively with the defendant's federal sentence. The defendant appealed the District Court order revoking his suspended sentence. The Supreme Court held that the District Court's failure to specify whether the new sentence on revocation would run concurrently or consecutively with the defendant's federal sentence effectively imposed a longer term of imprisonment on the defendant, in violation of 46-18-203(7). St. v. Youpee, 2018 MT 102, 391 Mont. 246, 416 P.3d 1050.

Failure to State Reason for Denying Credit for Street Time — Waivable Statutory Defect: While on federal parole after time spent in federal prison following a murder conviction in federal court, the defendant was convicted of robbery — a parole violation — in state District Court and sentenced to 15 years with 10 years suspended and credit for time served. The state judgment expressly stated that the sentence would run concurrently with any other sentence that the defendant was then serving. After the unsuspended portion of his state sentence was discharged, the defendant was transferred to federal prison until he was released on federal parole and concurrent state probation. The following year, the state District Court revoked the defendant's suspended state sentence due to probation violations and resentenced him to 10 years. The District Court failed to specify whether the new sentence on revocation ran concurrently or consecutively with defendant's federal sentence. The defendant appealed the District Court order revoking his suspended sentence. Section 46-18-203(7)(b) (2015) states that when a suspended or deferred sentence is revoked, the judge shall consider whether to allow any or all elapsed time as a credit against the sentence, and the judge shall state the reasons for the judge's determination in the order. The defendant asserted that the judge's failure to state a reason for denying him street credit was erroneous. The Supreme Court held that the defendant waived his right to object to the court's failure because he failed to contemporaneously object. The District Court had discretion to deny street time, so the failure to state the reason did not render an otherwise valid sentence illegal. St. v. Youpee, 2018 MT 102, 391 Mont. 246, 416 P.3d 1050.

Error for District Court to Refuse to Admit Unauthenticated Documents During Revocation Hearing — Different Evidentiary Standard: During a revocation hearing, the defendant attempted to admit out-of-state documents to show that the state knew he was in Washington state after his escape from custody. The District Court admitted documents originating in Montana but refused to admit any documents from Washington state, including a postal receipt for registered mail. On appeal, the Supreme Court determined that both federal and state courts have allowed admission of similar unauthenticated documents in revocation proceedings and that the limitations courts place on the admissibility of documentary evidence in revocation proceedings arise solely out of concern for a defendant's sixth amendment confrontation rights. As such, the District Court's refusal to admit the unauthenticated documents was an error. However, the error was harmless, given that the defendant's substantive argument was rejected. St. v. Graves, 2015 MT 262, 381 Mont. 37, 355 P.3d 769.

Change in Sexual Offender Status Level at Probation Revocation: Claassen, a level 1 sexual offender, violated the terms of his probation through the possession of child pornography. At his probation revocation hearing, the court elevated Claassen's offender status to level 3 without ordering a new presentence investigation or a psychosexual evaluation. Under this section, a court may impose any sentence as long as it is not longer than the original sentence. Although an enhanced tier level may increase the burden on the offender, it does not increase the imprisonment term; therefore, the District Court could properly increase Claassen's sexual offender tier level. St. v. Claassen, 2012 MT 313, 367 Mont. 478, 291 P.3d 1176.

Authority to Revoke Before Serving Suspended Sentence: The former version of this section required that a petition for revocation could be made only during the period of suspension or deferral; therefore, the District Court lacked statutory authority to revoke the defendant's suspended sentence before he began serving it [decided prior to 2011 amendments to this section]. St. v. Stiffarm, 2011 MT 9, 359 Mont. 116, 250 P.3d 300.

Written Sentence Not Conforming to Oral Pronouncement — Written Sentence Amended to Conform: The sentencing judge orally sentenced the defendant to serve the remainder of the original suspended sentence and also orally imposed a sentence and conditions for parole or probation for a different offense but the written judgment did not totally conform to the oral pronouncements. The oral sentencing controls over the written, and the written sentence must be amended to conform to it. St. v. Goff, 2011 MT 6, 359 Mont. 107, 247 P.3d 715.

Conditions of Probation Violated — Revocation of Probation Proper: The District Court did not err when it revoked Tirey's probation because Tirey failed to report to his probation officer, submit job logs, and begin sexual offender treatment. Tirey's violations were of his own volition, and he was not entitled to an evaluation of alternatives to incarceration. St. v. Tirey, 2010 MT 283, 358 Mont. 510, 247 P.3d 701, distinguishing St. v. Lee, 2001 MT 176, 306 Mont. 173, 31 P.3d 998.

Imposition of 13 Probation Conditions After Probation Revocation Proceeding Proper: In 1997, Tirey was sentenced to 50 years at the Montana State Prison for sexual assault, with 25 years suspended. In 2009, after Tirey failed to comply with the terms of his parole, the District Court revoked Tirey's probation and sentenced him to 25 years with 7 suspended. The District Court also integrated 13 probation conditions into his current suspended sentence, which Tirey claimed was in error. In complying with this section, the proper analysis is whether the additional conditions are punitive in nature and whether the defendant is being sentenced to more or less punishment. The integration of 13 probation conditions in 2009 was proper because many of the conditions merely reiterated the conditions of the original sentence and because the 2009 sentence was a substantial reduction in the overall punishment from 1997. St. v. Tirey, 2010 MT 283, 358 Mont. 510, 247 P.3d 701, overruling in part St. v. White, 2008 MT 464, 348 Mont. 196, 199 P.3d 274, St. v. Rudolph, 2005 MT 41, 326 Mont. 132, 107 P.3d 496, and St. v. Brister, 2002 MT 13, 308 Mont. 154, 41 P.3d 314, and followed in St. v. Piller, 2014 MT 342A, 378 Mont. 221.

Statutory Direction for Determining Sanction Following Revocation of Probation: Unlike the initial criminal proceedings against an accused, a probation violation proceeding is civil. Probation revocation is not based on the conduct that constituted the original crime, but rather on later conduct that constituted a violation of the conditions of a suspended sentence. Thus, 46-18-201 applies to the initial sentence imposed after conviction of a crime upon a verdict or plea and governs the form of a criminal sentence. By contrast, 46-18-203 applies later when a District Court finds that an offender has violated the terms of the original suspended sentence imposed under 46-18-201 and defines the District Court's options in a revocation proceeding. Therefore, a District Court determining the sanction to be imposed after a revocation of probation is governed by 46-18-203 and not by 46-18-201. St. v. Roberts, 2010 MT 110, 356 Mont. 290, 233 P.3d 324. See also St. v. Boulton, 2006 MT 170, 332 Mont. 538, 140 P.3d 482, St. v. Letasky, 2007 MT 51, 336 Mont. 178, 152 P.3d 1288, St. v. Seals, 2007 MT 71, 336 Mont. 416, 156 P.3d 15, St. v. Strong, 2009 MT 65, 349 Mont. 417, 203 P.3d 848, and St. v. Claassen, 2012 MT 313, 367 Mont. 478, 291 P.3d 1176.

Revocation of Parole or Probation Not Considered Punishment for Double Jeopardy Purposes: Revocation is a supervisory act involving the enforcement of conditions imposed on a term of parole or probation. Therefore, the same act or acts may form the basis for revoking both an offender's parole and an ensuing suspended sentence without contravening double jeopardy protections. Here, Haagenson was granted conditional release and a suspended sentence subject to certain conditions, including a requirement that he remain law abiding and not consume alcohol. Haagenson subsequently violated these conditions and thus forfeited both the conditional release and the future suspended sentence. St. v. Haagenson, 2010 MT 95, 356 Mont. 177, 232 P.3d 367, distinguishing St. v. Martinez, 2008 MT 233, 344 Mont. 394, 188 P.3d 1034, and St. v. Johnston, 2008 MT 318, 346 Mont. 93, 193 P.3d 925.

Illegal Revocation of Sentence — Habeas Corpus Relief Warranted: The state petitioned to revoke Borgen's suspended sentence, and the District Court granted the petition and resentenced Borgen to incarceration for an additional 14 years. Borgen petitioned for habeas corpus relief. The Supreme Court determined that after an illegal weapon enhancement sentence was subtracted from Borgen's original sentence, the total time remaining on Borgen's suspended sentence was about 9 years, 1 month. However, the petition to revoke the suspended sentence was not filed until 9 years, 8 months after sentencing. Because the legal portion of Borgen's sentence had expired before the petition to revoke was filed, revocation of Borgen's sentence was facially illegal, and Borgen's incarceration constituted a grievous wrong and a miscarriage of justice warranting habeas corpus relief. Therefore, the Supreme Court granted Borgen's petition, vacated the sentence revocation, and ordered that Borgen be released from custody. Borgen v.

Due Process in Sentence Revocation Proceeding: Triplett entered into a plea agreement with the state and pleaded guilty to one count of sexual intercourse without consent in exchange for the state dismissing the other two counts. The District Court sentenced Triplett to the state prison for 12 years with 4 years suspended. Triplett was made ineligible for parole until he completed phases I and II of the sex offender treatment program. The court also imposed other conditions upon his suspended sentence. Triplett then petitioned the Sentence Review Division for review of the District Court's sentence. After a hearing, the Sentence Review Division amended Triplett's sentence, imposing a 40-year sentence, all of which was suspended upon specific conditions. The District Court issued an amended judgment and commitment reflecting the Sentence Review Division's action and Triplett was released. On September 28, 2006, the state filed a petition for revocation of the suspended sentence. The District Court issued a bench warrant and Triplett was arrested on October 2, 2006. On October 17, 2006, Triplett made an initial appearance and the court informed Triplett of the allegations in the petition and of his rights. On October 24, 2006, the court conducted an answer hearing, and Triplett denied each allegation of the petition. Triplett's counsel requested at least 3 to 4 weeks in which to prepare for an evidentiary hearing. Based on the parties' schedules and the court's calendar, the court then set an evidentiary hearing for December 22, 2006. After several delays, the parties advised the court they had reached an agreement for adjudication and recommended disposition. Pursuant to the agreement, Triplett answered "true" to some of the alleged violations of his sentence conditions in exchange for the state's agreement to request dismissal of other allegations and to recommend the court impose the sentence it originally imposed, which was 12 years with 4 suspended. Based on his admissions, the court found Triplett did violate the terms of the suspended portion of his previously imposed sentence. The District Court indicated it had not decided whether it would follow the terms of the plea agreement and scheduled a dispositional hearing for May 1, 2007. Stating that it saw nothing in the statutes giving it authority to overturn the amended judgment and commitment of the Sentence Review Division, the court sentenced Triplett to 40 years in the state prison with 20 years suspended. Triplett received credit for 595 days prior time served in prison and in jail during the revocation proceedings. Triplett appealed. The due process rights of a probationer in a revocation proceeding are different from those afforded a defendant in a criminal proceeding. Due process protections for a revocation hearing are codified in 46-18-203. Triplett argued he was denied due process because the state failed to bring him before the judge for his final revocation hearing without unnecessary delay, which he asserted is required by 46-18-203(4). The state argued, and the Supreme Court agreed, that the "without unnecessary delay" language plainly referred to the first court appearance after an offender is arrested pursuant to a revocation petition. Triplett also argued that even if the "without unnecessary delay" language of 46-18-203(4) does not apply to the revocation hearing, minimum due process requirements require that a revocation hearing take place within a reasonable time. The delays at issue in this case arose out of the parties' scheduling needs, particularly Triplett's. Triplett also made multiple requests for change of counsel. Triplett was not in a position to claim the delays were unfair when his counsel procured many of them, either by seeking a continuance or by delaying efforts to schedule a hearing date, and when Triplett's requests for new counsel added to the uncertainty of the schedule. The Supreme Court held that the scheduling of the revocation hearing was fundamentally fair and Triplett's due process rights were not violated. St. v. Triplett, 2008 MT 360, 346 M 383, 195 P3d 819 (2008). See also St. v. Edmundson, 2014 MT 12, 373 Mont. 338, 317 P.3d 169.

Original Sentence — Sentence Review Decision as Final: Triplett entered into a plea agreement with the state and pleaded guilty to one count of sexual intercourse without consent in exchange for the state dismissing the other two counts. Triplett was made ineligible for parole until he completed phases I and II of the sex offender treatment program. The court also imposed other conditions upon his suspended sentence. Pursuant to the agreement, Triplett answered "true" to some of the alleged violations of his sentence conditions in exchange for the state's agreement to request dismissal of other allegations and to recommend the court impose the sentence it originally imposed, which was 12 years with 4 suspended. Based on his admissions, the court found Triplett did violate the terms of the suspended portion of his previously imposed sentence. The District Court indicated it had not decided whether it would follow the terms of the plea agreement and scheduled a dispositional hearing for May 1, 2007. Stating that it saw nothing in the statutes giving it authority to overturn the amended judgment and commitment of the Sentence Review Division, the court sentenced Triplett to 40 years in the state prison with 20 years suspended. Triplett received credit for 595 days prior time served in prison and in jail during the revocation proceedings. Triplett appealed, contending that he should have received the original sentence imposed by the District Court. The Supreme Court held that the only logical interpretation of 46-18-203 in light of the authority of the Sentence Review Division is that a sentence imposed by the Division steps into the stead of the previous District Court sentence and, in effect, becomes the "original" sentence for purposes of revocation. The statute says that Division sentences are "final." Only this interpretation can give meaning and purpose to the sentence review process as a "critical stage" of the criminal proceeding. St. v. Triplett, 2008 MT 360, 346 M 383, 195 P3d 819 (2008), followed in St. v. Lambert, 2010 MT 287, 359 Mont. 8, 248 P.3d 295.

Due Process in Probation Revocation Process Considered Constitutionally Adequate: The following procedures in 46-23-1012 provide adequate due process to an alleged probation violator: (1) the probation officer must file a report of violation within 10 days of the probationer's arrest; (2) the state must bring the probationer before a judge for a hearing on the charges without unnecessary delay after the report of violation is filed; and (3) the state must notify the probationer at the hearing of the alleged probation violations. St. v. Johnston, 2008 MT 318, 346 M 93, 193 P3d 925 (2008), overruled in part in St. v. Maynard, 2010 MT 115, 356 Mont. 333, 233 P.3d 331. See also St. v. Swan, 220 M 162, 713 P2d 1003 (1986), and St. v. Evans, 2012 MT 115, 365 Mont. 163, 280 P.3d 871.

No Prosecution for Breach of Suspended Sentence Only: As a condition of Letasky's suspended sentence for partner or family member assault, he was directed to have no contact with the victim. When contact allegedly occurred, Letasky was charged with criminal contempt. Letasky moved to dismiss the charge, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. A condition of a suspended sentence, unlike a court order, is not an independent mandate of the court, but instead represents a requirement that Montana law allows the court to place upon an order suspending an offender's sentence. An offender may be prosecuted for a crime if the facts that establish the offender's noncompliance with a condition of the suspended sentence also establish the elements of a crime, but an offender may not be prosecuted based only on breach of the condition itself. St. v. Letasky, 2007 MT 51, 336 M 178, 152 P3d 1288 (2007), distinguished in St. v. Fadness, 2012 MT 12, 363 Mont. 322, 268 P.3d 17.

Inapplicability of Mental Disease or Defect Sentencing Provisions to Probation Revocation Proceedings: Boulton asserted that because her probation violations were the result of a mental illness, she should have been sentenced to continued probation with intense supervision pursuant to 46-14-311 and 46-14-312, rather than committed to the Department of Corrections. The state argued that sentencing provisions related to a defendant with a mental disease or defect apply only to original sentencing and not to sentence revocation proceedings. The Supreme Court agreed with the state. It is generally irrelevant whether a probation violation may have been committed while a probationer was suffering a mental disease or defect. Rather, the question is whether the purposes of rehabilitation are being achieved and whether, by virtue of subsequent criminal conduct or evidence that a probationer's behavior was not in compliance with the rules and objectives of the probation, the objectives of probation are best served by continued liberty or by incarceration. The alternative sentencing provisions of 46-14-311 and 46-14-312 do not apply in sentence revocation proceedings, although the revoking court may consider evidence of a mental disease or defect during the proceedings. In the present case, after Boulton pleaded true to multiple probation violations, the revoking court concluded that evidence of Boulton's mental disorders did not warrant placement in the state hospital, consistent with the testimony of Boulton's psychiatrist, and that placement with the Department better served the purposes of probation. Revocation of Boulton's sentence was affirmed. St. v. Boulton, 2006 MT 170, 332 M 538, 140 P3d 482 (2006), following St. v. Averill, 2001 MT 161, 306 M 106, 30 P3d 1059 (2001).

Improper Nunc Pro Tunc Judgments Reducing Credit for Time Served Vacated: By nunc pro tunc judgment, the District Court reduced the number of days of credit that Megard received for prior incarceration after two suspended commitments to the Department of Corrections were revoked, and Megard appealed. The Supreme Court reviewed the sentence for legality, noting that once a valid sentence has been pronounced, a District Court has no authority to modify or change it except as provided by statute. Under 46-18-116(3), a factually erroneous judgment can be corrected at any time, but the original judgments against Megard were not factually incorrect in that Megard was properly credited for time served at that time and the credit did not conflict with the oral pronouncement of Megard's sentence from the bench. Thus, the District Court's amended nunc pro tunc judgments were not within the purview of 46-18-116(3) and, being illegal, were vacated. The case was remanded for reinstatement of the original judgments. St. v. Megard, 2006 MT 84, 332 M 27, 134 P3d 90 (2006), following St. v. Fertterer, 260 M 397, 860 P2d 151 (1993), and St. v. Kroll, 2004 MT 203, 322 M 294, 95 P3d 717 (2004).

Probation Violation — Standard of Review: When a probation violation has occurred, the District Court must exercise its discretion in determining an appropriate action in response to the violation, and the Supreme Court will not intervene absent an abuse of that discretion. St. v. Burke, 2005 MT 250, 329 M 1, 122 P3d 427 (2005), following St. v. Pedersen, 2003 MT 315, 318 M 262, 80 P3d 79 (2003).

Oral and Written Versions of Original Sentence Requiring Outpatient Sexual Offender Treatment — Violation of Suspended Sentence: The District Court revoked Van Haele's suspended sentence on grounds that he failed to qualify for outpatient sexual offender treatment. Van Haele contended that the sentencing condition was improperly added by amendment and that he was entitled to a hearing on the added condition because it was not part of the original sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed. The requirement could not have been added to the original sentence because it was part of the original oral and written sentence, so no hearing was required. The basis for revoking Van Haele's suspended sentence was therefore not invalid, and suspension was affirmed. St. v. Van Haele, 2005 MT 153, 327 M 400, 114 P3d 225 (2005).

Credit Allowed for Time Served Concurrently With Other Sentences: Tracy's original sentence in Cascade County was for 10 years suspended with the Department of Corrections, to run concurrently with two other sentences that Tracy received in Yellowstone County. When Tracy violated his release conditions, the District Court in Cascade County revoked the original 10-year sentence but declined to give Tracy credit for the time served in detention pursuant to the Yellowstone County sentences. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that, when read together, 46-18-401 and this section require that Tracy be given credit for time spent in a detention center or on home arrest on all the sentences that were being served concurrently. The case was remanded to calculate and grant appropriate credit. St. v. Tracy, 2005 MT 128, 327 M 220, 113 P3d 297 (2005).

Imposition of More Burdensome Prison Sentence in Place of Placement With Department of Corrections — Illegal Ex Post Facto Application of Former Sentencing Statute: Tracy's original sentence in Cascade County was for 10 years suspended with the Department of Corrections, to run concurrently with two other sentences that Tracy received in Yellowstone County. Tracy eventually discharged the incarceration portions of both Yellowstone County sentences. When Tracy violated his release conditions, the District Court in Cascade County revoked the original 10-year sentence to the Department of Corrections and resentenced Tracy to 10 years at the state prison. Tracy appealed the imposition of the prison sentence. Under the version of this section in effect at the time of Tracy's original offense in 1996, if Tracy violated the terms of his suspended sentence, the District Court could revoke the sentence and require Tracy to serve either the sentence imposed or a lesser sentence. The statute was later amended to require an offender to serve either the sentence imposed or any sentence that could have been imposed as long as the sentence is not longer than the original sentence. The Supreme Court held that a prison sentence was not the same or less than the original sentence with the Department of Corrections in an appropriate facility or program. Rather, the new sentence imposed an additional, more burdensome condition requiring Tracy to go to prison. Although the new sentence was appropriate under the amended 2003 version of this section, application of the 2003 version to a crime committed in 1996 was an ex post facto application that could not pass constitutional muster, so the Supreme Court vacated the prison sentence and remanded for resentencing under the version of this section in effect at the time of the original judgment. St. v. Tracy, 2005 MT

128, 327 M 220, 113 P3d 297 (2005), followed in St. v. Graves, 2015 MT 262, 381 Mont. 37, 355 P.3d 769.

No Standing to Raise Constitutionality of Restitution Statutes Absent Showing of Direct Personal Injury: The 2003 Legislature amended the state restitution statutes, and Thaut sought to challenge the constitutionality of the amendments on numerous grounds. However, Thaut was unable to show a direct personal injury resulting from application of the restitution laws. Pursuant to St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298 (1990), and Helena Parents Comm'n v. Lewis & Clark County Comm'rs, 277 M 367, 922 P2d 1140 (1996), Thaut lacked standing to challenge the constitutionality of the restitution statutes, and the Supreme Court declined to address the issue. St. v. Thaut, 2004 MT 359, 324 M 460, 103 P3d 1012 (2004). See also St. v. Ellis, 2007 MT 210, 339 M 14, 167 P3d 896 (2007), in which defendant established direct economic injury and thus standing to challenge the constitutionality of repayment conditions on equal protection grounds through the District Court's order to repay $2,398 in costs of appointed counsel.

Misdemeanor Contempt Not Enforceable More Than One Year After Sentence Expired: On April 9, 1998, Dexter was sentenced in Justice's Court to 1 year in jail for third offense DUI. The sentence was suspended on condition that Dexter serve 90 days in jail and pay a $770 fine, but Dexter did neither. Sentence revocation proceedings could have been instituted under this section during the time of Dexter's sentence, but were not. About 3 years later, Dexter was arrested on an outstanding warrant after the suspended sentence had expired, and the Justice's Court invoked its contempt powers to sentence Dexter to jail time for failing to fulfill the conditions of the suspended sentence. The Justice of the Peace contended that under 3-10-401, contempt proceedings could be brought at any time, and the District Court concluded that the Justice's Court had the authority to enforce compliance with the lawful sentencing order, but on appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. Under the penalties in 3-1-519 in effect at the time (repealed in 2001), contempt of court constituted a misdemeanor crime, which was required under 45-1-205(2)(b) to be prosecuted within 1 year of commission. The last day on which Dexter could have committed contempt was April 9, 1999, so prosecution was required to be commenced by April 9, 2000. Because the contempt prosecution did not commence until Dexter was arrested on January 23, 2002, the Justice's Court lacked jurisdiction to hold Dexter in contempt for failure to comply with the terms of a sentence that expired in April 1999. Dexter v. Shields, 2004 MT 159, 322 M 6, 92 P3d 1208 (2004). See also Milanovich v. Milanovich, 200 M 83, 655 P2d 959 (1982).

No Constitutional Violation in Admission of Telephonic Testimony at Revocation Hearing — No Abuse of Discretion Upon Good Cause: To accommodate counsel, the state moved to allow the admission of telephonic testimony from two law enforcement officers who could not attend Megard's sentence revocation hearing in person. Megard objected, relying on Rule 611, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), and In re Marriage of Bonamarte, 263 M 170, 866 P2d 1132 (1994). The District Court held that neither the rule nor Bonamarte applied and that Megard's fundamental rights would be adequately protected, so the motion was granted. On appeal, Megard also contended that allowing the telephonic testimony violated his due process right and the right to confront witnesses. The Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court was familiar with the witnesses. Allowing telephonic testimony did not impede the ability to judge a witness's credibility in relation to other witnesses, who corroborated the testimony, because knowledge of a witness's identity and credentials may constitute a special circumstance under which telephonic testimony is allowed. Although telephonic testimony is generally not allowed in trials absent special circumstances or the parties' consent, evidentiary rules do not apply to revocation proceedings. Because a revocation hearing is not a criminal trial, Megard had no constitutional right to confront witnesses at the hearing. Further, Megard's due process rights were not violated because his counsel actually cross-examined the witnesses, and good cause existed for the District Court to admit the telephonic testimony to address scheduling conflicts. Even if error occurred, it was harmless, given Megard's failure to establish prejudice pursuant to St. v. Pedersen, 2003 MT 315, 318 M 262, 80 P3d 79 (2003). St. v. Megard, 2004 MT 67, 320 M 323, 87 P3d 448 (2004).

No Requirement to Bifurcate Revocation Hearing Into Evidentiary and Dispositional Phases: Pedersen contended that he was entitled to a bifurcated sentence revocation hearing, with the evidentiary and dispositional phases separated into two distinct hearings, and that the only proper time for introducing and rebutting evidence was during the evidentiary phase of the hearing. However, Pedersen cited no authority for the bifurcation proposition, and the Supreme Court declined to adopt it. The District Court has wide latitude to control courtroom proceedings, and it was not an abuse of the court's discretion to allow the state to present evidence during the dispositional phase, rather than divide the hearing into distinct proceedings for evidentiary purposes. St. v. Pedersen, 2003 MT 315, 318 M 262, 80 P3d 79 (2003).

Probation Revocation Based on Statements of Defense Counsel Without Waiver of Right to Hearing by Defendant Violative of Due Process: At Finley's rerevocation hearing, his attorney told the court that Finley had decided to admit violating the terms of his probation. The court accepted the admission, revoked probation, and sentenced Finley to 10 years in prison. Finley immediately asked to withdraw the admission, but the request was denied. On appeal, Finley contended that his due process rights were violated because he never personally admitted any alleged violations or waived the right to a revocation hearing. The state countered that Finley did not refute counsel's statement, so the court was correct to accept counsel's statement as true and revoke Finley's suspended sentence. In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court agreed with Finley. Under this section, a probationer is guaranteed a hearing before the sentencing court. Alternatively, a probationer may waive the right to a full revocation hearing and admit the alleged violation or accept favorable relief granted by the court, but for a waiver of a fundamental right to be recognized by the courts, the waiver must be informed, intelligent, and voluntary, and this applies to waiver of a revocation hearing as well. Courts may not presume waiver based on the representations of counsel. Here, in accepting counsel's statement, the District Court committed reversible error when it: (1) failed to admonish Finley regarding his constitutional rights; (2) neglected to ascertain that Finley knew the consequences of admitting a parole violation; (3) failed to determine that Finley voluntarily waived the right to a revocation hearing; (4) accepted a waiver of the right to a hearing based on presumption only; and (5) failed to establish a factual basis for the alleged violation. The state's argument that Finley admitted the violations at a prior initial revocation hearing also failed. The District Court took no notice of the entry of Finley's admission at the prior voided hearing, nor was testimony at the earlier voided proceeding admissible as evidence during the later proceeding. Because Finley's alleged waiver was not informed, intelligent, and voluntary, his due process rights were violated, and the case was remanded. St. v. Finley, 2003 MT 239, 317 M 268, 77 P3d 193 (2003). See also Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 US 778 (1973), and People v. Hall, 760 NE 2d 971 (Ill. 2001).

No Credit for Time Served on Informal House Arrest: The District Court conditioned Gulbranson's release on bond with informal house arrest. Gulbranson contended that the house arrest restricted his liberty in a manner sufficiently similar to incarceration, as provided in 46-18-403, to require that he be given credit for time served. However, Gulbranson did not cite any legal authority to support the contention, and the Supreme Court declined to consider the unsupported argument. Instead, the Supreme Court held that the informal house arrest in this case was not house arrest as provided for in Title 46, ch. 18, part 10, so this section did not require that Gulbranson's sentences be credited with time served for that period. Gulbranson failed to show that the District Court was statutorily required to credit him for time served while released on bond, so it was within the District Court's discretion whether to allow credit. Absent an abuse of discretion, the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Gulbranson, 2003 MT 139, 316 M 163, 69 P3d 1187 (2003), followed in St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 112, 342 M 461, 182 P3d 62 (2008), and in St. v. Makarchuk, 2009 MT 82, 349 M 507, 204 P3d 1213 (2009).

Probationer Not Entitled to Good Time Credit for Time Served on Original Sentence: Williams' suspended sentence for felony assault was revoked after Williams violated the terms of the suspension. Williams requested that he be credited for good time that he served on the suspended sentence. The District Court concluded that Williams was a probationer, not a parolee, and declined to grant good time credit. Williams appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Williams' original sentence did not provide that Williams be treated as a parolee, so as a probationer, Williams was not entitled to credit for good time under McDermott v. Dept. of Corrections, 2001 MT 134, 305 M 462, 29 P3d 992 (2001). St. v. Williams, 2003 MT 136, 316 M 140, 69 P3d 222 (2003).

Dual Statutory Revocation Proceedings — Formal Revocation Proceedings Not Subject to Time and Procedural Requirements of Probation Violator Prison Diversion Program: Section 46-23-1012 authorizes two distinct methods of commencing revocation. One method is the formal proceeding outlined in 46-23-1012(1) and this section. The other method is an abbreviated proceeding initiated by detention by the probation and parole office, known as the probation violator prison diversion program, set forth in 46-23-1012(3) through (5), and the abbreviated proceeding may be converted to a formal revocation pursuant to 46-23-1012(5). The time and procedural requirements of the probation violator prison diversion program, as provided in 46-23-1012(3) through (5), do not apply to the formal proceeding initiated pursuant to 46-23-1012(1) and this section, which requires that an offender be brought before the court without unnecessary delay. Gonzales v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 259, 307 M 228, 37 P3d 653 (2001), followed in St. v. Finley, 2003 MT 239, 317 M 268, 77 P3d 193 (2003).

No Credit Allowed for Time Served While on Probation: Gundrum was placed on probation but was later arrested on a probation violation. Gundrum contended that he should receive credit for the time that he was on probation under 46-18-402, even though he was not incarcerated. The Supreme Court disagreed. Section 46-18-402 applies to credit for time served while incarcerated and thus does not apply to Gundrum. Further, under this section and McDermott v. Dept. of Corrections, 2001 MT 134, 305 M 462, 29 P3d 992 (2001), a judge has complete discretion to consider elapsed time that an offender is on probation and may expressly allow or reject the time as credit on the offender's sentence. Here, the District Court considered the nature of Gundrum's violations and the magnitude of his financial obligations before denying credit for time served on probation. Gundrum did not assert that the District Court failed to follow the mandates of this section, and the Supreme Court affirmed the denial of credit for time that Gundrum served on probation. Gundrum v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 246, 307 M 96, 36 P3d 890 (2001).

No Power of State to Refile Petition to Revoke Suspended or Deferred Sentence Once Original Sentence Expires: Vance claimed that because a probable cause hearing was not held within 36 hours of arrest under a bench warrant for probation revocation, the provisions of St. v. Giddings, 2001 MT 76, 305 M 74, 29 P3d 475 (2001), should apply and the revocation proceedings should be rendered void. The state agreed that Giddings applied, but indicated that a petition for revocation of deferred sentence would be refiled pursuant to 46-23-1012. Vance pointed out that the original deferred sentence had expired, and argued that the refile of a petition for revocation of an expired sentence was prohibited under this section. The state contended that the reasoning in St. v. Goebel, 2001 MT 73, 305 M 53, 31 P3d 335 (2001), implied that the original sentence was tolled during the period of the void proceedings for purposes of refile of a petition to revoke. The Supreme Court agreed with Vance. The fact that the previous revocation proceedings were defective and therefore void ab initio did not mean that time stood still during the defective proceedings, nor do Giddings and Goebel suspend the provisions of this section, which clearly state that the petition for revocation must be filed with the sentencing court during the period of suspension or deferral. Nothing in law allows the state to refile a revocation petition to relate back to the date of the probation violation, and once the term of the sentence expires, the state has no more power to refile to revoke the suspended or deferred sentence than it would have to file an original proceeding to revoke under those circumstances. Vance v. Acton, 2001 MT 243, 307 M 71, 36 P3d 881 (2001).

Discretionary Sentencing Authority Including Reassignment of Original Consecutive Terms as Concurrent Terms: Frazier was sentenced in Cascade County to 55 years with 25 suspended on four felony counts. The first three sentences were ordered to run consecutively, and the sentence for the fourth count was ordered to run concurrently with the sentence for the third count. After serving 7 years, and 2 weeks before his scheduled release from a prerelease center, Frazier was convicted in Silver Bow County of two counts of felony drug violations and was sentenced to concurrent prison terms of 8 years and 5 years, to run concurrently with the outstanding Cascade County sentences. About 2 months later, the Cascade County Attorney petitioned to revoke the suspended portions of the Cascade County sentences on grounds that Frazier had violated the terms of the suspensions. The Cascade County District Court revoked the suspended sentences and recommended Frazier's participation in a boot camp program, ordering that if the program was successfully completed, the court would consider reimposing a probationary sentence for the remaining term of the sentences. Frazier appealed on grounds that the court made several mistakes and believed that it lacked authority upon revocation to assign Frazier's three consecutive terms to run concurrently. The Supreme Court agreed with Frazier and remanded for resentencing. When the District Court determined to retain jurisdiction after sentence revocation, the court had statutory authority to alter the terms and conditions of the original sentences, as long as the new sentence remained within the parameters set forth by the original sentencing court and imposed no new restrictions, and that discretionary authority included the power to reassign Frazier's terms to run concurrently when they were originally designated to run consecutively. St. v. Frazier, 2001 MT 210, 306 M 358, 34 P3d 96 (2001). See also St. v. Docken, 274 M 296, 908 P2d 213 (1995), and St. v. Gordon, 1999 MT 169, 295 M 183, 983 P2d 377 (1999).

Failure to Complete Prison Sex Offender Program Not Because of Defendant's Willful Conduct — Consideration of Incarceration Alternatives Constitutionally Required: Lee was sentenced to two concurrent 40-year terms in prison for sexual intercourse without consent and attempted sexual intercourse without consent and was ineligible for parole during the first 10 years of the sentence unless a sex offender treatment plan was successfully completed. Lee entered prison in 1995 and immediately requested enrollment in Phase I of the two-phase program. Lee was finally enrolled in Phase I after a 3-year wait, successfully completed that phase, and was placed on a waiting list for enrollment in Phase II. Because of a sitdown strike, Lee was unable to complete Phase II by his scheduled release date. The state petitioned to revoke Lee's suspended sentence because the program was not completed, and Lee moved to dismiss on grounds that the failure to complete treatment was not his fault. The District Court found that Lee's failure to complete the program was not due to any volitional conduct on Lee's part, but the court nevertheless determined that the failure constituted a violation of the terms of the suspended sentence and ordered Lee to serve the remaining 30 years on each count, declaring Lee ineligible for parole until both phases of treatment were completed. Lee appealed on grounds that the court violated his right to due process because it was impossible to complete the program during incarceration because of prison waiting periods and the length of the program. The Supreme Court agreed. In St. v. Williams, 1999 MT 240, 296 M 258, 993 P2d 1 (1999), it was held that a court could revoke a suspended sentence even though a probationer's failure to comply with the terms of the sentence was not willful, and the court in this case affirmed Williams to the extent that violations of nonfinancial probationary conditions need not necessarily be willful in order to justify revocation. However, the probationer in Williams was unable to gain acceptance into sex offender programs because of a lack of social skills, immaturity, and "acting out" behavior, whereas Lee was unable to access the programs because of actions of the state. Due process required the trial court to consider whether there were alternatives to incarceration that would further the purpose of Lee's suspended sentence. The Supreme Court remanded for a determination of whether there were any reasonable alternative measures other than continued incarceration because to do otherwise would deprive Lee of his conditional freedom simply because the state prevented him from completing the sex offender program while imprisoned. St. v. Lee, 2001 MT 176, 306 M 173, 31 P3d 998 (2001), distinguished in St. v. Price, 2008 MT 319, 346 M 106, 193 P3d 921 (2008).

Imprisonment for Probation Violation Not Considered Double Jeopardy: Walker was convicted of felony DUI, sentenced to 6 months in prison followed by 2 years of supervised probation, and fined $1,000. Following 6 months' confinement, Walker was released and began serving the probationary sentence but violated the terms of probation about 1 year later. During revocation hearings, Walker contended that additional incarceration pursuant to 61-8-731 (now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10) for probation violations would constitute double jeopardy because the entirety of the 6 months' prison term had already been served. The District Court disagreed, revoked probation, and committed Walker to the Department of Corrections for the time remaining on the original 2-year probation. Walker appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The court found no distinction between the revocation of a suspended sentence and the revocation of a probationary sentence. In either case, the subsequent conduct, not the original offense, forms the basis for revocation, and the sentencing court retains jurisdiction over the defendant during the period of probation. Walker conceded that 61-8-731 provides by its terms for revocation of probation and for incarceration upon violation of probation. The revocation is not new punishment for the criminal offense of felony DUI, but rather constitutes the consequence of violating probationary conditions. Walker failed to bear the burden of proving 61-8-731 unconstitutional beyond a reasonable doubt on double jeopardy grounds. St. v. Walker, 2001 MT 170, 306 M 159, 30 P3d 1099 (2001), distinguishing St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999).

Proof of Constructive Possession of Firearm Sufficient to Show Possession in Violation of Probationary Condition: Caekaert, who had been earlier placed on probation subject to the condition that he "not own, possess, or be in control of any firearms . . . as defined by State or Federal law", was found to have firearms in an outbuilding on real property that he owned. Caekaert possessed a key to the building in which the firearms were found but claimed that the firearms belonged to friends or relatives and that he did not exercise control over the firearms because the owners had not given him permission to do so. The District Court found Caekaert to have violated the terms of his probation and revoked the probation. Citing St. v. Meader, 184 M 32, 601 P2d 386 (1979), the Supreme Court found that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in revoking the probation because there was sufficient evidence that Caekaert was in possession of the weapons because he exercised constructive possession over the weapons. St. v. Caekaert, 1999 MT 147, 295 M 42, 983 P2d 332, 56 St. Rep. 583 (1999).

Finding of Violation of Suspended Sentence Predicate to Continuation of Sentence With Modifications or Additional Conditions: As part of the sentencing order, the original sentencing court provided that Nelson not be considered for parole until successfully completing the sexual offender program at Montana State Prison. Nelson was never paroled from the prison. Instead, he was discharged from the prison and began the suspended portion of his sentence in Big Horn County. The Big Horn County Attorney filed for revocation of Nelson's suspended sentence, alleging that Nelson violated and disregarded the rules of probation by failing to successfully complete a sexual offender program. The court denied the petition for revocation but imposed additional conditions to the original suspended sentence. When Nelson violated one of the new conditions, his suspended sentence was revoked. The clear language of this section requires that the trial court find that the defendant violated the terms and conditions of the suspended sentence as a predicate to exercising its authority to continue the suspended sentence with modified or additional terms and conditions. A District Court has no power to impose a sentence in the absence of specific statutory authority. Having failed to make the statutorily required predicate finding that Nelson violated the terms of the suspended sentence, the court was without authority to continue the suspended sentence with modified or additional terms and conditions and thus without authority to revoke Nelson's suspended sentence for violation of the added condition. St. v. Nelson, 1998 MT 227, 291 M 15, 966 P2d 133, 55 St. Rep. 949 (1998), followed, with regard to the Supreme Court's plenary review of a question of law concerning whether a District Court had authority to take a specific action, in St. v. Van Haele, 2005 MT 153, 327 M 400, 114 P3d 225 (2005).

Modification of Original Sentence as Dangerous Offender Not Allowed: At the time of Moorman's original sentencing in 1982, 46-18-404 (now repealed) did not allow a District Court in a revocation proceeding to add new terms or conditions to a defendant's original sentence. The court could not impose a dangerous offender designation upon revocation of a suspended sentence when the original sentence was silent on the issue or designated the defendant as nondangerous. However, Moorman was designated a dangerous offender when originally sentenced. Under the version of this section in effect at the time of sentencing, the court could revoke the suspension or impose sentence and order Moorman committed but could not modify the sentence. Therefore, Moorman's original dangerous offender designation remained a part of his sentence upon the subsequent revocation of his suspended sentence. St. v. Moorman, 279 M 330, 928 P2d 145, 53 St. Rep. 1173 (1996).

Privilege Against Self-Incrimination as Self-Executing Under Threat of Penalty: Citing numerous federal cases, the Supreme Court held that a person claiming protection against self-incrimination generally must affirmatively invoke it, even when the government is unquestionably attempting to compel an answer. If a witness under compulsion to answer makes disclosures instead of claiming the privilege, the witness cannot be said to have been compelled to self-incriminate. A defendant's ignorance of the right against self-incrimination generally does not excuse the failure to claim the privilege, and if the defendant fails to assert the privilege, it is considered waived. However, failure to invoke the privilege does not preclude the benefit if the defendant is placed in a situation in which the defendant is not free to admit, deny, or refuse to answer. In that case, the privilege is said to be self-executing. One such case is when the government prevents a voluntary invocation of the privilege by threatening to penalize the individual if the privilege is invoked. A command to speak, under threat of loss of liberty, implicitly forecloses the option of remaining silent. In the present case, Fuller was convicted of rape and sexual assault and was required to enter sexual offender treatment. As part of the treatment, he was required to disclose his offense history and was told that failure to do so would result in revocation of probation and subsequent imprisonment. Fuller complied, admitting prior offenses, which were reported and for which he was then charged and arrested. Fuller was essentially ordered to incriminate himself to avoid punishment, and despite the holding in St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979 (1991), that a sentencing court lacks authority to revoke probation solely on grounds that a defendant refuses to admit guilt, the threat of punishment was credible and Fuller's reliance on the belief that the court could carry out the threat was reasonable. Because the state improperly compelled Fuller to disclose past criminal acts in violation of his right against compelled self-incrimination and his right to remain silent, the state was prohibited from using any of the elicited information as the basis for a later, separate criminal prosecution. St. v. Fuller, 276 M 155, 915 P2d 809, 53 St. Rep. 325 (1996), discussed in St. v. Woods, 283 M 359, 942 P2d 88, 54 St. Rep. 617 (1997), and followed in St. v. Woods, 2005 MT 186, 328 M 54, 117 P3d 152 (2005), and St. v. Plouffe, 2014 MT 183, 375 Mont. 429, 329 P.3d 1255. See also Minn. v. Murphy, 465 US 420, 79 L Ed 2d 409, 104 S Ct 1136 (1984), and In re A.N. & C.N., 2000 MT 35, 298 M 237, 995 P2d 427, 57 St. Rep. 155 (2000).

Increase in Restitution Based on Revised Sentencing Provisions Barred as Ex Post Facto: At a sentence revocation hearing, the District Court considered Leistiko's motion to reduce his monthly restitution payments based on his financial situation. The court reduced payments for 3 months but increased the total restitution by $10,000. Leistiko relied on the 1983 version of this section that was in effect at the time of the crime and the initial sentencing, contending that the court did not have authority to apply the 1991 revised version of this section to increase restitution. Under Weaver v. Graham, 450 US 24, 67 L Ed 2d 17, 101 S Ct 960 (1981), an increase in the severity of a criminal punishment compared with that authorized at the time the act was committed is a criminal conduct measure coming within the ban on ex post facto laws. The Supreme Court applied the test set out in Miller v. Fla., 482 US 423, 96 L Ed 2d 351, 107 S Ct 2446 (1987), in determining whether the constitutional ban on ex post facto laws was violated: (1) the law must be retrospective; and (2) it must disadvantage the offender affected by it. The revised version of this section changed the legal consequences of Leistiko's crime by allowing the District Court to change the sentence, placing a more onerous burden on Leistiko than he could have foreseen at the time he committed the crime and entered into the original plea agreement. The portion of the order imposing additional restitution was vacated under Art. II, sec. 31, Mont. Const. St. v. Leistiko, 256 M 32, 844 P2d 97, 49 St. Rep. 1104 (1992), followed in In re Young, 1999 MT 195, 295 M 394, 983 P2d 985, 56 St. Rep. 759 (1999), St. v. Shockley, 2001 MT 180, 306 M 196, 31 P3d 350 (2001), and St. v. Brister, 2002 MT 13, 308 M 154, 41 P3d 314 (2002).

Abuse of Discretion in Probation Revocation for Failure to Complete Sexual Offender Program — Standard of Review: Applying the standard set out in St. v. Robinson, 190 M 145, 619 P2d 813 (1980), that revocation of probation is appropriate if the judge is reasonably satisfied that the conduct of probationer was not what he agreed it would be if liberty was granted, the District Court revoked the probation of defendant who failed to complete a sexual offender program even though defendant had a 100% record in attending 76 group therapy and 13 individual therapy sessions, each session requiring a 150-mile round trip, and had paid $2,450 in counseling fees but still owed $1,260. The standard of review applied by the Supreme Court is whether the District Court abused its discretion. An abuse occurred in this case because revocation was based on defendant's failure to pay the full fees and his expression of religious beliefs at the therapy sessions, rather than a willingness to participate in the written portions of the program. The District Court could have required defendant to establish a payment plan or enter another program, but the terms of probation did not require him to give up his religious beliefs or take food from the family table to pay for counseling. St. v. Lundquist, 251 M 329, 825 P2d 204, 49 St. Rep. 65 (1992), distinguished in St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997). The standard of review was also applied in St. v. Price, 2008 MT 319, 346 M 106, 193 P3d 921 (2008).

Refusal to Admit Guilt Following Conviction — Augmentation of Sentence Prohibited: Defendant's sentence for sexual assault was suspended on the condition that he complete a sex offender treatment course. Despite attempts to seek enrollment in two separate courses, he was not accepted for treatment because he consistently denied committing a sexual offense. Upon evidence of his failure to complete a course, his suspended sentence was revoked and he was sentenced to 5 years in the state prison. The Supreme Court, following the decision in Thomas v. U.S., 368 F2d 941 (5th Cir. 1966), found that even though defendant had already been convicted of the crime he now denies, the criminal justice system still provides opportunities to challenge that conviction. These legally guaranteed rights would be rendered meaningless if defendant could be compelled to admit guilt as a condition to his continued freedom. While defendant would be foreclosed from invoking the protection of such procedures to establish his innocence, the reliability of an admission of guilt would be highly suspect. Additionally, because defendant testified in his own defense at trial and denied committing a sexual crime, by admitting his guilt, he would have abandoned his right against self-incrimination, not only as to the crime for which he was charged but also as to the crime of perjury. Therefore, absent any grant of immunity, when a defendant has consistently denied guilt, his right against self-incrimination should be protected and augmenting a defendant's sentence because he refuses to confess to a crime or invokes his privilege against self-incrimination is prohibited. St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979, 48 St. Rep. 588 (1991), overruling any holding to the contrary in St. v. Donnelly, 244 M 371, 798 P2d 89, 47 St. Rep. 1600 (1990), and distinguished in St. v. Butler, 272 M 286, 900 P2d 908, 52 St. Rep. 745 (1995), and St. v. Osborne, 2007 MT 217, 339 M 45, 167 P3d 405 (2007).

"Fundamental Fairness" Standard: At a probation revocation hearing, the standard required is "fundamental fairness". The hearing is not a criminal trial. The defendant has already been convicted of a crime, and the hearing is for the purpose of establishing violations of the prisoner's probation. The process must be flexible enough to allow the court to consider documentary evidence that may not meet usual evidentiary requirements. Therefore, the admission into evidence of police officers' hearsay statements was not error, and defendant's constitutional right to due process was not violated. St. v. Kingery, 239 M 160, 779 P2d 495, 46 St. Rep. 1587 (1989).

Probation Revocation — Due Process Requirements: In a probation revocation hearing, the due process requirements are: (1) written notice of the violations; (2) disclosure of evidence against the probationer; (3) opportunity to be heard in person and to present witnesses and evidence; (4) a neutral tribunal; (5) a written statement by the fact finder of the evidence relied on and the reasons for the revocation; (6) the right to cross-examine witnesses unless the hearing body finds good cause for disallowing confrontation; and (7) the right to counsel in some circumstances. The record in this case establishes that all of these requirements were met and that defendant's constitutional rights were upheld. St. v. Kingery, 239 M 160, 779 P2d 495, 46 St. Rep. 1587 (1989).

Closure of Probation Revocation Hearing — Interruption a Contempt — Prior Notice of Closure Not Required: The public and the press have the right, with limited exceptions, to attend and observe probation revocation hearings. In a proper case, a District Court may close such a hearing. When a hearing is properly closed, no member of the public or representative of the press may interrupt the due course of the hearing in a manner that might defeat the reason for closure. Such an interruption constitutes a contempt of court. A District Court may proceed on an ad hoc basis, without giving prior notice, to make a closure decision in accordance with the facts and circumstances facing it at the time. State ex rel. Great Falls Tribune Co., Inc. v. District Court, 238 M 310, 777 P2d 345, 46 St. Rep. 1292 (1989).

No Preliminary or Probable Cause Hearing — Due Process: Defendant was not denied due process for the state's failure to provide an appearance denominated as a preliminary or probable cause hearing prior to a probation revocation hearing. After a defendant is arrested for violation of probation, he is brought before the court without unnecessary delay for a hearing on the violations charged. No two-stage hearing process is necessary under this statutory system because the reasons for having a preliminary hearing are absent. The revocation hearing is held promptly, before a defendant is returned to prison. The defendant receives notice of the hearing and alleged violations, and the hearing is held before a judge, rather than an administrative body. Section 46-23-1013 (now repealed) sets forth the procedure to follow after the arrest of a probationer for violation of probation. Because the scheme affords due process, the statute is not an unconstitutional violation of due process. St. v. Swan, 220 M 162, 713 P2d 1003, 43 St. Rep. 259 (1986). See also St. v. Kingery, 239 M 160, 779 P2d 495, 46 St. Rep. 1587 (1989).

Credibility of Probationer — Weak Alibi Testimony: Defendant's assertion that admission in probation revocation hearing of inadmissible probation violations had a detrimental impact on his credibility was pure fantasy. The record on appeal disclosed that if anything affected his credibility, it was his own testimony and that of his alibi witnesses that he was not present at the time and place of the alleged assault on his mother-in-law (one of the bases for petition for probation revocation) in the face of her positive identification of him as her assailant. St. v. Steffans, 195 M 395, 636 P2d 836, 38 St. Rep. 1976 (1981).

Evidence of Offenses Not Charged — Harmless Error: Admission in evidence, in probation revocation hearing, of alleged probation violations not contained in the petition to revoke was error but did not affect defendant's substantial rights and must be disregarded where two of the alleged violations were not made a basis of revocation of probation and, although the third was, the State introduced no evidence on the matter and all evidence on it was introduced by defendant. Defendant could not predicate reversible error on testimony he himself introduced. St. v. Steffans, 195 M 395, 636 P2d 836, 38 St. Rep. 1976 (1981).

Offenses Not Charged — Elimination From Consideration: The District Court, sitting without a jury in probation revocation hearing, is presumed to be able to properly evaluate evidence and determine the credibility of witnesses without regard to incompetent evidence, and that ability was demonstrated where the judge eliminated from consideration all alleged probation violations not charged by petition and affidavit for revocation and therefore erroneously admitted at hearing. St. v. Steffans, 195 M 395, 636 P2d 836, 38 St. Rep. 1976 (1981).

Scope of Court's Authority: The sentencing alternatives provided in the predecessor to this section were mutually exclusive, and a District Court lacked authority, upon revocation of a suspended sentence, to require the defendant to serve 60 days in the county jail followed by 34 months on a suspended sentence. St. v. Downing, 181 M 242, 593 P2d 43 (1979), overruled in St. v. Docken, 274 M 296, 908 P2d 213, 52 St. Rep. 1240 (1995).

Revocation — Correct Information: Rigorous standards are important when the trial court is passing upon the State's motion to revoke a deferred or suspended sentence. The trial judge must have, and the record must reflect that he has, substantially correct information concerning the defendant before he can affect a defendant's substantial rights by entering an order of revocation. St. v. Knapp, 174 M 373, 570 P2d 1138 (1977).

Preliminary Hearing Not Required to Establish Probable Cause: Where probation was revoked by original sentencing judge, petitioner was not denied minimum standards of due process as petitioner was not arrested until a bench warrant was issued pursuant to the final order of revocation after a hearing at which petitioner was represented at every step by counsel. Where no detention is involved, a preliminary hearing to establish probable cause for filing a petition for imposition of final judgment and sentence is not necessary as no rights of the probationer have been violated. In re Meidinger, 168 M 7, 539 P2d 1185 (1975).

Subsequent Arrest for Violation: When petitioner was placed on probation for 1 year on conditions aimed at rehabilitating him, subsequent imposition of judgment after he violated his probation did not put him in jeopardy in violation of the federal or Montana Constitution. In re Williams' Petition, 145 M 45, 399 P2d 732 (1965).

REVOCATION OF DEFERRAL

Defendant's Deferred Sentence Expired Prior to State's Filing of Revocation Petition — Sentence for Revocation Illegal — Remanded to District Court to Dismiss. St. v. Ellsworth, 2023 MT 8, 411 Mont. 213, 523 P.3d 527.

Revocation of Deferred Sentence for Felony Offense — District Court Had Full Authority to Reimpose 10-Year Sentence — Deferred Sentence Violated Through Compliance Violations — Further Efforts Under Montana Incentives and Intervention Grid Futile. St. v. Pennington, 2022 MT 180, 410 Mont. 104, 517 P.3d 894.

Revocation of Deferred Sentence Proper — Probation Officer's Efforts to Locate Defendant Reasonable: The defendant's deferred sentence was revoked by the District Court after he violated the terms of his sentence by failing to report to his probation officer for 5 months. The defendant appealed the revocation and argued that his probation officer did not make reasonable efforts to locate him. The Supreme Court, however, affirmed, noting that the defendant had failed to provide the probation officer his current contact information. St. v. Fjelsted, 2020 MT 278, 402 Mont. 46, 475 P.3d 387.

Revocation of Deferral for Absconding: The defendant did not report to his probation officer as ordered and did not respond to efforts by the probation officer to make contact. The District Court revoked the defendant's deferred imposition of sentence. On appeal, the defendant argued that his infraction was a "failure to report" and thus a compliance violation, rather than "absconding," a noncompliance violation. The Supreme Court affirmed, noting that the District Court correctly determined the defendant knew his obligation requiring he report to his probation officer and that the District Court correctly concluded the probation officer made reasonable efforts to contact the defendant. St. v. Oropeza, 2020 MT 16, 398 Mont. 379, 456 P.3d 1023.

No Good Faith Efforts to Pay Restitution — Deferred Sentence Revoked and New Sentence Imposed: The defendant was convicted of felony theft for defrauding the elderly, given a deferred sentence, and ordered to pay restitution. After the defendant paid only a small portion of the restitution order over 6 years, the state filed a petition to revoke his deferred sentence for failing to make good faith efforts to pay restitution. Following a hearing, the District Court found that the defendant had not made good faith efforts to pay restitution, revoked his deferred sentence, and imposed a new deferred sentence that required him to make monthly income and expense reports. The defendant appealed, claiming that he had made good faith efforts to pay restitution but simply could not afford to. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that substantial evidence supported the District Court's finding that the defendant had not made a reasonable effort to pay restitution. St. v. Johnson, 2018 MT 277, 393 Mont. 320, 430 P.3d 494.

Possession of Adult Magazine in Violation of Probation — Deferred Sentence Properly Revoked: A condition of Belanger's deferred sentence prohibited Belanger from using, viewing, or possessing erotica, X-rated videos, or adult books or magazines. At a revocation hearing, Belanger's landlord testified about finding an adult sex magazine in Belanger's room, which Belanger's probation officer described as an adult book or magazine. Belanger did not challenge that opinion but argued on appeal that the District Court could not have determined whether the magazine qualified as pornography or erotica without actually seeing the magazine, which was not introduced into evidence. The Supreme Court dismissed Belanger's argument as irrelevant. The District Court determined that the magazine qualified as an adult magazine, and the evidence was sufficient to support that determination. Revocation of Belanger's probation was affirmed. St. v. Belanger, 2008 MT 383, 347 M 61, 196 P3d 1248 (2008).

Due Process Requirements of Written Statement for Revoking Deferred Sentence — Record of Factfinding and Basis of Review Adequate: The District Court revoked Baird's deferred sentence, but Baird asserted that his due process rights were violated because the court failed to advise him of the reasons for the revocation in a written statement as required in 46-18-102 and Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 US 778 (1973). The Supreme Court found Baird's reliance of 46-18-102 and Gagnon to be misplaced. Rather, the sentencing court's memorandum combined with the hearing transcript may provide the necessary written statement explaining the evidence relied on and the reason for the revocation decision. Due process is achieved when the oral and written record support accurate factfinding and appellate review. In Baird's case, when read as a whole, the oral and written records provided an adequate basis for review and were adequate to determine that the District Court's decision to revoke the sentence was based on permissible grounds supported by the evidence. Thus, Gagnon and its progeny were adequately addressed, and Baird's sentence revocation was affirmed. St. v. Baird, 2006 MT 266, 334 M 185, 145 P3d 995 (2006). See also Black v. Romano, 471 US 606 (1985), and St. v. Richardson, 2000 MT 72, 299 M 102, 997 P2d 786 (2000).

Sufficient Evidence of Violation of Deferred Sentence Conditions to Warrant Revocation — No Minor Violation of Probation Agreements: As a condition of Baird's sentence for felony stalking, Baird was to obey all laws, not use alcohol or drugs, and have no contact with his ex-wife other than while exchanging their child at the County Sheriff's office. The state subsequently petitioned to revoke Baird's deferred sentence because of alleged probation violations. The District Court considered the evidence and revoked the sentence, and Baird appealed. Baird asserted that any violations were minor and that there was insufficient information to warrant revocation. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that under St. v. Aune, 2003 MT 3, 314 M 1, 61 P3d 785 (2003), there are no minor violations of probation agreements and that even one violation may be sufficient for revocation. In this case, Baird admitted to using marijuana, and he loitered around the Sheriff's office after the visitation exchanges in order to have contact with his ex-wife and declare his love. These probation violations were sufficient for the District Court to determine that Baird violated probation, and revocation of the deferred sentence was affirmed. St. v. Baird, 2006 MT 266, 334 M 185, 145 P3d 995 (2006).

Proof of Inability to Pay Restitution — Deferral of Sentence Extended to Allow Payment — Error: A probationer sufficiently proved that her failure to continue restitution payments was not caused by lack of a good faith effort to pay and that her income was insufficient to make even the $10 monthly payment that her probation officer was apparently willing to accept. The state's argument that she might soon receive a workers' compensation lump-sum settlement that she could use to pay the remaining restitution and would receive a "windfall" if her deferred sentence and probation were not extended for 2 years for failure to pay so that she could make further payments had no merit. Disability benefits are not a windfall; they are partial compensation for the loss of earning capacity. In addition, the duty to pay restitution remains until it is fully paid, and restitution may be collected in a civil proceeding at any time, including after the conclusion of state supervision under a sentence. Therefore, the District Court abused its discretion when it did not excuse the probationer's failure to pay, and the order extending the deferred sentence and probation for 2 years was reversed. St. v. Welling, 2002 MT 308, 313 M 67, 59 P3d 1146 (2002).

Stipulation That Witness's Testimony Unnecessary — Due Process Not Violated: When defendant stipulated that the presence and testimony of an out-of-state chemist was not necessary and that a report submitted regarding tests made on defendant could be received in evidence without foundation, defendant could not later complain that his right to confront and cross-examine the chemist at the revocation hearing was denied. St. v. Lange, 237 M 486, 775 P2d 213, 46 St. Rep. 991 (1989).

Failure to Appear for Probation Officer-Ordered Urine Sample — Minimal Grounds Required to Order Testing: It was error for the District Court to dismiss a petition for revocation of suspended sentence based on the defendant's failure to appear for purposes of providing a urine sample because the probation officer did not have some articulable reasons for requesting the test. Under the standard established in St. v. Burke, 235 M 165, 766 P2d 254, 45 St. Rep. 2278 (1988), the Supreme Court held that a probation officer's opinion that rehabilitation could not begin until the defendant was free of drugs and the fact that the defendant had not passed a drug test since his arrest constituted sufficient evidence to establish reasonable grounds for requiring a urine sample. St. v. Sigler, 236 M 137, 769 P2d 703, 46 St. Rep. 244 (1989).

State Immune From Suit for Illegal Imprisonment When Imprisonment Later Declared Contrary to Statute: In 1979, petitioner was convicted of issuing a bad check. Her sentence was deferred, and she was placed on probation for 3 years. In 1982, petitioner's deferral was revoked because she was convicted of another crime. As a result of the revocation, she was sentenced to serve 5 years in prison. Later in 1982, the Supreme Court, relying on its interpretation of 53-30-105 (as it read prior to its amendment in 1981) (now repealed) in Crist v. Segna, 191 M 210, 622 P2d 1028, 38 St. Rep. 150 (1981), ordered petitioner's release because at the time of her imprisonment she had accumulated sufficient good time credit on probation that her deferred sentence would have been fully served. Petitioner then sued for damages for illegal imprisonment. The Supreme Court held that the State was immune from suit under 2-9-112 because the sentence imposed on petitioner for her violation of probation was a judicial act. Knutson v. St., 211 M 126, 683 P2d 488, 41 St. Rep. 1258 (1984).

Petition to Revoke — Notice of Violations: One is entitled to prior notice of alleged violations that form the basis of a petition to revoke probation and deferred imposition of sentence. St. v. Steffans, 195 M 395, 636 P2d 836, 38 St. Rep. 1976 (1981), followed in St. v. Nelson, 225 M 215, 731 P2d 1299, 44 St. Rep. 181 (1987).

Revocation of Sentence Deferred or Suspended Longer Than Allowed by Statute — Pre-1983 Law:

Petitioner was convicted of felony theft. On May 22, 1978, he was given a 3-year deferred imposition of sentence on the condition that restitution be made. On August 20, 1979, this deferred sentence was continued and petitioner was ordered to complete restitution by November 5, 1980. This was not done, and a petition to revoke the deferred sentence was filed on January 16, 1981. A hearing on the petition was held May 27, 1981, 3 years and 5 days after the initial deferral. The court revoked the deferred sentence and sentenced petitioner to 3½ years in prison, over petitioner's objections that the District Court was without jurisdiction to do so. The District Court contended it retained jurisdiction when the petition to revoke is filed within the deferral time. On a petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus, the Supreme Court held that this section [as it read prior to the 1983 amendment] grants jurisdiction to revoke suspended sentences or impose sentences following deferral only during the period of the suspended or deferred sentences. This jurisdiction extends only through the running of the suspended or deferred sentence, regardless of whether a petition for revocation has been filed prior to the termination of the suspended or deferred sentence. Felix v. Mohler, 195 M 391, 636 P2d 830, 38 St. Rep. 1881 (1981).

On October 24, 1977, the petitioner received a deferred imposition of sentence and was placed on probation for 1 year. On August 14, 1978, the deferred imposition of sentence was extended for an additional 2 years. On April 4, 1979, the deferred imposition of sentence was again extended for 2 years. On February 2, 1981, petitioner was found guilty of a misdemeanor in Justice's Court. Based on that conviction, the court revoked its order staying deferment of sentence and sentenced petitioner to 5 years in the state prison for the original crime. In granting his petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus, the Supreme Court said that 46-18-201 gives the District Judge the authority to defer imposition of sentence for a period not to exceed 3 years. The District Court [under this section as it read prior to the 1983 amendment] can revoke a deferred imposition of sentence only during the 3-year period immediately following the initial sentence deferral. Gonzales v. Blodgett, 193 M 504, 632 P2d 1084, 38 St. Rep. 1159 (1981).

Authority to Revoke: The court has the authority to revoke a deferred sentence and impose a penal sentence upon a showing of sufficient evidence proving a violation of conditions. St. v. Emmett, 171 M 194, 557 P2d 289 (1976).

Constitutionality — Hearing: When a hearing on the revocation of a deferred sentence was conducted prior to the trial on the charges constituting the grounds for revocation, there was no denial of due process by being compelled to elect between exercising the right to remain silent or waiving the right against self-incrimination. St. v. Ryan, 166 M 419, 533 P2d 1076 (1975).

Ground Not Formal Condition: The trial court could revoke the deferred imposition of sentence after the defendant refused to testify against another defendant, even though his cooperation with the State was not made a formal condition of the judgment deferring sentence. St. v. Lintz, 162 M 1080, 509 P2d 13 (1973).

Credit for Time Served:
When the defendant had been confined under the county jail work release program as a condition of the continuation of a deferred sentence, he was entitled to credit for time in such jail upon revocation of deferment and imposition of sentence. Maldonado v. Crist, 162 M 240, 510 P2d 887 (1973).

Prison term previously served as a condition of deferment of sentence must be credited against the prison term imposed upon revocation of the petitioner's deferred imposition of sentence. State ex rel. Bovee v. District Court, 162 M 98, 508 P2d 1056 (1973).

REVOCATION OF SUSPENSION

Sentencing in Revocation May Encompass Up to Entire Term of Original Suspended Sentence — Calculation of Credit for Street Time Reduced by Times of Violation During Supervision. St. v. Johnson, 2022 MT 216, 410 Mont. 391, 519 P.3d 804.

2017 Amendments — Legislative Intent Examined — Amendments Apply to Felony, Not Misdemeanor, Revocation Proceedings: After the Municipal Court denied her motion to dismiss a petition to revoke her suspended sentence for a misdemeanor offense, the defendant unsuccessfully appealed to the District Court. The defendant argued that pursuant to the amendments of 46-18-203 made in 2017, a court lacks authority to revoke any suspended sentence, whether for a misdemeanor or a felony offense, for “compliance violations” unless the petition to revoke shows that alternatives to revocation were exhausted. The city argued that the amendments applied only to felony revocation proceedings. On appeal, the Supreme Court acknowledged that while the defendant’s argument had facial appeal, when the statute was read in context of related provisions and when the legislative history of the bill amending 46-18-203 was considered, it was evident that the amendments applied only to felony revocation proceedings, and therefore the Municipal Court acted within its authority to revoke the defendant’s suspended sentence. Missoula v. Pope, 2021 MT 4, 402 Mont. 416, 478 P.3d 815, followed in Missoula v. Sadiku, 2021 MT 295, 406 Mont. 271, 498 P.3d 765.

Sexual Abuse of Children — Noncompliance Violation — Revocation Proper: After a police detective corroborated an informant’s claim that the defendant had child pornography on his phone, the state filed a petition to revoke his suspended sentence for failing to register and for committing sexual abuse of children. At the revocation hearing, the detective testified about how the photos on the defendant’s phone involved minor children in erotic poses. After the District Court revoked his sentence, the defendant appealed. The defendant argued that because the state did not submit the photos as evidence, there was insufficient evidence to revoke his sentence. The Supreme Court affirmed, finding that the testimony provided sufficient evidence to find the defendant had committed sexual abuse of children by a preponderance of the evidence. St. v. Howard, 2020 MT 279, 402 Mont. 54, 475 P.3d 392.

Revocation Hearing — Report of Violation by Former Probation Officer, Not Present at Hearing — No Abuse of Discretion: At the defendant’s revocation hearing, his current probation officer testified to the contents of a report of violation issued by his former probation officer, who did not testify. Following his revocation, the defendant appealed, arguing that the District Court had violated his sixth amendment right to confront the former probation officer. The Supreme Court disagreed, emphasizing that revocation hearings are not subject to the Montana Rules of Evidence. Accordingly, the Supreme Court affirmed, noting that the use of documentary evidence, such as the report, did not violate due process. St. v. Fetveit, 2020 MT 264, 401 Mont. 538, 474 P.3d 811.

Timing of Treatment Program Not Specified in Sentence — State’s Petition to Revoke Denied: The District Court sentenced a sex offender to a 10-year commitment to the Department of Corrections (DOC) with 6 years suspended and imposed a requirement that the offender attend and successfully complete a sexual offender treatment program. Prior to the offender’s release to the suspended portion of the sentence, the state filed a petition to revoke on the grounds that the offender had not completed his treatment program. The District Court imposed a 6-year commitment to the DOC. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, noting that completion prior to release from custody was not a requirement imposed on the offender. St. v. Beam, 2020 MT 156, 400 Mont. 278, 465 P.3d 1178, followed in St. v. Pulst, 2023 MT 162, 413 Mont. 197, 534 P.3d 128.

Escape From Custody Before Serving Sentence — Revocation of Suspension Proper — No Due Process Concern — Choice by Defendant Not to Learn About Probation Conditions When He Escaped: The defendant pleaded guilty to various charges and was sentenced to 20 years with the Department of Corrections, with 10 years suspended. While awaiting transfer to prison, the defendant escaped custody and was found 14 years later in Oregon, where he was serving time for unrelated crimes. During a revocation hearing in Montana, the District Court revoked the defendant’s suspended sentence based on his escape and numerous other felonies. On appeal, the Supreme Court rejected the defendant’s argument that he did not violate his suspended sentence because he escaped before the sentence started. In affirming the suspension, the court reasoned that the 2011 Legislature retroactively amended 46-18-203 to allow revocation of a suspended sentence before the period of suspension has begun. The Supreme Court also rejected the defendant’s due process argument that he did not sign and receive a copy of his conditions of probation, as required by 46-23-1011. The court reasoned that the defendant was not denied due process but instead had declined due process when he escaped. St. v. Graves, 2015 MT 262, 381 Mont. 37, 355 P.3d 769.

New Conditions of Parole Imposed After Original Sentence — No Increase in Punishment — No Ex Post Facto Violation: The criminal defendant had originally been sentenced to 30 years in prison with 10 years suspended. After being discharged to serve the suspended portion of his sentence, he violated the conditions of his parole. The District Court imposed a new suspended sentence with 14 new conditions, and the defendant argued the imposition of the conditions violated ex post facto laws. The state argued that the conditions did not violate ex post facto laws because they did not increase the defendant's original sentence and were standard conditions placed on sex offenders who are on parole. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed that the new conditions were not punitive in nature and therefore affirmed the sentence. St. v. Piller, 2014 MT 342, 377 Mont. 374, 343 P.3d 153.

Terms of Suspended Sentence — Single Violation Sufficient to Support Revocation: The state filed a petition to revoke the defendant's suspended sentence because he possessed or used illegal drugs, failed to attend weekly AA/NA meetings, and failed to obtain a chemical dependency evaluation. On appeal, the defendant argued that the state produced insufficient evidence regarding drug use and that he needed more time to comply with the other conditions. The Supreme Court disagreed, stating that a single violation of the terms and conditions of a suspended sentence is sufficient to support revocation of that sentence. St. v. Carter, 2014 MT 211, 376 Mont. 174, 330 P.3d 1184.

Evidence Sufficient to Revoke Suspended Sentence: The defendant challenged the District Court's revocation of his suspended sentence on the basis that the state failed to demonstrate by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant violated the conditions of his suspended sentence when the state presented testimony from only a single witness who recited unsworn facts from police reports. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the record was not contradicted and that the witness's uncontradicted testimony regarding the defendant's conduct was sufficient to demonstrate a violation of the defendant's suspended sentence. St. v. Evans, 2012 MT 115, 365 Mont. 163, 280 P.3d 871.

Revocation of Suspended Sentence Prior to Release — Violations Not Fault of State: The state moved to revoke the suspended sentence of an inmate 2 days before his expected release and the beginning of his suspended sentence. The state alleged that the defendant inmate did not satisfy a number of criteria for his suspended sentence, including not having adequate housing or treatment lined up. The District Court revoked his suspended sentence. The defendant appealed to the Supreme Court, contending that the state could not file a petition to revoke his sentence until his suspended sentence had actually started to run and that the District Court had abused its discretion by revoking his suspended sentence when his violations were not willful. The Supreme Court concluded that a District Court has authority to revoke a suspended sentence before it begins to run and that while the defendant's violations of the conditions of suspension may not have been willful, they were not the fault of the state, and therefore affirmed the District Court's revocation. St. v. Cook, 2012 MT 34, 364 Mont. 161, 272 P.3d 50.

Discretion to Revoke Sentence for Failure to Remain Law-Abiding: Under the 1985 version of this section, a judge was authorized to exercise discretion in revoking a suspended sentence or in imposing a sentence and ordering that a person be committed without the necessity of a showing that a condition of a sentence occurred. It was not an abuse of discretion to revoke a suspension because the defendant failed to remain law-abiding based upon his guilty plea to an offense of bail-jumping. St. v. Goff, 2011 MT 6, 359 Mont. 107, 247 P.3d 715.

Authority to Revoke Suspended Sentence Before Suspended Sentence Served: A District Court has the statutory authority to revoke a suspended sentence before a defendant actually begins serving the suspended sentence. St. v. LeDeau, 2009 MT 276, 352 M 140, 215 P.3d 672 (2009). See also St. v. Morrison, 2008 MT 16, 341 M 147, 176 P.3d 1027 (2008), and St. v. Cook, 2012 MT 34, 364 Mont. 161, 272 P.3d 50.

Double Jeopardy Not Applicable to Revocation of Parole or Suspended Sentence: LeDeau was released on parole a few months before the unsuspended portion of a sentence for sexual assault was served. Shortly thereafter LeDeau admitted violating the terms of parole, so parole and the suspended sentence were revoked. LeDeau appealed on grounds of double jeopardy, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Parole is a privilege, not a right, and revocation of parole does not constitute punishment for purposes of double jeopardy. When a suspended sentence is imposed, the sentencing court may revoke the suspended sentence upon a showing that any sentencing condition has been violated. A revocation proceeding is not a criminal adjudication, does not require proof of a criminal offense, does not impose punishment for any new offense, and is an act in the performance of the duty of supervision of the offender. Thus, double jeopardy is not applicable to revocation of a suspended sentence. St. v. LeDeau, 2009 MT 276, 352 M 140, 215 P3d 672 (2009).

Revocation of Suspended Sentence Based on Failure to Pay Restitution — Additional Sentence Unauthorized: Striplin was convicted of deceptive credit card practices and was given a suspended sentence conditioned upon payment of restitution and maintaining employment. About 3 years after sentencing, Striplin was charged with violating the terms of the suspended sentence because no restitution payments had been made to the Department of Corrections as ordered and because Striplin did not ever contact the credit card companies to see if the debts had been paid or seek and maintain employment. The District Court revoked Striplin's sentence, and because Striplin did not have the means to pay restitution, the court did not reimpose restitution but instead sentenced Striplin to 30 days in the county jail. Striplin appealed. The Supreme Court agreed that Striplin's sentence should be revoked because of the violations of the sentencing terms. However, the court reversed the 30-day jail sentence on grounds that the sentence was an additional, more burdensome condition that the District Court was without authority to impose pursuant to the version of 46-18-203(7)(a)(ii) that was in effect at the time of sentencing. St. v. Striplin, 2009 MT 76, 349 M 466, 204 P3d 687 (2009), following St. v. Tracy, 2005 MT 128, 327 M 220, 113 P3d 297 (2005).

Incarceration of Mentally Ill Defendant — No Plain Error Review for Alleged Due Process Violation: Following Rovin's parole violations, the District Court revoked Rovin's suspended sentence and imposed a sentence in the state prison, despite the fact that Rovin suffered from mental illness. Rovin argued for the first time on appeal that incarceration would fail to achieve rehabilitation and thus violated due process, that the Supreme Court should invoke plain error review to address the constitutional violation, and that failure to do so would be a manifest miscarriage of justice. The Supreme Court declined. Rovin failed to demonstrate that the due process claim met the elements for plain error review. The District Court considered sentencing alternatives but rejected community-based treatment over concerns for the safety of Rovin and the public. Rovin was represented at every stage of the proceedings, knowingly and voluntarily admitted the parole violations, and waived the right to appeal by failing to object at trial. Further, a mere assertion that failure to review a claimed error might result in a manifest miscarriage of justice is not sufficient to implicate plain error review. St. v. Rovin, 2009 MT 16, 349 M 57, 201 P3d 780 (2009), following St. v. Mackrill, 2008 MT 297, 345 M 469, 191 P3d 451 (2008).

Improper Reimposition of Illegal Conditions Upon Revocation of Suspended Sentence — Remand to Strike Illegal Conditions: White pleaded guilty to felony theft in February 1994, but imposition of sentence was deferred for 3 years, subject to a number of conditions, one of which prohibited White from possessing and consuming alcohol and patronizing businesses where alcohol was the chief item of sale. In August 1994, White's deferred sentence was revoked for alcohol consumption. The sentencing court imposed a 10-year sentence with all but 30 days suspended, subject to the same conditions imposed with the deferred sentence, plus a fine and additional conditions. In May 1997, White's suspended sentence was revoked for alcohol consumption. White was sentenced to 10 years, all suspended, subject to the same conditions previously imposed, plus White was required to attend Alcoholics Anonymous meetings and to participate in counseling. In October 2006, and again in February 2007, the state filed petitions to revoke White's suspended sentence for alcohol consumption. White moved to dismiss the petitions on grounds that the sentencing court in 1997 had added conditions to the sentence that had the legal effect of continuing the sentence imposed in 1994 that had actually expired in 2004, so the court lacked jurisdiction to consider and rule on the 2006 and 2007 petitions. The court denied the motion to dismiss and sentenced White to 10 years in prison with 5 years suspended, with credit for 5 years served, leaving a balance of 5 years suspended, subject to all conditions previously imposed. White appealed. The Supreme Court noted that under this section, when a court revokes a suspended sentence the court may require the defendant to serve either the sentence imposed or any lesser sentence. Thus, the court was not authorized in 1997 to add new conditions to the newly imposed suspended sentence, nor was the court authorized to reimpose those illegal conditions upon revocation of the sentence in 2007. Therefore, the Supreme Court reversed with instructions to strike all conditions on White's current sentence that were not contained in judgments rendered prior to the 1997 judgment. St. v. White, 2008 MT 464, 348 M 196, 199 P3d 274 (2008).

Delay in Bringing Defendant Before District Court on Petition to Revoke Suspended Sentence Implicated Due Process Rights: Defendant made a threshold showing that plain error review of his claim was appropriate for a delay of 26 months in bringing him before the court on a petition to revoke a suspended sentence. However, delay was only one of several factors for the court to consider in the totality of circumstances approach to unreasonableness of delay, and thus the case was remanded for an evidentiary hearing. St. v. West, 2008 MT 338, 346 M 244, 194 P3d 683, (2008).

Error in Denial of Motion to Withdraw Admissions to Allegations in Revocation Petition: Defendant's admissions to a petition to revoke were held to be involuntary in the county that declined to follow a global plea bargain negotiated in another county where defendant had earlier entered a plea of guilty to a new felony because the Supreme Court held he had done so on the basis of an unenforceable and eventually unfilled promise. St. v. Jones, 2008 MT 331, 346 M 173, 194 P3d 86 (2008).

Correct Finding of No Mental Illness During Revocation Proceeding: During Price's sentence revocation proceedings, the District Court found that Price did not suffer from a mental illness. Noting that under St. v. Boulton, 2006 MT 170, 332 M 538, 140 P3d 482 (2006), the revoking court may consider evidence of a mental disease or defect, the Supreme Court considered the District Court's conclusion and affirmed based on the record that there was no evidence that Price suffered from a mental illness. Several experts testified that Price was personality-disordered but did not suffer from a psychosis, and Price's own actions showed that he wanted to intimidate people and have them believe he was violent. St. v. Price, 2008 MT 319, 346 M 106, 193 P3d 921 (2008).

District Court Authority to Revoke Suspended Sentence for Parole Violation for Which Defendant Not Sanctioned or Punished: Martinez was given a 7-year suspended sentence for felony criminal endangerment, subject to 25 conditions, including a requirement that Martinez notify the probation officer upon a change of residence. Following numerous probation violations, three separate intervention hearings were held to address the violations. One of the probation officers subsequently recommended that Martinez be brought before the District Court for revocation of the suspended sentence. The District Court heard testimony from two probation officers regarding the repeated violations and revoked Martinez's suspended sentence. Martinez appealed on grounds that the probation officer lacked the statutory authority to seek sentence revocation for conduct addressed by the revocation hearings and contended that the revocation violated double jeopardy because it amounted to double punishment for violations addressed by the revocation hearings. The Supreme Court agreed that once a probation officer elects to pursue an intervention hearing under 46-23-1012(3), the officer cannot then also pursue a revocation hearing before the District Court for the same violation. However, Martinez's violation of the requirement to notify the probation officer upon a change of residence occurred after the third intervention hearing, and Martinez was not sanctioned or punished for that violation. That violation in itself was sufficient to support revocation of Martinez's suspended sentence, and even if the District Court considered the history of Martinez's violations in reaching its decision, the court did not abuse its discretion or exceed its statutory authority in revoking the sentence based on that violation alone. Additionally, no double jeopardy violation occurred when the sentence was revoked based on a violation for which Martinez was not previously sanctioned or punished. Thus, revocation of Martinez's suspended sentence was affirmed. St. v. Martinez, 2008 MT 233, 344 M 394, 188 P3d 1034 (2008).

Violation of Single Condition of Probation Sufficient to Warrant Revocation of Suspended Sentence: As conditions of Gillingham's suspended sentence for four counts of sexual assault and one count of assault of a minor, Gillingham was required not to have unsupervised contact with children under the age of 16 or to use any other name. The state sought to revoke Gillingham's suspended sentence based on three violations, including unsupervised contact with children when teaching Sunday school, contact with children when teaching woodworking at a fair, and seeking to establish a different identity under the assumed name of a deceased person. The District Court found sufficient evidence to prove that Gillingham violated all three conditions and revoked his suspended sentence. On appeal, Gillingham argued that the state did not present sufficient evidence of two of the violations and that revocation of his sentence was therefore error. The Supreme Court disagreed. A single violation of the conditions of a suspended sentence is sufficient to support revocation, and evidence that Gillingham taught a church school class to young children in a room separate from other classes was sufficient to warrant revocation. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Gillingham, 2008 MT 38, 341 M 325, 176 P3d 1075 (2008), followed in St. v. Roberts, 2010 MT 110, 356 Mont. 290, 233 P.3d 324.

center for 6 months, with the sentences to run concurrently. Damon began serving the suspended portion of the sentence on June 8, 2005, and several weeks later, he was arrested and charged under a separate cause number with several offenses. Damon pleaded guilty to one count of felony obstruction of justice and received a 10-year suspended sentence with credit for the time served in the detention center following the arrest. In November 2005, Damon was arrested for violating probation conditions in the original case, and the state petitioned to revoke the 5-year suspended sentence in the original case. The District Court revoked the 5-year suspended sentence based on the probation violations and sentenced Damon to 5 years with the DOC with credit for 98 days served in the detention center following arrest for the probation violations, but the court refused to credit Damon for street time served during the probation period following June 8, 2005, or for the time served following the second arrest. Damon challenged the time credited, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Had the District Court credited the 5-year revoked sentence with the time following the second arrest, Damon would have received double credit for those days. Nothing in subsection (7)(b) of this section entitles a defendant to additional credit against a revoked sentence for time served relating solely to a separate offense for which the defendant received a consecutive sentence credited with the same period of time served. Thus, the District Court did not err in crediting Damon's sentence with only a portion of the time served while incarcerated prior to the sentence revocation. St. v. Damon, 2007 MT 276, 339 M 413, 170 P3d 490 (2007), distinguishing St. v. Tracy, 2005 MT 128, 327 M 220, 113 P3d 297 (2005).

Sufficient Statement of Reasons for Granting or Denying Credit for Time Served Prior to Revocation of Sentence: Damon contended that the sentencing court erred by failing to sufficiently state in its written disposition order its reasons for granting or denying credit against Damon's sentence for time that elapsed prior to revocation of Damon's sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed. The disposition order stated that Damon was to receive credit for time incarcerated as a result of an arrest for probation violations, but the court treated the remaining elapsed time, including time that Damon was incarcerated on separate charges unrelated to the suspended sentence, as street time and denied credit against the revoked sentence for the street time because of the early probation violation. The statement was a sufficient explanation of the reasons for allowing and rejecting credit against Damon's sentence for time elapsed prior to the revocation, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. Damon, 2007 MT 276, 339 M 413, 170 P3d 490 (2007).

Res Judicata Not Bar to Correction of Manifest Error in Prior Decision — Illegal Sentence Reversed: In 1998, when Southwick committed two felonies, 46-18-201 limited commitment to the Department of Corrections (DOC) to 5 years. In 1999, the Legislature amended the statute to allow a longer DOC commitment up to the maximum time that a defendant could be sentenced for a particular offense, provided that all but the first 5 years of commitment are suspended. When Southwick's parole was subsequently revoked in 2003, the District Court revoked the suspended portion of Southwick's commitments to the DOC, even though Southwick had discharged his unsuspended commitments to the DOC, and ordered Southwick to be recommitted to the DOC for an additional 5 years in each case. Southwick petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus on grounds that the sentence was illegal, but the petition was denied on grounds of res judicata. Southwick also moved the District Court for resentencing on grounds that the sentence was illegal, but the motion was denied, and Southwick appealed. The Supreme Court noted that res judicata generally precludes reviewing an issue already decided and that relitigation of issues in criminal cases is barred if: (1) the same ground presented in the subsequent application was determined adversely to the applicant on the prior application; (2) the prior determination was on the merits; and (3) the ends of justice would not be served by reaching the merits of the subsequent application. The court also noted that when a criminal defendant is potentially subject to a facially illegal sentence, the ends of justice suggest that res judicata should not bar rehearing the issues even if the first two criteria are met. In this case, the District Court applied a statute that was not in effect at the time that Southwick committed the crimes, which violated the prohibition on ex post facto laws. Because the District Court did not have authority to impose the sentence, the sentence was illegal and facially invalid. The 5-year DOC commitment for each offense was valid, but not the suspended portions following Southwick's commitment. Southwick had discharged the maximum time that he could have been committed to DOC before the petition to revoke was filed, and the District Court had no authority to revoke a suspended commitment that was illegally imposed. Therefore, the Supreme Court vacated the order revoking the suspended portion of Southwick's commitments. St. v. Southwick, 2007 MT 257, 339 M 281, 169 P3d 698 (2007).

Right Against Self-Incrimination Not Violated When Admitting Guilt Not Requirement of Sexual Offender Course: Osborne's suspended sentence was revoked for failure to complete a sexual offender course following imprisonment for sexual intercourse without consent. Citing St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979 (1991), Osborne asserted that the course violated his right against self-incrimination because the course required him to admit guilt of sexual intercourse without consent. The Supreme Court distinguished Imlay and disagreed. Imlay's sexual offender course required Imlay to admit guilt, while Osborne's course was specifically tailored for offenders who did not admit guilt. In addition, Imlay followed all the other conditions of parole, but Osborne did not. Thus, Osborne's right against self-incrimination was not violated, and revocation of Osborne's suspended sentence for failure to complete the sexual offender course was affirmed. St. v. Osborne, 2007 MT 217, 339 M 45, 167 P3d 405 (2007).

Illegal Sentence Challenged During Revocation Proceeding — Court Limited to Lawful Elements of Original Sentence: Seals was convicted of three felony and two misdemeanor drug possessions and was committed to the Department of Corrections for 15 years, with 10 years suspended, to run concurrently. At the time of his arrest, the law in effect limited Seals' imprisonment to 5 years for each count. Upon recognition that the 15-year sentences were outside the parameters of the sentencing statute, the District Court amended Seals' sentence for one count to impose a legal sentence of 5 years, but again imposed sentences of 10 years each, all suspended, to run concurrently with each other and consecutive to the first count. After Seals served the 5 years for count one and was discharged to his suspended sentences, the state moved for revocation for probation violations and recommended that the court revoke Seals' suspended sentences and commit him to prison for 10 years, 5 suspended, for each count. Seals objected, arguing that the commitment and the consecutive nature of the sentences constituted an illegal increase of his original commitment to the Department of Corrections and was beyond the court's statutory sentencing authority. The state argued that 46-18-401 gave the court discretion to run the sentences imposed upon revocation consecutively or concurrently. In response, the District Court revised the sentences from 10 years to 5 years but retained the consecutive nature of the sentences. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, ruling that this section and not 46-18-401 governed sentencing upon revocation. Under this section, the District Court could have required that Seals serve either the originally imposed sentence or a lesser sentence. However, because the originally imposed sentence was illegal, the court ruled that ordering Seals to serve sentences consecutively rather than concurrently resulted in sentences that did not qualify as lesser sentences. St. v. Seals, 2007 MT 71, 336 M 416, 156 P3d 15 (2007).

Suspension of Sentence Following Probation Violation Not Violative of Double Jeopardy — Credit for Time Served Properly Allowed: DeWitt was convicted of two counts of aggravated burglary, found to be a persistent felony offender, and sentenced to three consecutive 10-year sentences. DeWitt appealed, and the Supreme Court remanded with instructions to dismiss one count. While awaiting resentencing, DeWitt was incarcerated for 1,275 days. The District Court then resentenced DeWitt to one 10-year sentence for aggravated burglary and a consecutive 10-year sentence as a persistent felony offender, suspended all but 1,275 days of the 20-year sentence, and gave DeWitt credit for 1,275 days served. Without prison time to serve, DeWitt was immediately released on probation. DeWitt subsequently violated probation, the suspended sentence was revoked, and DeWitt was sentenced to 10 years with 5 years suspended, with credit for 160 days served while awaiting revocation proceedings. DeWitt appealed on grounds that the sentencing court failed to allow credit for the 1,275 days served when the suspended sentence was revoked and the new 10-year sentence was imposed and asserted that his double jeopardy rights were violated by reinstatement of the original sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed with both arguments. When the sentencing court sentenced DeWitt following the probation violation, the court had a 16.5-year suspended sentence to work with, which was more than sufficient to account for the 10-year sentence with 5 years suspended that was imposed. Although a sentencing court must give credit for time served, revocation of a suspended sentence based on a probation violation and reinstatement of the original sentence does not constitute double jeopardy as long as the sentence is within the parameters of the sentence imposed in the initial suspended sentence and credit is allowed for time served. Further, a persistent felony offender designation is not a separate crime carrying a separate sentence, but rather is a statutorily required sentence enhancement that is part of the initial sentence, so the sentencing court could not have "dropped" the persistent felony offender count and sentenced DeWitt only under the aggravated burglary count, thereby limiting the available time on resentencing to 6.5 years. The sentence was not violative of double jeopardy, was within statutory parameters, and was affirmed. St. v. DeWitt, 2006 MT 302, 334 M 474, 149 P3d 549 (2006).

Rejection of Credit for Elapsed Time Served While on Probation: While serving a suspended sentence for a crime in Montana, Miller was convicted of a crime in Indiana and served a 2-year sentence there. Upon release on parole in Indiana, Miller returned to Montana and subsequently violated the terms of the Montana suspension. The suspension was revoked, and Miller was ordered to serve the remainder of the sentence at the state prison. Miller argued that he was entitled to credit for the time served in Indiana against the Montana commitment, but the District Court declined to allow credit for the Indiana time served, and Miller appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Montana law does not provide that a defendant is to receive credit on a suspended commitment in Montana for time spent in prison in another state on a separate conviction. The District Court did not order that the Montana and Indiana convictions be merged, so the Montana commitment continued to run while Miller was in prison in Indiana. It was only when Miller violated the terms of the suspended sentence after returning to Montana that the suspension was revoked, and upon revocation, the District Court had the discretion to allow or reject part or all of the time that had elapsed as a credit against the commitment. St. v. Miller, 2006 MT 159, 332 M 472, 139 P3d 839 (2006).

Consideration of Defendant's Mental State During Revocation Proceedings — Commitment to Department of Corrections Affirmed: After Burke admitted violating five probation conditions, the District Court considered several sentencing alternatives during revocation proceedings. In doing so, the court considered Burke's mental condition, allowing a confidential mental health evaluation. The psychologist determined that Burke suffered from several mental conditions requiring medication, but found no indication of organic impairment, mental retardation, or psychoses, and could not say with medical certainty that the mental condition caused Burke to violate parole. The psychologist opined that Burke understood his legal situation and had the capacity to plan a legal strategy with counsel and recommended placement at the state hospital. The District Court acknowledged Burke's mental condition, but found that the condition did not render Burke unable to appreciate the criminality of his behavior or to conform his behavior to the requirements of the law, so Burke's suspended sentence was revoked, and Burke was committed to the Department of Corrections for the remainder of the original sentence. Burke appealed on grounds that he should instead have been sentenced to the Department of Public Health and Human Services, but the Supreme Court disagreed. The District Court had wide latitude in sentencing Burke, and absent a showing that the District Court acted arbitrarily without the employment of conscientious judgment or exceeded the bounds of reason, resulting in substantial injustice, the sentence was affirmed. St. v. Burke, 2005 MT 250, 329 M 1, 122 P3d 427 (2005).

Lack of Participation in Sexual Offender Programs Warranting Revocation of Suspended Sentence: Van Haele contended that because he was not adequately advised by the District Court that one consequence of a guilty plea was that failure to complete a sexual offender program would be denial of probation status, he should be allowed to withdraw the guilty plea and that the District Court erroneously denied his motion to withdraw the plea. Reviewing the case to determine whether the District Court's findings were erroneous, the Supreme Court disagreed with the factual predicate of Van Haele's argument. It was not Van Haele's failure to complete the prison sex offender program that resulted in Van Haele's denial of admission to an outpatient treatment program, but rather it was Van Haele's recantation of his admission of guilt and his various behavioral problems that placed insurmountable obstacles in the way of acceptance into an outpatient program, although Van Haele's refusal to participate in the prison program contributed to the problem. The District Court had adequate evidence at Van Haele's revocation hearing to determine that the lack of participation in sexual offender programs was adequate to warrant revocation of Van Haele's suspended sentence. St. v. Van Haele, 2005 MT 153, 327 M 400, 114 P3d 225 (2005).

Refusal to Admit Guilt During Treatment for Sexual Offense to Which Defendant Pleaded Guilty — No Deprivation of Right Against Self-Incrimination: Van Haele was incarcerated for sex crimes to which he pleaded guilty, and part of the sentence required Van Haele to follow a treatment plan. However, Van Haele refused to participate in sex offender treatment on grounds that to do so would require him to admit guilt in violation of the constitutional right against self-incrimination. However, there was no question either of compelling Van Haele to disclose the commission of sexual offenses for which he was not charged or of using any compelled disclosures against him. Rather, Van Haele persisted in refusing to admit guilt during treatment for offenses to which he previously pleaded guilty, so he was not deprived of the right against self-incrimination. St. v. Van Haele, 2005 MT 153, 327 M 400, 114 P3d 225 (2005), distinguishing St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979 (1991), and St. v. Fuller, 276 M 155, 915 P2d 809 (1996).

No Authority to Add Additional Conditions When Suspended Sentence Revoked: Because Rudolph violated several conditions of a suspended sentence, the court revoked the sentence and added several new conditions. Pursuant to the 1997 version of this section in effect when the offense was committed, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in revoking the sentence; however, once the sentence was revoked, the court could require Rudolph to serve only the sentence imposed or a lesser sentence, but had no authority to add conditions to the newly imposed sentence. The case was remanded for resentencing. St. v. Rudolph, 2005 MT 41, 326 M 132, 107 P3d 496 (2005), followed in St. v. Carter, 2014 MT 211, 376 Mont. 174, 330 P3d 1184.

Statutory Conditions for Probation Revocation: When the state files a petition showing probable cause that an offender has violated a condition of a suspended sentence, a District Court may issue an order for a hearing on revocation and an arrest warrant. At the offender's initial appearance, the court must advise the offender of the petition's allegations, the opportunity to appear and present evidence, the opportunity to question adverse witnesses, and the right to counsel. If after a hearing on the petition the court determines that the state has proved by a preponderance of the evidence that the offender violated a condition of the suspended sentence, the court may revoke the suspension. St. v. Megard, 2004 MT 67, 320 M 323, 87 P3d 448 (2004).

Failure to Notify Defendant of State's Intent to Use Evidence of Alleged Violations at Probation Revocation Hearing Considered Due Process Violation — Harmless Error: At a hearing on the revocation of Pedersen's suspended sentence, the District Court allowed the state to introduce drug test results, even though drug use was not alleged prior to the hearing. Pedersen asserted that the failure to notify him that the drug test results would be used was a due process violation. The Supreme Court agreed. Even though a revocation hearing is not subject to the Montana Rules of Evidence, the hearing must be fundamentally fair, and minimum due process rights, including notice, extend to a revocation hearing. Thus, because Pedersen was not notified in advance, the District Court erred in admitting the drug test results. However, the error was harmless. The District Court's findings did not reference the drug test results, nor did the court rely on the results in revoking the suspended sentence, relying instead on the abundant evidence of Pedersen's violation of four other probation conditions. Therefore, the Supreme Court affirmed the sentence revocation. St. v. Pedersen, 2003 MT 315, 318 M 262, 80 P3d 79 (2003), distinguished in St. v. Sebastian, 2013 MT 347, 372 Mont. 522, 313 P3d 198. See also St. v. Nelson, 225 M 215, 731 P2d 1299 (1987).

Failure to Fulfill Terms of Suspended Sentence by Completing Sex Offender Treatment Program — Revocation of Sentence Proper: A condition of Drube's suspended sentence required enrollment in and completion of a sex offender treatment program. Drube was terminated from the program on numerous grounds, and the District Court revoked the suspended sentence. Drube appealed, asserting that his termination from the program in which he was participating did not give the District Court immediate cause to suspend the sentence and that he should have been given the opportunity to enroll in another program. The Supreme Court disagreed. At the time that the state filed the revocation petition, Drube had not successfully completed a sex offender program, nor was he enrolled in one. Because Drube was in violation of the conditions of the suspended sentence and because the evidence showed that Drube required a more secure or structured setting in which to complete a program because he was unwilling to cooperate with the program that he was in, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in revoking Drube's suspended sentence. St. v. Drube, 2003 MT 138, 316 M 156, 69 P3d 1182 (2003).

Alleged Inadequate Supervision of Parolee No Excuse for Probation Violation: Senn's parole supervision was transferred to Washington state, and after several years the Missoula County Attorney filed a petition to revoke Senn's suspended sentences based on several alleged probation violations. Senn admitted violating some of the probation conditions, but contended that the violations should be excused because of health problems, poverty, arrests in Washington that precluded contact with Montana, a good faith assumption that matters in Montana could be resolved after the criminal issues in Washington were addressed, and the Montana parole officer's failure to provide adequate supervision. The Supreme Court disagreed. Senn's own conduct resulted in the probation violations, and although there was a period when Senn was unsupervised, even when supervised Senn failed to comply with the probation officer's requests. The District Court did not err in revoking Senn's suspended sentences. St. v. Senn, 2003 MT 52, 314 M 348, 66 P3d 288 (2003).

Reasons for Denial of Credit for Time Elapsed Properly Stated in Written Order, Rather Than at Revocation Hearing: Senn contended that the District Court erred in failing to expressly consider at a revocation hearing whether to give Senn credit for time elapsed during Senn's parole. However, pursuant to this section, the District Court is required to state the reasons for allowing or rejecting credit in its order, not at a revocation hearing. In this case, in its written order the District Court listed 10 reasons for denying credit for elapsed time, satisfying the statutory requirements. St. v. Senn, 2003 MT 52, 314 M 348, 66 P3d 288 (2003).

Unauthorized Contact With Minors and Failure to Follow Through With Sexual Offender Treatment Sufficient to Warrant Revocation of Suspended Sentence: Aune's sentences for felony sexual assault were suspended on condition that Aune complete sexual offender treatment and not have contact with minors. Aune moved to North Dakota to be closer to his parents and enrolled in sexual offender treatment there. However, his participation was terminated because he was dishonest with staff and because his wife failed to participate in treatment, which was a condition of participation in the North Dakota program. Further, Aune admitted that he had contact with two minor girls who lived at the farm where Aune worked. Following a hearing and consideration of conflicting evidence, Aune's suspended sentence was revoked by the District Court, and he appealed. The standard for revocation of probation is whether the judge is reasonably satisfied that the conduct of the petitioner has not been what was agreed to if the petitioner was given liberty. The Supreme Court noted that Aune's original sentence did not contain a requirement that Aune complete phases I and II of sexual offender treatment, so to the extent that the revocation was based on Aune's failure to complete phase II, revocation was not supported by the evidence. However, the District Court did not err when it found that Aune violated the condition that he complete and follow through with treatment, which by its terms also required the participation of Aune's wife, and that Aune violated the condition that he not have unauthorized contact with minors. The District Court's revocation of Aune's suspended sentence and sentence to two concurrent terms of 15 years and 259 days in prison for each count of sexual assault were affirmed. St. v. Aune, 2003 MT 3, 314 M 1, 61 P3d 785 (2003), distinguishing St. v. Lundquist, 251 M 329, 825 P2d 204 (1992).

Suspended Sentence Properly Revoked — Remand for Entry of Findings to Support Resentencing: The District Court revoked Anderson's suspended sentence and resentenced him to 10 years with 6 years suspended. Anderson appealed on grounds that his failure to comply with sentencing conditions requiring him to maintain employment and perform community service did not rise to a level to support revocation, and that the sentencing judge failed to clearly state the reasons for the sentence. The Supreme Court noted that a single violation of the terms of a suspended sentence is sufficient to support revocation of a suspended sentence. Anderson admitted that he had performed only 4 hours of the required 100 hours of community service since the original sentence was imposed, and had paid only $275 of a total of $1,805 due in restitution. Anderson also had a significant criminal history, was convicted of three additional felonies since beginning probation, and failed to comply with a number of terms and conditions of the suspended sentence. Thus, revocation of Anderson's suspended sentence was not an abuse of discretion. However, the sentencing court's stated reason for resentencing Anderson, namely that it was the state's recommendation, neither informed Anderson of the reasons underlying the sentence nor provided guidance for review. Therefore, the case was remanded for resentencing, and the entry of findings was to be sufficient to support the sentence. St. v. Anderson, 2002 MT 92, 309 M 352, 46 P3d 625 (2002), distinguishing St. v. Lundquist, 251 M 329, 825 P2d 204 (1992).

Plenary Review of Criminal Sentence by Supreme Court Even Though No Objection Made at Sentencing: Brister was sentenced to 20 years for felony sexual assault with 10 years suspended, served the 10-year prison sentence, and then was released and began the 10-year suspended sentence. About 6 years into the suspended sentence, Brister was arrested for felony theft and for violating various parole conditions. The District Court then revoked the suspended sentence and reimposed another 10-year suspended sentence to run consecutively with a 5-year felony theft sentence. The new suspended sentence included 26 additional conditions. Brister did not object to any of the conditions when they were imposed, but filed a motion objecting to the sentence 2 months later, claiming that the conditions were not and could not have been included in the original suspended sentence, and thus violated double jeopardy and ex post facto laws. The state maintained that Brister waived any objections to the conditions by failing to contemporaneously object when the sentence was pronounced, and that the appeal from the sentence was not timely filed. The Supreme Court disagreed and reversed. Under St. v. Lenihan, 184 M 338, 602 P2d 997 (1979), the court will review a sentence imposed in a criminal case if it is alleged that the sentence is illegal or exceeds statutory mandates, even if no objection is made at the time of sentencing. Further, Brister provided the District Court with an opportunity to correct any sentencing errors by filing an objection under 46-18-117 (now repealed), which allowed 120 days for correction of an illegal sentence, so Brister retained the right to appeal the purportedly illegal sentence. St. v. Brister, 2002 MT 13, 308 M 154, 41 P3d 314 (2002), overruling St. v. Taylor, 2000 MT 202, 300 M 499, 5 P3d 1019 (2000), St. v. St. John, 2001 MT 1, 304 M 47, 15 P3d 970 (2001), and St. v. Smith, 2001 MT 111, 305 M 298, 27 P3d 39 (2001), to the extent that those cases held that failure to raise a contemporaneous objection to an illegal sentence at the time of hearing resulted in waiver of defendant's objection, and followed in St. v. Muhammad, 2002 MT 47, 309 M 1, 43 P3d 318 (2002). See also St. v. Southwick, 2007 MT 257, 339 M 281, 169 P3d 698 (2007).

Reinstatement of Suspended Sentence With New Conditions Improper: About 6 years into a suspended sentence for felony sexual assault, Brister was arrested for felony theft and for violating various parole conditions. The District Court revoked the suspended sentence and reimposed another 10-year suspended sentence to run consecutively with a 5-year felony theft sentence. The new suspended sentence included 26 additional conditions. Under the 1983 version of this section, in effect at the time that Brister committed the offense, the District Court had two options upon revocation: (1) revoke the suspended sentence and order Brister to serve the remainder of the prison term; or (2) continue the suspended sentence under the original terms. Instead, the court reimposed the suspended sentence conditioned upon multiple new conditions and terms not contained in the original sentence, which was not allowed under the revocation statute. The court had no authority to impose new conditions upon the continuation of Brister's suspended sentence. The Supreme Court remanded for a new disposition hearing to allow the District Court to decide which of the two options to implement. St. v. Brister, 2002 MT 13, 308 M 154, 41 P3d 314 (2002).

Finding of Mental State Not Necessary in Revocation of Suspended Sentence Proceedings: Averill's suspended sentence was revoked after he admitted that he had violated numerous conditions of his probation agreement and after the District Court found that he had also violated several other conditions for which no charges were brought. Averill argued that the District Court erred in finding that he had committed the unadmitted violations because under 45-2-103, he was lacking the requisite mental state to establish guilt and that without having committed the acts either knowingly, purposefully, or negligently, he did not violate parole. However, this section sets forth the requirements applicable to revocation of suspended sentences and makes no reference to intent, mental state, or 45-2-103, so it was not necessary for the court to find that Averill acted knowingly, purposefully, or negligently in order to revoke the suspended sentence. A revocation proceeding is not equivalent to a trial. The burden of proof in a revocation hearing is only a preponderance of the evidence, and the issue is not one of guilt or innocence, but rather whether a condition of a suspended sentence has been violated. Here, the court was reasonably satisfied that Averill's conduct was not what was agreed it would be if Averill was given his liberty, so revocation of the sentence was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Averill, 2001 MT 161, 306 M 106, 30 P3d 1059 (2001), followed in St. v. Boulton, 2006 MT 170, 332 M 538, 140 P3d 482 (2006).

Probable Cause Hearing Required When Offender Arrested Pursuant to Warrant — Lack of Subject Matter Jurisdiction When Timely Hearing Not Held: Giddings was arrested August 1 on a probation violation warrant issued by his probation officer. The next day while he was still detained, the District Court issued a warrant for his arrest based on the earlier petition to revoke his suspended sentence. A hearing on the petition was held on November 10, Giddings' suspended sentence was subsequently revoked, and he was sentenced to the Department of Corrections for 4 years. Giddings argued on appeal that pursuant to 46-23-1012 as it read prior to the 2001 amendments, the Probation and Parole Bureau was required to hold a probable cause hearing within 36 hours of his arrest and that because no such hearing was held, the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to hold a revocation hearing 3 months later regarding the technical violations of probation alleged in the probation violation report. The state contended that a probable cause hearing is required only when the probationer is dealt with administratively through the probation violator prison diversion program described in 46-23-1012(4) as it read prior to the 2001 amendments and that an administrative probable cause hearing is not required when a probationer is arrested on a bench warrant and is processed through the judicial system. The Supreme Court reversed, applying St. v. Goebel, 2001 MT 73, 305 M 53, 31 P3d 335 (2001), in holding that a hearing by the Probation and Parole Bureau under 46-23-1012(4) as it read prior to the 2001 amendments is mandatory within 36 hours when an offender has been arrested pursuant to a warrant issued by a judge. Because the probable cause hearing was never held, the District Court lacked jurisdiction to hold its revocation hearing later. St. v. Giddings, 2001 MT 76, 305 M 74, 29 P3d 475 (2001), clarified in Gundrum v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 246, 307 M 96, 36 P3d 890 (2001), in which it was held that the 36-hour requirement for a probable cause hearing applies only to probation revocation proceedings under 46-23-1012 and not to parole revocation proceedings under 46-23-1023.

Erroneous Dismissal of Petition to Revoke Sentence Based on Failure to Hold Timely Hearing: Under 46-23-1012, there are two ways that an offender can come into custody for allegations of a probation violation. The first is when a judge issues a warrant for the offender's arrest, and the second is when the offender is arrested by a probation or parole officer or when a probation or parole officer authorizes a law enforcement officer to make the arrest. In this case, Goebel was arrested by a probation and parole officer. Prior to the 2001 amendments, the second sentence of 46-23-1012(4) read: "After the arrest of the defendant pursuant to this subsection, a hearings officer for the probation and parole bureau shall hold a hearing within 36 hours of the defendant's arrest" (emphasis added). Goebel contended before the District Court that the petition to revoke his suspended sentence should be dismissed because the state did not hold a hearing within 36 hours of his arrest. The court agreed and dismissed the petition. On appeal, the state argued that the 1999 amendments to 46-23-1012(4) mandated a hearing only in the case of violators who are arrested pursuant to a warrant and that the Legislature left to the discretion of the Probation and Parole Bureau the decision of whether to hold a hearing for every other violator, while Goebel maintained that the phrase "pursuant to this subsection" required the Bureau to hold a hearing in every case of alleged parole violation before proceeding under 46-23-1013 (now repealed). The Supreme Court found the statutory language in subsection (4) to be clear and unambiguous and contrary to the assertions of both parties. Because a defendant may be arrested only under the provisions of subsections (1) and (2), the phrase "after the arrest of the defendant pursuant to this subsection" could not refer to the entirety of 46-23-1012, as Goebel contended, nor could it refer only to subsection (4), as the state contended. Rather, the court held that "this subsection" related back to the reference in the previous sentence to subsection (1), which allows a judge to issue a warrant or notice to appear, so a probable cause hearing by the Probation and Parole Bureau is mandatory only when an offender has been arrested pursuant to a warrant issued by a judge. Because Goebel was not arrested pursuant to a warrant, the 36-hour rule did not apply. Despite the fact that the Supreme Court found the statute clear and unambiguous, it pointed out that this interpretation rendered the statute illogical because probable cause must be shown before a warrant is issued. It makes little sense to require a second probable cause hearing, while common sense would dictate that there should be a reasonably prompt probable cause hearing when an arrest is made without a warrant. Rather than examine the legislative history to discern the Legislature's intent in using the particular language, the court ascribed the confusion to a legislative drafting error and left correction of the language to the Legislature. St. v. Goebel, 2001 MT 73, 305 M 53, 31 P3d 335 (2001), clarified in Gundrum v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 246, 307 M 96, 36 P3d 890 (2001), in which it was held that the 36-hour requirement for a probable cause hearing applies only to probation revocation proceedings under 46-23-1012 and not to parole revocation proceedings under 46-23-1023, and followed in St. v. Johnson, 2001 MT 277, 307 M 317, 37 P3d 701 (2001).

Revocation of Suspended Sentence Based on Violation of Good Citizenship Probation Standard: A condition of Therriault's probation was that he "conduct himself as a good citizen at all times". When the District Court revoked Therriault's suspended sentence for violating this good citizenship standard, Therriault complained that the standard was too vague to sufficiently warn him of what would constitute a violation of his probation conditions, in violation of his due process rights. The Supreme Court was essentially called upon to determine if Therriault was acting as a good citizen at all times. The court affirmed the sentence revocation, noting that under any reasonable definition of the term, any "good citizen" who was truly concerned about the welfare of a 14-year-old girl from a troubled home would not suggest that, for her own safety, she should take up residence at the home of a convicted sex offender who was on probation and subject to random searches and that this should be accomplished without the supervising probation officer's knowledge and without entertaining the possibility of more suitable living arrangements. St. v. Therriault, 2000 MT 286, 302 M 189, 14 P3d 444, 57 St. Rep. 1185 (2000).

Failure to Complete Sexual Offender Treatment Sufficient to Warrant Suspended Sentence Revocation and Continued Incarceration: Vallier received 5 years for felony assault and 20 years for felony sexual assault of an 11-year-old child, with 10 years suspended if Vallier completed the prison sexual offender program. Vallier failed to complete the program by the time of scheduled discharge of the active sentence, so the District Court revoked the suspended portion of the sentence, further classifying Vallier as a level 3 sexual offender at a high risk to reoffend. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, finding Vallier's failure to complete the sexual offender program of such a nature as to require Vallier's continued incarceration. Sufficient evidence was offered to prove that Vallier continued to be a serious community threat until the treatment was received, and Vallier did not meet the burden of showing that the District Court abused its discretion in revoking the suspended sentence. St. v. Vallier, 2000 MT 225, 301 M 228, 8 P3d 112, 57 St. Rep. 928 (2000).

New Sentence Restriction Added Upon Revocation of Suspended Sentence Stricken: If a District Court finds that a defendant has violated the terms or conditions of a suspended sentence, the court may revoke the suspended sentence and require the defendant to serve either the sentence imposed or any lesser sentence, but nothing in this section authorizes a court to impose additional restrictions when revoking a suspended sentence. (See 2001 amendment to this section, which allows it.) In this case, the District Court originally sentenced Richardson to 20 years in prison for felony sexual assault against a child, with all but 70 days suspended, conditioned in part upon completion of a sex offender treatment program. Richardson failed treatment and admitted violating other conditions of the suspended sentence, so the sentence was revoked, and Richardson was sentenced to prison for the remainder of the 20-year sentence. Additionally, the court conditioned Richardson's parole eligibility upon successful completion of the first two phases of sexual offender treatment in prison. The additional restriction on the sentence was error, and the case was remanded for the limited purpose of striking that condition from the sentence. St. v. Richardson, 2000 MT 72, 299 M 102, 997 P2d 786, 57 St. Rep. 320 (2000), following St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997).

Standard for Revocation of Suspended Sentence — Standard for Review of Revocation: The standard for revoking a suspended sentence requires that the District Court be reasonably satisfied that the conduct of the probationer has not been what the probationer agreed that it would be if liberty were granted. The Supreme Court will review a sentence revocation to determine whether the District Court abused its discretion and whether the court's decision was supported by a preponderance of the evidence in favor of the state. However, this section does not expressly require the court to determine whether the probationer willfully violated the terms of the suspended sentence before the sentence may be revoked. Here, Williams argued that the District Court improperly revoked his suspended sentence because the state's petition did not allege a violation of the conditions of the suspension. However, Williams' inability to secure sexual offender treatment while on probation frustrated the purpose of probation, which was Williams' rehabilitation. Thus, the District Court did not err in revoking the suspended sentence and requiring Williams to participate in the sexual offender treatment at the state prison to avoid continued frustration of the purpose of the suspension. St. v. Williams, 1999 MT 240, 296 M 258, 993 P2d 1, 56 St. Rep. 943 (1999), following St. v. Kochvi, 671 A2d 115 (N.H. 1996), and St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997), distinguishing Lopez v. Crist, 176 M 352, 578 P2d 312 (1978), and followed in St. v. Averill, 2001 MT 161, 306 M 106, 30 P3d 1059 (2001). However, see St. v. Lee, 2001 MT 176, 306 M 173, 31 P3d 998 (2001), which affirmed Williams to the extent that violations of nonfinancial probationary conditions need not necessarily be willful in order to justify revocation, but reversed the revocation of a suspended sentence when the failure to fulfill the conditions of a suspended sentence was not the fault of the probationer but rather the state.

Suspended Sentence Properly Revoked — No Supreme Court Review of Disparate Sentences: Baisch's sentence was suspended on condition that, among other things, he remain law-abiding, undergo a psychological examination, and complete his graduate equivalency diploma within 1 year. When Baisch's probation officer called Baisch in to inquire as to why he was not meeting appointments in fulfilling his diploma requirements, Baisch became belligerent and was arrested for assault and criminal mischief. The charges were dismissed because of a defect in language, but the state petitioned to revoke the suspended sentence anyway. The state met its burden of showing by a preponderance of the evidence that Baisch violated the terms of probation, and the District Court did not err in reinstating Baisch's 7-year prison term. Baisch's argument that the sentence was too harsh was not appropriate for consideration by the Supreme Court because arguments of that nature are reserved for consideration by the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Baisch, 1998 MT 12, 287 M 191, 953 P2d 1070, 55 St. Rep. 41 (1998), followed in St. v. Senn, 2003 MT 52, 314 M 348, 66 P3d 288 (2003).

"Finding" in Probation Modification Order Not Res Judicata as to Issue of Compliance With Terms of Probation: Lindeman pleaded guilty to charges of sexual abuse and incest and, as a condition of probation, was required to complete a sex offender treatment program and to have no unsupervised contact with minors. After some efforts at treatment, for which the treatment provider issued a letter saying that Lindeman had "graduated" from the program, Lindeman petitioned the District Court for a modification of the previous order in order to allow him to have contact with his minor daughter. In issuing the order, the District Court found that Lindeman had completed the sex offender treatment program. However, Lindeman had not in fact completed a treatment program meeting the standards required in his original probation order, and the treatment provider was not qualified to treat Lindeman because the provider lacked credentials required by the original probation order. Later, when the state sought to revoke Lindeman's probation and impose the suspended sentence based upon Lindeman's failure to complete the treatment program, Lindeman argued that the issue of completion of the program was res judicata under the probation modification order of the District Court. Citing Hollister v. Forsythe, 277 M 23, 918 P2d 665 (1996), the Supreme Court held that the issue of Lindeman's completion of the treatment program was not res judicata because the issues in the probation modification proceeding and the later revocation proceeding were not the same. The Supreme Court pointed out that at the probation modification hearing: (1) the issue of completion of the treatment program was not before the District Court; (2) the hearing was requested by Lindeman to change a condition concerning contact with minors, not completion of the treatment program; (3) the District Court did not remove the condition that Lindeman complete the treatment program; and (4) the "finding" was unnecessary to the District Court's decision to modify the condition of probation. The Supreme Court distinguished St. v. Perry, 232 M 455, 758 P2d 268 (1988), and St. v. Black, 245 M 39, 798 P2d 530 (1990), and noted that the only way that the issue of completion of the treatment program could have been determined by the District Court was through a petition filed pursuant to this section, which did not occur. For these reasons, the Supreme Court held that the "finding" by the District Court was not a conclusive, litigated finding and therefore was not res judicata as to whether Lindeman had completed treatment as required in his probation order. St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997).

Reservation of Right to Specify Ineligibility for Parole Upon Subsequent Revocation of Suspended Sentence — Lack of Authority in District Court: When Lindeman was sentenced for sexual assault and incest, the District Court reserved the right, in the event that Lindeman ever violated a condition of probation and his suspended sentence was imposed, to specify that Lindeman would be ineligible for parole until he completed a sex offender treatment program. When Lindeman failed to complete the program and the state requested that Lindeman's probation be revoked and the suspended sentence imposed, Lindeman objected to the District Court's imposition of the condition preventing parole. The Supreme Court held that under St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996), the only punishment that the District Court could impose was the suspended sentence or a lesser penalty and that the District Court was without authority to impose the additional condition. The Supreme Court noted that 46-18-202, the statutory provision relied upon by the District Court when it reserved the right to impose the condition, applies only to the original sentence under 46-18-201 and that the District Court had no authority to impose the condition upon subsequently revoking the suspended sentence. St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997), followed, with regard to the impropriety of new sentence restrictions added upon revocation, in St. v. Richardson, 2000 MT 72, 299 M 102, 997 P2d 786, 57 St. Rep. 320 (2000).

"Unique Factors" Alleged by Defendant, Including Long Delay in Filing Petition to Revoke Suspended Sentence — No Abuse of Discretion: Lindeman pleaded guilty to charges of sexual abuse and incest and, as a condition of probation, was required to complete a sex offender treatment program and to have no unsupervised contact with minors. Because Lindeman moved frequently, he changed probation officers several times, and it was not discovered for some time that he had not completed the required treatment program. When the state petitioned the District Court to revoke Lindeman's probation and to impose the suspended sentence, Lindeman argued that the District Court failed to consider "unique factors" of his case and thereby abused its discretion. The Supreme Court held that: (1) notwithstanding Lindeman's argument that his completion of the treatment program was a factor that should have been considered by the District Court, the evidence showed that Lindeman did not complete the treatment program; (2) Lindeman's inability to pay for treatment was not a factor in revocation of his probation because the evidence showed that he failed to complete treatment for other reasons; (3) there was no evidence that Lindeman's alleged terminal illness prevented him from completing treatment; (4) Lindeman's membership in a prayer group did not excuse his having to complete treatment; (5) although the evidence showed that Lindeman's case "fell through the cracks" due at least in part to the many probation officers assigned to Lindeman's case and the failure of those officers to verify Lindeman's completion of the sex offender program, the fact remained that Lindeman was an untreated sex offender who did not follow the conditions of his probation; and (6) whether or not Lindeman followed the other conditions of his probation did not change the fact that he did not follow the treatment condition. In regard to the sixth unique factor, the Supreme Court stated that Lindeman's case was distinguishable on its facts from St. v. Lundquist, 251 M 329, 825 P2d

204 (1992), in which the Supreme Court held that the District Court abused its discretion in revoking the probation of a sex offender who did not complete treatment. St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997).

Reservation of Authority to Attach Additional Conditions to Suspended Sentence Held Error — St. v. Wilson Followed: At the sentencing of Savaria on multiple thefts involving bad checks, the District Court reserved the right to attach additional conditions upon Savaria's suspended sentence. Although Savaria was sentenced before the decision in St. v. Wilson, 279 M 34, 926 P2d 712 (1996), holding that a District Court may not sentence a defendant to a term of imprisonment and reserve the right to impose additional restrictions during the defendant's probation, the state conceded and the Supreme Court agreed that Wilson was applicable to Savaria's case. The Supreme Court therefore struck the reservation from the District Court's judgment. St. v. Savaria, 824 M 216, 945 P2d 24, 54 St. Rep. 852 (1997).

Revocation of Suspension of Part of Sentence While Nonsuspended Part Being Served: The District Court had authority to revoke suspension of part of a sentence when, prior to having begun to serve the suspended part, the prisoner was released on parole before serving the whole of the nonsuspended part of the sentence and violated conditions of probation relating to the suspended part. Christofferson v. St., 272 M 518, 901 P2d 588, 52 St. Rep. 909 (1995), followed in St. v. Morrison, 2008 MT 16, 341 M 147, 176 P3d 1027 (2008).

Alford Plea in Sexual Assault Case — Revocation of Suspended Sentence: In a sexual assault case, the defendant sufficiently raised the issue of the fifth amendment right against self-incrimination to warrant review on appeal. The defendant entered an Alford plea, and sexual offender evaluation and treatment were conditions of the suspended sentence. The District Court did not abuse its discretion when it revoked the defendant's suspended sentence for violations of the conditions of the suspended sentence, including sexual offender evaluation and treatment. St. v. Butler, 272 M 286, 900 P2d 908, 52 St. Rep. 745 (1995).

No Court Assistance in Escaping Plea Bargain Obligations: As a condition of defendant's plea bargain, it was required that he remain a law-abiding citizen, but it was not specifically advised that he could not possess a firearm. When found to be in possession of a firearm, defendant's suspended sentence was revoked, which defendant appealed. It is impossible for a District Court to inform a defendant of every illegal action that could affect defendant upon entering a guilty plea, nor will the Supreme Court assist an accused criminal in escaping the obligations of a plea bargain after accepting its benefits. St. v. Reynolds, 253 M 386, 833 P2d 153, 49 St. Rep. 463 (1992), followed in St. v. Milinovich, 269 M 68, 887 P2d 214, 51 St. Rep. 1433 (1994). See also St. v. Koepplin, 213 M 55, 689 P2d 921 (1984), and St. v. Radi, 250 M 155, 818 P2d 1203, 48 St. Rep. 903 (1991).

Ex Parte Communication Between Witness and Judge Not Affecting Revocation of Suspended Sentence: Defendant claimed that his due process rights were violated by the District Court's decision to revoke his suspended sentence based on improper ex parte communication between the probation officer and the District Court Judge. However, absent objective evidence that the private communication was intended to or did influence the revocation decision and because the record was replete with evidence in support of revocation, the defendant's rights were not violated and the suspended sentence was properly revoked. St. v. Champagne, 245 M 147, 800 P2d 154, 47 St. Rep. 1932 (1990).

Petition to Revoke Filed After Period of Suspension — Question of Jurisdiction Properly Raised and Sentence Voided: The County Attorney's office petitioned for revocation of Voegel's suspended sentence 2 days after the term of the suspended sentence had expired. While Voegel rightfully asserted that allowing the tardy revocation petition was prejudicial to his punishment, he acknowledged that he was precluded from challenging the District Court's jurisdiction under 46-20-701(2). However, the Supreme Court found that until Voegel obtained new counsel on appeal, no one was aware that the suspended sentence had expired. Under the plain error doctrine, the power of discretionary review was applied to address the arithmetic jurisdictional error and prevent manifest injustice. Voegel was therefore not barred from raising the jurisdictional issue, and the Supreme Court held that the imposition of sentence was void for lack of jurisdiction because the petition to revoke the suspended sentence was filed after the sentence had expired. St. v. Voegel, 243 M 222, 793 P2d 832, 47 St. Rep. 1183 (1990), following St. v. Wilkins, 229 M 78, 746 P2d 588 (1987).

Fleeing Jurisdiction to Avoid Forced Sexual Relationship: The defendant left the state in violation of her parole and argued that the action was justified because she fled to avoid a forced sexual relationship with her foster parent. The Supreme Court ruled that in addition to meeting the requirements of the compulsion statute, the defendant also had to meet the requirements of the complementary doctrine of necessity, which included the duty to turn herself over to the proper authorities upon reaching a place of safety. Since the defendant failed to report to anyone after arriving in California, the lower court was justified in revoking her suspended sentence. The court also held that there were other steps short of fleeing the jurisdiction that the defendant could have taken; therefore, her actions were not justified. St. v. Ottwell, 240 M 376, 784 P2d 402, 46 St. Rep. 2207 (1989).

Revocation Cancels Prior Act of Grace: A District Court's decision to revoke a suspended sentence cancels a prior act of grace and is within the court's discretion. St. v. Rogers, 239 M 327, 779 P2d 927, 46 St. Rep. 1721 (1989); St. v. Kern, 212 M 385, 695 P2d 1300 (1984), followed in St. v. Butler, 272 M 286, 900 P2d 908, 52 St. Rep. 745 (1995).

Revocation of Suspended Sentence Not Violative of Double Jeopardy Clause: Because the revocation proceeding is not a criminal adjudication, does not require proof of a criminal offense, does not impose punishment for any new offense, and is an act in the performance of the duty of judicial supervision of probationary liberty, the double jeopardy clause is inapplicable. St. v. Lange, 237 M 486, 775 P2d 213, 46 St. Rep. 991 (1989), citing St. v. Eckley, 579 P2d 291, 34 Oreg. App. 563 (1978).

Jurisdiction to Revoke Suspended Sentence — DUI Conviction and Failure to Complete Sexual Offender Program: The District Court had jurisdiction to revoke a suspended sentence for sexual assault and to order defendant committed to the state prison after finding that defendant violated the terms and conditions of his suspended sentence by failing to complete a sexual offender program and by his conviction of DUI. St. v. Stangeland, 233 M 230, 758 P2d 776, 45 St. Rep. 1446 (1988).

Revocation of Suspended Portion of Sentence — No Due Process Violation: Defendant was convicted of aggravated assault and sexual intercourse without consent and was sentenced to a term of 40 years in the Montana State Prison. The sentence review board modified the sentence to 40 years with 20 years suspended provided that the defendant successfully complete a sex treatment program. Upon defendant's failure to complete the program, the District Court, following four hearings, ordered the original 40-year sentence to be reinstated. Defendant appealed, alleging due process violations for failure to follow parole and probation revocation procedures. The Supreme Court, in affirming the revocation, ruled that the right to a speedy trial, while guaranteed in criminal prosecutions, is not applicable in revocation of probation proceedings and that no preliminary hearing is required before a revocation proceeding when detention is not involved. St. v. Friedman, 225 M 373, 732 P2d 1322, 44 St. Rep. 313 (1987). See also St. v. Stangeland, 233 M 230, 758 P2d 776, 45 St. Rep. 1446 (1988), and St. v. Kingery, 239 M 160, 779 P2d 495, 46 St. Rep. 1587 (1989).

Right to Jury Trial — Not Applicable to Suspended Sentence Revocation Proceedings: Since a trial by jury under the seventh amendment to the U.S. Constitution and Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const., is guaranteed only in "criminal prosecutions", it does not apply in proceedings for revocation of a suspended sentence. St. v. Watts, 221 M 104, 717 P2d 24, 43 St. Rep. 670 (1986).

Five-Year Suspension Revoked for Failure to Enter Inpatient Alcohol Program: There was substantial evidence to support the revocation of probation and imposition of the original 5-year sentence since defendant failed to comply with a condition that required immediate entry into an inpatient alcohol counseling program. The probation officer fulfilled his duty to advise probationer of the conditions and consequences of a violation. The District Court revoked the suspension pursuant to the discretion granted in 46-18-203 in accordance with the minimum requirements for invoking such discretion. There was no abuse of discretion in the court's consideration of the factors in the original sentencing, except for the sentencing judge's determination that defendant was a dangerous offender. (See 1995 repeal of 46-18-404.) No findings appeared in support of such designation. St. v. Ford, 218 M 215, 707 P2d 16, 42 St. Rep. 1530 (1985).

Proof of Violation of Conditions of Probation Sufficient to Revoke Probation: When defendant, an alcoholic, violated conditions of probation that included a prohibition against drinking, the District Court did not abuse its discretion by the revocation of probation. The Supreme Court held that under Montana statutes, proof of violation of probation conditions is all that is required to support revocation and a court is not required to find that continuation of probationary status would be at odds with the need to protect society and society's interest in defendant's rehabilitation. St. v. Kern, 212 M 385, 695 P2d 1300, 41 St. Rep. 1810 (1984). See also St. v. Lange, 237 M 486, 775 P2d 213, 46 St. Rep. 991 (1989).

Failure to State Reasons for Sentence — Challenge to Revocation of Suspended Sentence: After the defendant was given a suspended prison sentence and ordered to pay restitution, the State moved to revoke the suspension because the defendant failed to make restitution. The defendant opposed the motion to revoke by arguing that the original sentence was invalid because the sentencing court failed to state the reason for the sentence, in violation of the requirements established in St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298, 37 St. Rep. 673 (1980). [A 1983 amendment required the judge to state reasons for the sentence.] On appeal, the Supreme Court held: (1) that despite the failure of the sentencing court to state its reasons, the sentencing court imposed exactly the sentence requested by the defendant; (2) that the reason for the sentence was apparent from the record; (3) that no prejudice resulted from the court's failure to state its reasons; and (4) that no purpose would be served in vacating the sentence or denying the petition to revoke. St. v. Carson, 208 M 320, 677 P2d 587, 41 St. Rep. 369 (1984).

Deferring Sentence Imposition — Second Deferment: Contention that sentencing court had no jurisdiction to defer imposition of sentence a second time did not affect the court's power to subsequently revoke suspension of part of the sentence and was not validly raised on appeal from the revocation. The conviction and first deferment of imposition of sentence occurred on October 7, 1975. The sentence, part of which was suspended, was imposed on October 28, 1977, within the 3-year period set in October 1975, for deferment of the imposition of sentence. The court could not be held in error for ordering (at August 19, 1977, revocation hearing) deferment for an additional 3 years. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982).

Evidence — Witness Called by Judge: There was no merit to contention that due process was denied at suspended sentence revocation hearing when the judge called a witness to the stand to resolve a conflict in pertinent testimony, for a court may on its own motion call witnesses, and the asserted error was waived because it had not been objected to below. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982).

Inquiry as to Time Served — Letter to Warden From Judge: Letter written by judge who revoked suspended sentence to warden of penitentiary, inquiring as to prison time to be credited against sentence, was not prejudicial. The evidence indicated the letter was written at defendant's instigation and that defendant complimented the judge on judge's efforts in defendant's behalf. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982).

Parolees — Revocation by Court of Suspended Portion of Sentence: This section's provision that a judge who has suspended a sentence may, during the period of the suspended sentence, revoke the suspension does not prohibit revocation prior to the time defendant begins to serve the suspended part of the sentence. Where defendant was sentenced to 10 years with 5 suspended and was paroled less than 5 years later, his 5-year suspension could be revoked even though he was technically on parole and not yet serving the 5 suspended years. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982), followed in St. v. Morrison, 2008 MT 16, 341 M 147, 176 P3d 1027 (2008).

Resisting Police Interference With Fight — Suspension Revoked: In an appeal from a revocation of a suspended sentence, the defendant's conduct in resisting police interference in a barroom fight was inexcusable and his actions gave the District Court ample reason to revoke his suspended sentence. Thus, the Supreme Court refused to overturn the revocation without a showing that the District Court abused its discretion. No such showing was made. St. v. Robinson, 190 M 145, 619 P2d 813, 37 St. Rep. 1830 (1980), followed in St. v. Rogers, 239 M 327, 779 P2d 927, 46 St. Rep. 1721 (1989).

Jurisdiction to Designate Dangerous Offenders: At a previous hearing on the State's petition to revoke defendant's probation, the trial court not only revoked his probation but erroneously designated him as a dangerous offender for purposes of parole eligibility, which function is reserved to the sentencing court. Neither 46-18-404 (now repealed) nor 46-18-203 gave the District Court authority to determine at the revocation hearing that the defendant was a dangerous offender for purposes of parole. In fact, when the sentencing court placed defendant on probation and suspended the 10-year sentence, the effect was to determine that defendant did not represent a substantial danger to society. Smith v. St., 186 M 52, 606 P2d 153 (1980). See also In re Petition of Arledge, 232 M 450, 756 P2d 1169, 45 St. Rep. 1188 (1988).

Jurisdiction Over Proceedings: For violation of parole conditions imposed by the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections), the original sentencing court has the implied power and jurisdiction to revoke a suspension of sentence granted by the Sentence Review Division without violating the double jeopardy protection. In fact, the Sentence Review Division lacks jurisdiction over a revocation proceeding initiated by the state. In re Ratzlaff, 172 M 439, 564 P2d 1312 (1977).

Credit for Time:

Crediting of elapsed time upon the revocation of a suspended sentence is within the discretion of the trial court. Petition of Doney, 164 M 330, 522 P2d 92 (1974).

Credit for Time in Jail: Time spent in jail under a suspended sentence must be credited to a sentence for violation of probation. In re Hanson, 169 M 80, 544 P2d 816 (1976).

Preliminary Hearing Not Required to Establish Probable Cause: When probation was revoked by the original sentencing judge, the petitioner was not denied minimum standards of due process as the petitioner was not arrested until a bench warrant was issued pursuant to the final order of revocation after a hearing at which the petitioner was represented at every step by counsel. When no detention is involved, a preliminary hearing to establish probable cause for filing a petition for imposition of final judgment and sentence is not necessary as no rights of the probationer have been violated. In re Meidinger, 168 M 7, 539 P2d 1185 (1975).

Commencement of Sentence: When relator was sentenced to 4 years' confinement and the execution of the sentence was then suspended, which suspension was later revoked, the sentence commenced to run for all purposes on the date when judgment of conviction was entered. Any time between the imposition of the suspended sentence and its revocation should have been credited to the relator and failure to do so resulted in his illegal confinement. State ex rel. Wetzel v. Ellsworth, 143 M 54, 387 P2d 442 (1963).

Credit for Time After Judgment: When the relator was sentenced to 4 years' confinement and the execution of the sentence was then suspended, which suspension was later revoked, the sentence commenced to run for all purposes on the date when the judgment of conviction was entered. Any time between the imposition of the suspended sentence and its revocation should have been credited to the relator and failure to do so resulted in his illegal confinement. State ex rel. Wetzel v. Ellsworth, 143 M 54, 387 P2d 442 (1963).

Attorney General's Opinions

Consecutive Suspended or Deferred Sentences — Probationary Period: When a sentencing court imposes a suspended or deferred sentence on more than one count and orders the periods of suspension or deferral to run consecutively, for purposes of probation revocation, the probationary period for the first count is considered to run before the period on the second and successive counts. 42 A.G. Op. 116 (1988).

Petition to Revoke Suspension or Deferral — May Apply to More Than One Sentence: Conditions of release are a part of the judgment in a case, and there is no prohibition against revoking the uncompleted sentences in a single proceeding where the terms of the judgment have been violated. Thus, if suspended or deferred sentences are to be served consecutively and time remains on more than one period of suspension or deferral, then more than one suspension or deferral may be revoked in the same proceeding. 42 A.G. Op. 116 (1988).

Case Notes

Dismissal of Previous Deferred Drug Possession Charge — Subsequent Felony Possession Not Chargeable: Tomaskie was convicted of misdemeanor marijuana possession in 1995. Imposition of sentence was deferred, and Tomaskie subsequently fulfilled the conditions of the sentence. In 2003, Tomaskie was arrested again for possession of less than 60 grams of marijuana, but Tomaskie was charged with felony possession based on the prior 1995 conviction. Prior to sentencing on the 2003 charge, Tomaskie notified the court that sentenced him for the 1995 charge, and because the deferred sentence conditions were fulfilled, the court dismissed the 1995 charge. Tomaskie then moved to reduce the 2003 charge to a misdemeanor, but the motion was denied. Tomaskie pleaded guilty but reserved the right to appeal. Tomaskie asserted that because the 1995 conviction was dismissed before he was convicted of the 2003 charge, the 2003 charge should have been reduced to a misdemeanor. The state argued that because the 1995 conviction existed at the time that Tomaskie pleaded guilty to the 2003 charge, the District Court correctly concluded that Tomaskie was convicted at that point and properly denied the motion to amend the charge to a misdemeanor. The Supreme Court agreed with Tomaskie and reversed. In order for there to be a conviction, a sentence must be imposed. The District Court incorrectly determined that when Tomaskie pleaded guilty, he had been convicted. A conviction does not occur until sentence is imposed. Tomaskie was not convicted of a second or subsequent offense under 45-9-102(2) because before the 2003 charge resulted in a conviction, the 1995 conviction was dismissed, and Tomaskie should not have been sentenced as a felon. When the information was charged in the 2003 offense, Tomaskie’s prior conviction had not been dismissed, so Tomaskie was properly charged with felony possession, but when the prior conviction was dismissed, the authority to impose a felony sentence was lost. St. v. Tomaskie, 2007 MT 103, 337 M 130, 157 P3d 691 (2007), following St. v. Shults, 169 M 33, 544 P2d 817 (1976), and St. v. Gladue, 209 M 235, 679 P2d 1256 (1984), and distinguishing *St. v. No Authority of Courts to Expunge Criminal Records Absent Statutory Authorization: Montana courts have jurisdiction to expunge criminal records pursuant to statute, but absent explicit legislative authorization, courts have no inherent power to expunge criminal records. St. v. Chesley, 2004 MT 165, 322 M 26, 92 P3d 1212 (2004).

Sheriff Entitled to Consider Confidential Criminal Justice Information in Deciding Whether to Grant Permit for Concealed Weapon: Smith was involved in an incident in 1993 resulting in charges for a number of felonies to which he pleaded guilty. Smith received a deferred imposition of sentence, and after satisfying the conditions of the sentence, the charges were dismissed. In 1995 and 1997, Smith applied for a permit to carry a concealed weapon, but each request was denied by the County Sheriff because of the 1993 incident and because of Smith’s criminal history. Smith contended that the Sheriff improperly relied on evidence from Smith’s criminal file to establish reasonable cause to deny the applications, because the District Court had dismissed the 1993 charges and ordered the records expunged. However, this section does not provide for record expungement when a charge is dismissed, but rather provides that the record be considered confidential criminal justice information. Pursuant to 44-5-303, the Sheriff was entitled to receive the information and to consider it when exercising the discretion in 45-8-321 regarding whether or not to grant a concealed weapon permit. Smith v. Missoula County, 1999 MT 330, 297 M 368, 992 P2d 834, 56 St. Rep. 1318 (1999).

Previous DUI Conviction Not to Be Considered for Purposes of Felony DUI — Former Requirement for Expungement of Record Held Self-Executing — Lorash Distinguished — Expungement Applicable to Local Records: Bowles was convicted of DUI in 1977 and did not receive another DUI for 5 years but was convicted of two other DUI offenses after 1982. When Bowles was arrested for DUI in Park County in 1996, Park County charged Bowles with felony DUI, fourth offense, counting the 1977 conviction as one of three prior convictions. Bowles moved for dismissal of the felony charge, contending that the 1977 record should have been expunged pursuant to the 1981 version of 61-8-714(5) (now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10), and the District Court granted the motion. The Supreme Court held that the District Court properly dismissed the felony charge because the expungement provision in effect at the time, unlike the expungement provision in this section that was litigated in St. v. Lorash, 238 M 345, 777 P2d 884 (1989), was self-executing and did not require the defendant to move the court to have the record of conviction expunged. The requirement for expungement applied to the 1977 conviction, despite the change in the law in 1989 requiring that the record be held as confidential criminal justice information, because the requirement for expungement was self-executing. The Supreme Court also noted that the expungement requirement applied to records of conviction notwithstanding the requirement in 61-11-102 that the Department of Justice maintain records of convictions of licensees. Further, the Supreme Court also held, relying upon St. v. Brander, 280 M 148, 930 P2d 31 (1996), that because “expungement” means to destroy and was without limitation, all traces of the conviction record should have been destroyed, that the record of the 1977 conviction was maintained by the Park County Sheriff in violation of the law, and that the 1977 county conviction record should not have been used as the basis for the felony charge. In response to the state’s argument that the expungement requirement, enacted in 1981, applied prospectively only to convictions occurring after the requirement’s effective date, the Supreme Court noted that it had rejected that argument in St. v. Reams, 284 M 448, 945 P2d 52, 54 St. Rep. 972 (1997). St. v. Bowles, 284 M 490, 947 P2d 52, 54 St. Rep. 962 (1997).

Limitation on Deferral of Sentence — Constitutionality: The provision of 46-18-201 prohibiting a defendant from receiving a deferred sentence if he has been convicted of a prior felony is not unconstitutional under the due process clause. Defendant who had received a deferred sentence in 1973 and had not attempted to have that conviction dismissed or expunged was not entitled to a deferred sentence after a 1988 conviction. Defendant’s argument regarding constitutionality is moot because the 1987 amendment to this section was repealed in 1989. St. v. Lorash, 238 M 345, 777 P2d 884, 46 St. Rep. 1321 (1989), distinguished in St. v. Bowles, 284 M 490, 947 P2d 52, 54 St. Rep. 962 (1997), as to the requirement for a motion for expungement.

Deferred Imposition of Sentence Not Dismissed — “Conviction” for Purposes of Persistent Felony Offender Status: On appeal following conviction for criminal mischief and attempted burglary for which the defendant was sentenced as a persistent felony offender, the defendant argued that a prior conviction and deferred imposition of sentence should not have been considered a “conviction” under the persistent felony offender statutes because he successfully completed probation, even if the record of his prior conviction was not expunged or the sentence dismissed. The Supreme Court held, consistent with the rationale of St. v. Drew, 158 M 214, 490 P2d 230 (1971), that the case should be remanded to District Court to determine whether the prior unrevoked deferred sentence should be dismissed, and directed that if the sentence is dismissed then it should not be considered in determining whether the defendant is a persistent felony offender. St. v. Gladue, 209 M 235, 679 P2d 1256, 41 St. Rep. 669 (1984).

Intent of Legislature: The passage of this section demonstrates the intent of the Legislature in regard to deferred imposition of sentences; if sentence were imposed or executed in any part, then the end advantage to the entire concept of the deferred sentence could not be attained and this section would become inoperative. St. v. Drew, 158 M 214, 490 P2d 230 (1971).

Attorney General’s Opinions

Documentation of Offense to Be Destroyed Upon Expungement: When a deferred imposition of sentence results in a dismissal of charges, expungement of defendant’s record mandated by this section requires that all documentation and physical or automated entries concerning the expunged offense be physically destroyed or obliterated. 42 A.G. Op. 100 (1988).

Four-Year Mandatory Minimum Required When No Exceptions Apply: The District Court sentenced the defendant to 15 years with all but 31 days suspended for sexual intercourse without consent with a minor. The Supreme Court reversed the sentence, finding that none of the applicable exceptions to the 4-year mandatory minimum applied and that the District Court lacked statutory authority to suspend all but 31 days of the defendant’s sentence. St. v. Rambold, 2014 MT 116, 375 Mont. 30, 325 P.3d 686.

Mandatory Minimum Sentence for Incest Properly Applied — Victims Under Age Sixteen: Bailey was convicted of incest with two victims under 16 years old, and Bailey was more than 3 years older than both victims. The District Court determined that 45-5-507(4) required the imposition of a mandatory minimum sentence of 4 years and sentenced Bailey to 10 years with the Department of Corrections, with 6 years suspended, on each count. Bailey asserted error, but the Supreme Court examined the sentence for legality and affirmed. The 4-year mandatory minimum sentence in 45-5-507(4) clearly applied, and this section did not come into play because none of the exceptions in 46-18-222 to the mandatory minimum sentence for incest existed, so the District Court did not err in sentencing Bailey. St. v. Bailey, 2004 MT 87, 320 M 501, 87 P3d 1032 (2004), following St. v. Fauque, 2000 MT 168, 300 M 307, 4 P3d 651 (2000).

Sentence Allegedly Based on False Information Affirmed if Information Not Material: Allen contended that his due process rights were violated because he was sentenced based on false and prejudicial information regarding the number of his prior felony convictions and because a witness at his trial later recanted testimony that related directly to Allen’s crime. The Supreme Court noted that a defendant is protected from being sentenced based on misinformation about the defendant’s criminal history; however, due process does not protect against all misinformation, but rather against materially false information. Allen contended that a prior California conviction for car theft was actually a misdemeanor, rather than a felony, and was thus misapplied to his criminal history and that the actual case files and dockets had been destroyed. The court noted that grand theft auto in California was in fact a felony at the time that Allen was convicted, but that the sentencing court had not relied on the California conviction in sentencing anyway. There was other prior conviction information in Allen's record upon which to base the felony offender sentence, so even if the California information was incorrect, it was not material to Allen's sentence. As for the recanted witness testimony, the Supreme Court noted that the witness ultimately took back the recantation after revealing to law enforcement officers that the recantation was made when the witness was in the same cell block as Allen and was made as a result of intimidation and duress. The recanted testimony was not material to Allen's testimony, and his conviction was affirmed. St. v. Allen, 2001 MT 266, 307 M 253, 37 P3d 655 (2001).

WHEREAS, criminals who commit sexual and violent crimes have shown unusually high recidivism rates, thereby posing an unacceptable level of risk to the community; and

WHEREAS, intensive supervision of sexual or violent offenders is a crucial element to both the rehabilitation of the released convicts and the safety of the surrounding community; and

WHEREAS, continuous 24-hour-a-day, 7-day-a-week electronic monitoring of those convicted of sexual offenses is a valuable and reasonable requirement for those convicts who are placed on probation, who failed to register as sexual or violent offenders as required by law, or who have been released from incarceration while they remain under the active supervision of the state."

No General or Inherent Authority of Sentencing Court to Generally Impose Parole Conditions — Parole Condition Related to Sexual Offense Authorized: There is no general or inherent authority for a sentencing court to impose parole conditions. A sentencing court may impose conditions on parole that are authorized by statute only. In this case, all conditions on Burch's suspended sentence for sexual offenses were proper, but only one parole condition, prohibiting Burch from possessing pornography or accessing the Internet, was authorized under 46-18-255. Burch's admission that he used the Internet at work to access pornography while on parole established that Burch violated a condition of his suspended sentence by a preponderance of the evidence. Thus, the sentencing court did not err in revoking Burch's suspended sentence. St. v. Burch, 2008 MT 118, 342 M 499, 182 P3d 66 (2008), followed in *St. v. Burglary Conviction — Conditions Related to Sexual Offense Affirmed: The defendant appealed the District Court’s imposition of conditions on the defendant’s suspended sentence for burglary, which included designating the defendant a level 2 sexual offender and requiring that the defendant undergo sexual offender treatment, a psychosexual evaluation, and HIV testing and provided for employment and occupational restrictions, arguing that the conditions should be stricken because the conditions were permissible only when the conviction involved a sexual offense. The Supreme Court reversed the designation as a sexual offender but affirmed the other conditions, concluding that the statutes requiring certain conditions of probation for persons convicted of a sexual offense did restrict those conditions to sexual offenses alone but did not otherwise limit the broad discretion of a sentencing court. St. v. Leyva, 2012 MT 124, 365 Mont. 204, 280 P.3d 252.

Court Designation of Sexual Offender Level Only for Sexual Offenses as Defined: Holt pleaded guilty to a charge of burglary based upon an unlawful entry into a private residence for the purposes of touching an underage female and the court, based upon a psychosexual evaluation, designated Holt a level 3 sexual offender. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the District Court erred when it designated Holt a level 3 sexual offender because burglary is not one of the offenses defined as a sexual offense by 46-23-502 for the purposes of 46-18-201. St. v. Holt, 2011 MT 42, 359 Mont. 308, 249 P.3d 470, followed in St. v. Leyva, 2012 MT 124, 365 Mont. 204, 280 P.3d 252.

Defendant Unable to Complete Residential Treatment Program Not Yet Established — Writ of Habeas Corpus Denied: In 1996, Johnson was sentenced to 10 years for felony aggravated kidnapping and 40 years for felony sexual intercourse without consent, with the terms to run concurrently. In 2007, 46-18-207 was enacted, which provided in part for the suspension of sentences for inmates who successfully completed the residential sexual offender treatment program established by the legislation. Johnson filed a writ of habeas corpus, asserting that his sentence for sexual intercourse without consent should be suspended because he had completed sex offender treatment programs in Arizona and Montana and further arguing that he was eligible for sexual offender treatment under 46-18-207. The District Court denied the writ and Johnson appealed, but the Supreme Court denied and dismissed the writ. The residential treatment program authorized in 46-18-207 was not yet established as of the date of the writ, so Johnson could not avail himself of the statutorily authorized program or of the benefits of 46-18-207. Additionally, even if Johnson was eligible for the program, placement is within the discretion of the Department of Corrections, and Johnson was ineligible in any case because of his conviction for aggravated kidnapping, which is one of the exceptions to the operation of 46-18-207. Johnson v. Mahoney, 2009 MT 275, 352 M 136, 217 P3d 1025 (2009). See also Thomas v. Doe, 2011 MT 283, 362 Mont. 454, 266 P.3d 1255, which held the Supreme Court will no longer consider as an original petition a party’s appeal from a District Court’s denial of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus.

Early Termination of Suspended Sentence — Trial Court Not Required to Advise of Right: Petitioning for early termination of a suspended sentence pursuant to this section is a statutory right. Consequently, a trial court is not required to advise a person of this right during an oral pronouncement or a written judgment. St. v. Harrison, 2016 MT 271, 385 Mont. 227, 383 P.3d 202.

Lifetime Hunting, Fishing, and Trapping Ban Not Subject to Early Termination Statute — Statutory Interpretation Must Be Reasonable: A lifetime hunting, fishing, and trapping prohibition under 87-6-202 is not subject to early termination under 46-18-208 because the prohibition is a separate, independent penalty and not a condition of a suspended sentence. Statutory interpretation must be reasonable and should not lead to absurd results if a reasonable interpretation would avoid it. Holding otherwise would lead to the absurd result of rendering a “lifetime” prohibition meaningless because it would end not with a person’s lifetime but with the termination or expiration of a person’s sentence. St. v. Harrison, 2016 MT 271, 385 Mont. 227, 383 P.3d 202.

Legality of Sentence for Criminal Production or Manufacture of Dangerous Drugs by Accountability: Becker was sentenced to 10 years in prison for accountability for criminal production or manufacture of dangerous drugs. Becker argued on appeal that the 10-year sentence was illegal because 45-9-110 does not set out a punishment for a first-time offense for accountability for criminal production or manufacture, so no statutory authority existed for the 10-year sentence. Absent that authority, Becker contended that this section should apply and that the offense was a misdemeanor punishable by not more than 6 months in the county jail. The Supreme Court agreed that subsections (2) and (3) of 45-9-110 did not provide an applicable sentence for first-time accountability for a criminal production or manufacture offense. However, 45-9-110 carries penalties in excess of 1 year in prison, so a violation of that statute is a felony, and the default penalty in 46-18-213, not this section, applies to violations of 45-9-110. Under 46-18-213, a 10-year sentence for a felony was authorized, and Becker’s sentence was therefore affirmed. St. v. Becker, 2005 MT 75, 326 M 364, 110 P3d 1 (2005).

1999 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 52 throughout section substituted references to offender for references to person; inserted (4) prohibiting deferral or suspension of life sentence; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Chapter 432 in (1)(b)(ii) after "45-5-202" deleted "(1)". Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 52, L. 1999, provided: "WHEREAS, the Correctional Standards and Oversight Committee was authorized by the Fifty-Fifth Legislature to conduct a study of correctional standards and to act as a correctional oversight committee; and

WHEREAS, the Committee contracted for a review of Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, sentencing statutes; and

WHEREAS, the Committee found that the statutes providing for sentencing and judgment regarding criminal procedures are confusing and rife with cross-references, internal references, and inconsistent terminology that make the statutes difficult to read and understand; and

WHEREAS, the Committee recommended that a bill be drafted to amend Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, to make nonsubstantive changes to clarify and streamline the statutes to eliminate contradictions, confusion, inconsistent terminology, and excessive internal references.

THEREFORE, the Legislature of the State of Montana finds it appropriate to so amend certain sentencing-related statutes."

Coordination Instruction: Section 20, Ch. 482, L. 1995, provided: "If House Bill No. 46 is passed and approved, then the crime of arson, 45-6-103, is deleted from the crimes listed in [subsection (1)(b) of section 1 of this act]." House Bill No. 46 was approved March 13, 1995, as Ch. 124, L. 1995. Therefore, the reference to the crime of arson has been deleted from 46-18-219(1)(b).

Coordination Instruction — Effective Dates: Section 21, Ch. 482, L. 1995, provided: “(1) If House Bill No. 357 and [this act] [Senate Bill No. 66] are both passed and approved:

(a) [sections 1 through 18] of [this act] are effective July 1, 1997; and

(b) the sentencing commission shall include recommendations for implementing the public policy contained in [sections 1 through 18] of [this act].

(2) [Sections 19, 20, and this section] [enacted as codification and coordination instructions] are effective July 1, 1995.

(3) If House Bill No. 357 is not passed and approved, then this section is void.” House Bill No. 357 was approved March 31, 1995, as Ch. 306, L. 1995. Therefore, 46-18-219, enacted as sec. 1 of Senate Bill No. 66, is effective July 1, 1997.

Case Notes

Claim of Enhanced Right to Jury Trial Unsupported: The defendant appealed his sentence of life imprisonment, arguing that the right to a jury trial requires that the existence of facts, including a prior conviction, used to enhance a prison sentence beyond a statutory maximum must be submitted to a jury. The Montana Supreme Court, noting that the United States Supreme Court decided in Almendarez-Torres v. U.S., 523 US 224 (1998), that a court may determine that a prior conviction exists to enhance a sentence without infringing on a defendant's right to a jury trial, concluded that the defendant failed to meet his burden of establishing that the Montana Constitution affords an enhanced right to a jury trial when the defendant cited no background supporting his claim. St. v. Covington, 2012 MT 31, 364 Mont. 118, 272 P.3d 43.

Life Sentence for Sexual Intercourse Without Consent Affirmed: Thorp was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent after having been previously convicted of the same offense in another state and was sentenced to life imprisonment without parole. Thorp contended that the sentence amounted to cruel and unusual punishment, but the Supreme Court disagreed. The sentence was within the statutory guidelines and could not be seen as so disproportionate to the crime as to shock the conscience or to outrage the moral sense of the community or of justice and thus was not considered cruel and unusual punishment. St. v. Thorp, 2010 MT 92, 356 Mont. 150, 231 P.3d 1096, following St. v. Shults, 2006 MT 100, 332 Mont. 130, 136 P.3d 507.

Mandatory Life Sentence Not Violative of Due Process, Cruel and Unusual Punishment, or Separation of Powers — Exception Properly Considered: Webb pleaded guilty to second offense sexual intercourse without consent and was sentenced to life in prison without parole pursuant to this section. Webb appealed the sentence on grounds that the mandatory life sentence violated procedural and substantive due process, the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, and the separation of powers doctrine. Webb also asserted that the sentencing court failed to properly consider the exception to mandatory sentencing set out in 46-18-222(3). The Supreme Court affirmed. The sentencing court properly considered the exception and did not abuse its broad discretion in finding no unusual and substantial distress. The sentencing court offered Webb all the procedural due process necessary and did not violate substantive due process because the sentence fit within the statutory sentencing limits. Webb's contention that life without parole was cruel and unusual punishment failed because the sentence was commensurate with the gravity of the crime and consistent with state sentencing and correctional policy. The argument that mandatory sentences violate the separation of powers doctrine also failed because it is in the Legislature's province to distinguish between criminal offenses and to establish punishments, and enactment of this section was based on constitutional principles and Montana public policy. St. v. Webb, 2005 MT 5, 325 M 317, 106 P3d 521 (2005). See also St. v. Bruns, 213 M 372, 691 P2d 817 (1984), and St. v. Dahms, 252 M 1, 825 P2d 1214 (1992).

Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Chapter 491 in two places substituted “a state prison” for “the state prison”. Amendment effective April 27, 1999.

A composite section was prepared by the code commissioner because the changes made by Ch. 491 were rendered void by the changes made by Ch. 52 and Ch. 126.

46-18-221. Additional sentence for offenses committed with dangerous weapon.

Compiler's Comments

2001 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 16 near beginning of (1) inserted “other than an offense in which the use of a weapon is an element of the offense”; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

Chapter 524 in (1) and (2) at beginning inserted “If the provisions of 46-1-401 have been complied with”; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 1, 2001.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 16, L. 2001, provided: “WHEREAS, in State v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 Mont. 224, 975 P.2d 312 (1999), the Montana Supreme Court held that as applied to offenses in which the use of a weapon is an element of the offense, the additional sentence for an offense committed with a dangerous weapon violates the double jeopardy provision of Article II, section 25, of the Montana Constitution.”

1981 Amendment: Inserted (4) requiring that additional sentences for offenses committed with a dangerous weapon run consecutively.

Case Notes

Enhanced Sentence for Use of Weapon — Apprendi Applied Retroactively Under Harmless Error Test — Enhanced Sentence Without Unanimous Jury Finding Harmless Error: After Adams received an enhanced sentence for use of a weapon during an aggravated assault, Adams appealed on grounds that there was insufficient evidence to support a finding that a weapon was used and that the enhanced sentence violated due process because there was no separate jury finding that a weapon was used, as required by Apprendi v. N.J., 530 US 466 (2000). The 2001 Legislature updated the law to address the Apprendi requirement, but as it read in 1997 during Adams’s sentencing, 46-1-401 did not require a separate jury finding, so Adams argued that 46-1-401 was therefore unconstitutional. The Supreme Court held that Apprendi imposes a new obligation on the state and is thus a new rule that applies retroactively to cases pending on direct appeal or not final at the time that the new rule was issued, so Apprendi applied retroactively to Adams’s direct appeal. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court affirmed the sentence on both issues. First, there was uncontroverted evidence that a weapon was involved in the crime. Second, the Supreme Court applied Neder v. U.S., 527 US 1 (1999), to determine the proper test to apply when a trial court fails to instruct the jury to make a finding of materiality. Under Neder, the proper test is the harmless error test, i.e., whether it appears beyond a reasonable doubt that the error complained of did not contribute to the verdict obtained. Thus, in this case, the question was whether, beyond a reasonable doubt, Adams would have received an enhanced sentence based on the display or use of a weapon had the question been submitted to the jury. Given evidence that a gun was used was uncontroverted, the result would have been the same, so any error in failing to present the question to the jury was harmless. Adams v. St., 2007 MT 35, 336 M 63, 153 P3d 601 (2007), applying St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001).

Facially Invalid Sentence — Statutory Bar Against Appeal Unconstitutional — Habeas Corpus Relief Granted: Lott was sentenced in 1992 for aggravated kidnapping, sexual intercourse without consent, aggravated burglary, and felony assault, and each sentence was enhanced by 10 years for use of a dangerous weapon. The 5-year limit on appealing the sentences that was in effect at sentencing (now a 1-year limit) expired, so Lott was procedurally barred from challenging the sentences. The Supreme Court subsequently decided in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), that application of the weapons enhancement to a felony offense that itself required proving use of a weapon constituted a double jeopardy violation. Guillaume was held to apply retroactively in St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002), so Lott's sentence was unconstitutionally enhanced with regard to the aggravated burglary and felony assault convictions. The state asserted that Lott was procedurally barred from raising the issue in a habeas corpus petition because Lott did not raise the issue on direct appeal or in a petition for postconviction relief. After analyzing habeas corpus and postconviction relief in Montana, the Supreme Court noted the constitutional guarantee that the writ of habeas corpus may never be suspended and concluded that as applied to a facially invalid sentence, the procedural bar in 46-22-101 unconstitutionally suspends the writ. Even if Lott had filed a direct appeal or petition for postconviction relief, the double jeopardy argument would have been unavailing because Guillaume and Whitehorn were not decided until well after both filing dates had expired. In order to avoid a grievous wrong and a miscarriage of justice, the Supreme Court granted Lott's petition for habeas corpus and remanded for resentencing pursuant to Guillaume and Whitehorn. Lott v. St., 2006 MT 279, 334 M 270, 150 P3d 337 (2006), followed in St. v. Jackson, 2007 MT 186, 338 M 344, 165 P3d 321 (2007), and St. v. Andersen-Conway, 2007 MT 281, 339 M 439, 171 P3d 678 (2007).

Time for Challenge of Sentence Enhancement Expired — Postconviction Relief Properly Denied: In 2003, Bingman filed a petition for postconviction relief challenging a 1986 sentence enhancement. The District Court denied the petition as untimely, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Under the applicable 1995 version of 46-21-102, a petition for postconviction relief needed to be filed within 5 years of the final sentence (now 1 year), and because Bingman's petition was filed long after the statutory limit, the petition was properly denied. Bingman v. St., 2005 MT 272, 329 M 151, 122 P3d 1235 (2005).

Error in Applying Weapon Enhancement Sentence Without Complying With Statutory Procedure: Following a conviction for negligent homicide, the District Court sentenced Strauss to 20 years in prison plus 10 years for use of a firearm. Strauss contended that the sentence was unlawful because Strauss was not notified of the enhancement before the sentencing hearing and because the jury did not make a separate finding at trial that the enhancing act occurred, as required by 46-1-401. The Supreme Court agreed. It was error to enhance Strauss's sentence without following the statutory procedure in 46-1-401, so the weapon enhancement portion of the sentence was stricken. (See 2001 amendment.) St. v. Strauss, 2003 MT 195, 317 M 1, 74 P3d 1052 (2003).

No Sentence Enhancement for Felony Assault With Weapon or Aggravated Burglary: Sentences on convictions for felony assault with a weapon and aggravated burglary are the only offenses that may not be enhanced under this section. St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002).

Retroactivity of Substantive and Procedural Rules Distinguished — Nichols Rule Prohibiting Retroactive Applicability of Guillaume Sentencing Enhancement Restriction Overruled: Whitehorn was convicted in 1995 of felony assault, criminal endangerment, and possession of dangerous drugs, and the sentencing court added an additional 10-year sentence for use of a weapon. In 1999, the Supreme Court decided St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), which held that enhancing a defendant's sentence for use of a weapon when the underlying offense (felony assault in Guillaume's case) required proof of the use of a weapon violated the constitutional double jeopardy provision. Whitehorn moved for resentencing in light of Guillaume, arguing that the enhanced sentence should be stricken because his underlying offense of felony assault also required proof that he used a weapon. The state initially agreed that Guillaume applied and that resentencing was appropriate, but prior to resentencing, the state changed its position in light of St. v. Aguilar, 1999 MT 159, 295 M 133, 983 P2d 345 (1999), and St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093 (1999), which provided that Guillaume would not be retroactively applied to cases not pending on direct appeal or to cases that were final when that opinion was issued. Whitehorn then filed a petition for postconviction relief under 46-21-102, arguing that his case was not final because he had not exhausted the 5-year time period for filing for postconviction relief (revised to 1 year in 1997). The District Court agreed that the petition was timely filed under 46-21-102, but, relying on Nichols, denied the petition and held that Whitehorn's case was final and not pending on direct review, and thus concluded that Guillaume could not be retroactively applied. Whitehorn appealed the denial of his petition for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court found that the District Court erred in not retroactively applying Guillaume and reversed, holding that under the common-law doctrine of plain error, Whitehorn was not procedurally barred from raising the retroactivity argument on appeal. The court distinguished between substantive and procedural rules when considering whether to apply a rule change retroactively. In Nichols, the court adopted the retroactivity analysis in Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288 (1989), which stands for the proposition that on collateral review, a new procedural rule of constitutional law will not be applied retroactively if it puts primary, private individual conduct beyond the power of the criminal law to proscribe or if the procedures used to convict the defendant are so implicit in the concept of ordered liberty as to constitute a watershed rule of criminal procedure. In Nichols, the court concluded that Guillaume announced a new rule, but that neither Teague exception applied. However, here the court decided that Guillaume was by its own terms a substantive rule to which the Teague exceptions should not even have been applied (accord, Chambers v. U.S., 22 F3d 939 (9th Cir. 1994)). Partially overruling Nichols and a similar holding in St. v. Wells, 2001 MT 55, 304 M 329, 21 P3d 610 (2001), the court concluded that it was illogical to refuse to extend constitutional protections to citizens simply because their claims are raised by collateral review rather than direct appeal. However, the court retained the Guillaume analysis, clarifying that sentences on convictions for felony assault with a weapon and aggravated burglary are the only offenses that may not be enhanced under this section. St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002). See also Desist v. U.S., 394 US 244 (1969), and Mackey v. U.S., 401 US 667 (1971).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Barred by Seven-Year Lapse: Following remand of St. v. Morrison, 257 M 282, 848 P2d 514 (1993), in 1993, the District Court set forth findings of fact supporting Morrison's 3-year dangerous offender sentence that had been added to Morrison's 20-year prison sentence for sexual intercourse without consent, and Morrison's sentence became final. In 2000, Morrison petitioned the District Court for a writ of habeas corpus, arguing that the 3-year sentence enhancement should be vacated because the use of a weapon had not been charged as a separate offense in the information and that the court relied on false or misleading evidence to support the enhancement. The court treated the petition as one for postconviction relief and denied it as untimely. Morrison appealed, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Under the version of 46-21-102 in effect at the time of Morrison's final conviction in 1993, the statute of limitations required that petitions for postconviction relief be filed within 5 years after conviction became final. Morrison's petition was not filed until 7 years after conviction. Notwithstanding Morrison's argument that the statute of limitations should be equitably tolled, the petition was not timely and the District Court properly dismissed it. Morrison v. Mahoney, 2002 MT 21, 308 M 196, 41 P3d 320 (2002). See also Thomas v. Doe, 2011 MT 283, 362 Mont. 454, 266 P.3d 1255, which held the Supreme Court will no longer consider as an original petition a party's appeal from a District Court's denial of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus.

Application of Weapon Enhancement Statute to Conviction for Mitigated Deliberate Homicide Not Violative of Double Jeopardy Protection: Park was sentenced to 40 years for mitigated deliberate homicide, plus 10 years for use of a weapon. Citing St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), Park contended on appeal that the imposition of the additional weapon enhancement sentence violated the constitutional prohibition against double jeopardy. The Supreme Court distinguished Guillaume because the offense charged in that case was felony assault, which requires the use of a weapon, while mitigated deliberate homicide does not. The double jeopardy question under Guillaume and its progeny is not whether a weapon was used in the offense, but rather whether the statutory definition of the offense includes the use of a weapon, with the result that defendant is punished twice for the same offense. The court also discounted Park's argument that use of a weapon is implied every time that a deliberate or mitigated homicide occurs. The court has limited the definition of weapon in several cases, and case law also provides numerous instances of homicide when no conceivable weapon caused the death. Park's enhanced sentence for use of a weapon was affirmed. St. v. Park, 2001 MT 157, 306 M 98, 30 P3d 1062 (2001), following St. v. Keith, 2000 MT 23, 298 M 165, 995 P2d 966 (2000), and St. v. Dunnette, 2000 MT 33, 298 M 208, 996 P2d 379 (2000).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Filed Twelve Years After Conviction Time Barred — Guillaume Inapplicable: Charlo was convicted of aggravated assault in 1986 and sentenced to 20 years plus 10 years for use of a weapon, and the sentence was affirmed in 1987 (see St. v. Charlo, 226 M 213, 735 P2d 278 (1987)). Following the decision in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), Charlo petitioned for postconviction relief in 1999 on grounds that the imposition of the additional 10-year weapon enhancement sentence violated his double jeopardy rights. (See 2001 amendment to this section by Ch. 16.) The District Court concluded that Guillaume did not apply and that no miscarriage of justice would occur if the court applied the 5-year statute of limitations on postconviction relief provided in 46-21-102 (now 1 year). The Supreme Court concurred. A petition filed 12 years after final conviction clearly violated the statute of limitations in 46-21-102. The court relied on St. v. Keith, 2000 MT 23, 298 M 165, 995 P2d 966, 57 St. Rep. 120 (2000), for the holding that application of the weapon enhancement provision in this section to a conviction in which the underlying offense does not require use of a weapon as an element of the crime does not constitute a double jeopardy violation. The offense of aggravated assault does not require use of a weapon, so Guillaume did not apply. The court also declined to apply the fundamental miscarriage of justice exception in St. v. Redcrow, 1999 MT 95, 294 M 252, 980 P2d 622 (1999). Guillaume was the sole basis of Charlo's petition, so Charlo could not show that the Redcrow exception would apply. St. v. Charlo, 2000 MT 192, 300 M 435, 4 P3d 1201, 57 St. Rep. 761 (2000).

Miscarriage of Justice Exception — Newly Discovered Evidence Necessary to Trigger Waiver of Postconviction Statute of Limitations: Rosales's deferred sentence for felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and use of a weapon was revoked in 1994 because Rosales violated the deferral conditions. He was sentenced to 10 years for assault and an additional 2 years for use of a weapon in violation of this section. About 5 years and 3 months later and about 2½ months after the decision in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), Rosales moved to amend the sentence, contending that the additional 2-year sentence for use of a weapon put him in double jeopardy, based on Guillaume. (See 2001 amendment to this section by Ch. 16.) The District Court dismissed the motion because of the running of the 5-year statute of limitations for postconviction relief in 46-21-102 (changed to a 1-year statute of limitations in 1997). On appeal, Rosales asked the Supreme Court to reverse its application of the statute of limitations and the bar against retroactive application of the law as established in a similar case, St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093 (1999), which procedurally barred a defendant from moving the court to amend the sentence based on Guillaume. The Supreme Court declined, holding that the postconviction statute of limitations is a jurisdictional limit on litigation and is waived only when there is a clear miscarriage of justice—one so obvious that the judgment is rendered a complete nullity. The miscarriage of justice exception refers to actual, not legal, innocence and does not apply to postconviction claims unless the defendant alleges newly discovered evidence establishing that the defendant did not commit the offense. The Supreme Court refused to alter the conditions upon which the statute of limitations will be waived, and because the District Court was affirmed on grounds that the statute of limitations had run, Rosales's argument regarding retroactive application of the law was not considered. St. v. Rosales, 2000 MT 89, 299 M 226, 999 P2d 313, 57 St. Rep. 385 (2000).

No Sentence Enhancement for Use of Weapon in Assault on Police Officer: Because a conviction for assault on a police officer requires proof of use of a weapon, an additional sentence for use of a weapon under this section violates the double jeopardy provision of the Montana Constitution. (See 2001 amendment to this section by Ch. 16.) St. v. Smith, 2000 MT 57, 299 M 6, 997 P2d 768, 57 St. Rep. 272 (2000), following St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999).

Application of Weapon Enhancement Statute to Conviction for Criminal Endangerment Not Violative of Double Jeopardy Protection: Keith was sentenced to 10 years in prison plus 10 years for use of a weapon, with 15 years suspended, for criminal endangerment. Keith argued that application of the weapon enhancement statute to the felony conviction for criminal endangerment violated the right to be free from multiple punishments for the same offense, pursuant to St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999). The Supreme Court distinguished Guillaume, noting that unlike the felony assault statute in that case, the definition of criminal endangerment does not require proof of the use of a weapon nor did Keith's use of a weapon raise the crime from a misdemeanor to a felony as in Guillaume. Because the offense of criminal endangerment, by its own terms, does not specifically increase a defendant's punishment for use of a weapon, application of the weapon enhancement statute to a criminal endangerment violation is not a double jeopardy violation. St. v. Keith, 2000 MT 23, 298 M 165, 995 P2d 966, 57 St. Rep. 120 (2000), followed in St. v. Dunnette, 2000 MT 33, 298 M 208, 996 P2d 379, 57 St. Rep. 141 (2000), and St. v. Charlo, 2000 MT 192, 300 M 435, 4 P3d 1201, 57 St. Rep. 761 (2000).

Evidence of Voluntary Mental Impairment Insufficient to Trigger Waiver of Mandatory Minimum Sentence — Hearing Not Required: Keith was sentenced to 10 years in prison plus 10 years for use of a weapon, with 15 years suspended, for criminal endangerment. At the sentencing hearing, the District Court noted that evidence of Keith's reduced mental capacity was based on Keith's voluntary ingestion of alcohol and prescription drugs and that under 46-18-222(2), the court could not waive the mandatory minimum sentence. Citing numerous cases, the Supreme Court held that the statute does permit the sentencing court to reject the mandatory minimum sentence if the court determines that defendant's mental capacity was significantly impaired during the commission of the offense but that the statute does not apply in cases when the maximum sentence or any sentence greater than the mandatory minimum is imposed. Here, there was no indication that the sentencing court ever intended to sentence Keith to either the 2-year mandatory minimum or to a period less than the 2-year mandatory minimum, so the exceptions did not apply. Further, because the exceptions were not an issue, Keith was not entitled to a hearing pursuant to 46-18-223. Nevertheless, in this case, the sentencing court did hold a hearing on its own motion but did not then abuse its discretion by denying Keith's request for a continuance of the sentencing hearing to allow evidence of Keith's mental capacity. St. v. Keith, 2000 MT 23, 298 M 165, 995 P2d 966, 57 St. Rep. 120 (2000).

Unloaded BB Gun Not Considered Weapon for Purposes of Sentence Enhancement for Use of Dangerous Weapon: Clemo pleaded guilty to robbing a casino by threatening an employee with an unloaded BB pistol and was sentenced to 7 years with 5 years suspended for felony robbery pursuant to 45-5-401, plus an additional 2 years for committing the offense with a dangerous weapon pursuant to this section. Following St. v. Wilson, 282 M 134, 936 P2d 316, 54 St. Rep. 278 (1997), the Supreme Court concluded that Clemo's unloaded BB gun was no more capable of causing harm at the time in question than the inoperable BB gun used in Wilson and thus could not be characterized as a weapon because it was not easily able to produce serious harm when it was used to rob the casino. The case was remanded to vacate the enhanced portion of Clemo's sentence. St. v. Clemo, 1999 MT 323, 297 M 316, 992 P2d 1263, 56 St. Rep. 1292 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Matson, 227 M 36, 736 P2d 971, 44 St. Rep. 874 (1987), and In re R.L.S., 1999 MT 34, 293 M 288, 977 P2d 967, 56 St. Rep. 149 (1999).

Exceptions to General Rule of Retroactivity — Guillaume Inapplicable to Case Finalized Before Adoption of New Constitutional Rule: Although Nichols' conviction, resulting in an enhanced penalty for use of a weapon, was finalized more than 5 years prior to the Supreme Court's decision in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312, 56 St. Rep. 117 (1999), which created a new constitutional rule barring enhanced weapon sentences when the underlying offense requires proof of use of a weapon (see 2001 amendment to this section by Ch. 16), Nichols nevertheless argued that the portion of his sentence precluded by Guillaume should be stricken from his sentence. The Supreme Court applied the retroactivity criteria in Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288, 103 L Ed 2d 334, 109 S Ct 1060 (1989), noting that two exceptions apply to the general rule of retroactivity. The first exception applies when the constitutional rule puts primary, private individual conduct beyond the power of the criminal law to proscribe; the second exception applies when the procedures used to convict the defendant are so implicit in the concept of ordered liberty as to constitute watershed rules of criminal procedure. Finding that Guillaume was not dictated by prior precedent and did not set out a watershed rule, the court held that the new rule did not require retroactive application to cases not pending on direct appeal or to cases that were final when the Guillaume opinion was issued. Not only was Nichols' claim time-barred under the pre-1997 version of 46-21-102, his argument that the sentence should be reduced to prevent a miscarriage of justice also failed because miscarriage of justice refers to actual, not legal, innocence. St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 89, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999), followed in St. v. Baker, 1999 MT 251, 296 M 253, 989 P2d 335, 56 St. Rep. 987 (1999), and overruled in St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002). See also St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995).

Application of Weapon Enhancement Statute to Felony Conviction When Underlying Offense Requires Proof of Weapon Use Unconstitutional Under Montana Double Jeopardy Provision: When presented with the question of whether this section, the weapon enhancement statute, violates the double jeopardy provisions of Art. II, sec. 25, Mont. Const., the Supreme Court held that the Montana Constitution affords greater protection against multiple punishment than the federal constitution and that application of the weapon enhancement statute to felony convictions when the underlying offense requires proof of the use of a weapon violates Montana's constitutional double jeopardy provision (see 2001 amendment to this section by Ch. 16). In the instant case, the only factor raising Guillaume's charge from misdemeanor assault to felony assault (now assault with a weapon) was the use of a weapon. The distinction between the two offenses and the different penalties imposed by each offense is the Legislature's way of punishing a criminal defendant for the use of a weapon in committing an assault. Thus, when the weapon enhancement statute was applied to the felony assault (now assault with a weapon) conviction, Guillaume was subjected to double punishment—once when the charge was elevated from misdemeanor assault to felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and again when the weapon enhancement statute was applied. This is exactly what double jeopardy was intended to prevent. The state's argument, that double jeopardy did not protect against multiple punishments for the same offense because that protection is not explicit in the constitutional language, failed because the fifth amendment to the U.S. Constitution has been held in N.C. v. Pearce, 393 US 711, 23 L Ed 2d 656, 89 S Ct 2072 (1969), to protect against multiple punishments for the same offense, and the Montana Constitution provides at least the same protection or greater. Further, the fact that legislative modification of the felony assault (now assault with a weapon) statute could achieve the same result as the present sentencing scheme did not mean that double jeopardy did not apply in this case. St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312, 56 St. Rep. 117 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980), and St. v. Zabawa, 279 M 307, 928 P2d 151, 53 St. Rep. 1162 (1996), followed in St. v. Brown, 1999 MT 31, 293 M 268, 975 P2d 321, 56 St. Rep. 139 (1999), St. v. Gustafson, 2000 MT 364, 303 M 386, 15 P3d 944, 57 St. Rep. 1554 (2000), and distinguished in St. v. Park, 2001 MT 157, 306 M 98, 30 P3d 1062 (2001). Aguilar was followed in St. v. Gustafson, 2000 MT 364, 303 M 386, 15 P3d 944, 57 St. Rep. 1554 (2000). Guillaume will not be retroactively applied to cases not pending on direct appeal or to cases that were final when that opinion was issued. St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999). Nichols was overruled in St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002), to the extent that the Supreme Court refused to retroactively apply Guillaume.

Unloaded, Inoperable BB Gun Not "Dangerous Weapon" for Sentence Enhancement Purposes: Defendant pleaded guilty to robbery and received a 15-year prison sentence. The District Court also concluded that the defendant used a dangerous weapon, a gun, in the commission of an offense and increased the sentence by 4 years. The defendant appealed, claiming that despite the victims' fears or beliefs concerning the gun, the undisputed facts established that a "dangerous weapon" was not used during the robbery because examination of the weapon revealed that it was a broken, unloaded, and inoperable BB gun. The Supreme Court agreed and reversed, ruling that District Courts must analyze the weapon itself, not the subjective beliefs and fears of the victims, to determine whether a "dangerous weapon" was used during commission of an offense. (See 2001 amendment to this section by Ch. 16.) St. v. Wilson, 282 M 134, 936 P2d 316, 54 St. Rep. 278 (1997).

"Any Offense" Includes Offenses Having Use of Weapon as Element of Offense: Zabawa argued that applying the weapons enhancement statute to him constituted double jeopardy because the use of a weapon was an element of felony assault (now assault with a weapon) to which he had pleaded guilty and that the use in the statute of "any offense" was ambiguous and should be interpreted to mean only offenses in which the use of a weapon was not an element of the offense. The Supreme Court held that the plain meaning of "any" included all offenses and that there is a presumption that the Legislature enacts a law with knowledge of existing laws and, in the present case, that would mean that the legislature used the term "any" knowing full well that there were offenses for which the use of a weapon was an element of the offense. St. v. Zabawa, 279 M 307, 928 P2d 151, 53 St. Rep. 1162 (1996).

Weapons Enhancement Statute Not Double Jeopardy When Legislative Intent Clear Statute Intended to Impose Cumulative Punishments: Zabawa argued that applying the weapons enhancement statute to him constituted double jeopardy because the use of a weapon was an element of felony assault (now assault with a weapon) to which he had pleaded guilty. The Supreme Court held that applying the weapons enhancement statute did not constitute double jeopardy because the language of the statute clearly showed the Legislature's intent to impose cumulative punishments and that the United States Supreme Court in Mo. v. Hunter, 459 US 359 (1983), had ruled that cumulative punishments imposed in a single trial do not violate the double jeopardy clause of the fifth amendment of the U.S. Constitution. (See 2001 amendment to this section by Ch. 16.) St. v. Zabawa, 279 M 307, 928 P2d 151, 53 St. Rep. 1162 (1996), distinguished in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312, 56 St. Rep. 117 (1999). See also St. v. Keith, 2000 MT 23, 298 M 165, 995 P2d 966, 57 St. Rep. 120 (2000).

Error by Original Judge on Maximum Sentence — Improper Guilty Plea: Prior to accepting a plea agreement, defendant was incorrectly advised by the original presiding judge that the maximum sentence possible for two counts of felony assault (now assault with a weapon) arising from the same incident was 30 years rather than 40 years. When the original judge recused himself, a second judge sentenced the defendant to 40 years. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the District Court erred in imposing a 40-year sentence and instructed the District Court to modify the sentencing order to provide defendant a sentence no longer than the maximum sentence that had been advised by the original judge. (See 2001 amendment to this section by Ch. 16.) St. v. Brown, 262 M 499, 865 P2d 282, 50 St. Rep. 1658 (1993), overruled in part in St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995), followed in St. v. Roach, 1999 MT 38, 293 M 311, 975 P2d 817, 56 St. Rep. 161 (1999), and distinguished in St. v. Wilson, 1999 MT 52, 293 M 429, 976 P2d 962, 56 St. Rep. 220 (1999).

Enhancement for Single Offense, Not Single Incident: Byers urged the adoption of the California “single incident” rule, which restricts weapons enhancement sentencing considerations to a single period of time. However, the clear language of this section dictates an enhancement of from 2 years to 10 years for each offense and in no way restricts sentencing to a single transaction. St. v. Byers, 261 M 17, 861 P2d 860, 50 St. Rep. 1162 (1993), overruled in part in St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995).

Use of Aggregate Sentence Sufficient: Byers was unequivocally assessed 75 years for each of two counts of deliberate homicide, and the sentence was enhanced by an aggregate of 15 years under this section because a weapon was used. Byers contended that the sentence enhancement constituted a general sentence that should have been divided between the two offenses. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that the specific term of 15 years was assessed over and above the specific terms of 75 years, so there was nothing general about the sentence. In a situation in which both crimes are the same, the use of an aggregate sentence within the parameters of this section is sufficient. St. v. Byers, 261 M 17, 861 P2d 860, 50 St. Rep. 1162 (1993), overruled in part in St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995).

Sentence for Felony Assault (Now Assault With a Weapon) and Knowing Use of Firearm — Sentence Within Statutory Guideline Not Excessive: Defendant was sentenced to 10 years in prison for felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and to a consecutive term of 10 years with 5 years suspended for the knowing use of a firearm during commission of the offense, was designated a dangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) for purposes of parole eligibility, and was fined $50,000 to be paid out of proceeds recovered in a pending civil suit. (See 2001 amendment to this section by Ch. 16.) Defendant contended the sentence was excessive given the nature of the offense and his prior record. However, the sentence was within the statutory guidelines for the offense and therefore did not violate the constitutional ban on cruel and unusual punishment. St. v. Dahms, 252 M 1, 825 P2d 1214, 49 St. Rep. 106 (1992), followed in St. v. DeSalvo, 273 M 343, 903 P2d 202, 52 St. Rep. 1019 (1995).

Knowingly — Alleged Accidental Shooting: Defendant’s voluntary act of grabbing for a gun is sufficient to meet the “knowingly” requirement of the enhancement statute. St. v. Longneck, 247 M 95, 804 P2d 1044, 48 St. Rep. 107 (1991).

Supplying Weapon Used in Crime Characterized as Use: The defendant argued that he only supplied the weapon used in a robbery and murder and should not have been sentenced under the weapons enhancement statute. The Supreme Court held that providing the weapon knowing that it would be used in a crime constituted “otherwise using a firearm” under the statute. St. v. Mazurkiewicz, 245 M 172, 799 P2d 1066, 47 St. Rep. 1962 (1990). See also St. v. Hatten, 1999 MT 298, 297 M 127, 991 P2d 939, 56 St. Rep. 1198 (1999).

Standing to Challenge Constitutionality of Weapon Enhancement and Dangerous Offender Statutes: To challenge the constitutionality of a criminal statute or procedure, the defendant must show a direct personal injury resulting from application of the law in question. The Supreme Court held that a defendant had standing to challenge both Montana’s weapon enhancement statute and dangerous offender statute (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) because he faced direct injury to his liberty interests through application of those laws. St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298, 47 St. Rep. 454 (1990), followed in St. v. Mazurkiewicz, 245 M 172, 799 P2d 1066, 47 St. Rep. 1962 (1990), and, with regard to standing to challenge criminal restitution statutes, in St. v. Thaut, 2004 MT 359, 324 M 460, 103 P3d 1012 (2004).

Applicability to Negligent Homicide: By its terms, the enhancement statute applies to the commission of any offense, including negligent homicide. St. v. Redfern, 228 M 311, 741 P2d 1339, 44 St. Rep. 1547 (1987).

Federal Due Process Rights: Enhancement of sentences did not violate federal due process rights even though the information under which defendant was charged did not allege violation of this section. LaMere v. Risley, 827 F2d 622 (9th Cir. 1987), followed in Nichols v. McCormick, 929 F2d 507 (9th Cir. 1991).

Application of Section 46-18-222 When Maximum Sentence Given: Section 46-18-221 requires a sentence of from 2 to 10 years when a person found guilty of any offense used a firearm during the commission of the offense. Defendant was sentenced to 10 years under this section. Therefore, 46-18-222, stating when a mandatory minimum sentence does not apply, could not be invoked because defendant was sentenced to the maximum possible sentence under 46-18-221. The purpose of 46-18-222 is to allow a judge who would otherwise have to pronounce the minimum sentence to sentence a defendant to less than the minimum sentence. St. v. Nichols, 222 M 71, 720 P2d 1157, 43 St. Rep. 1068 (1986).

Additional Sentence Only for Felony Offenses: This statute applies only to a situation in which the underlying conviction is for a felony. St. v. Trimmer, 214 M 427, 694 P2d 490, 42 St. Rep. 77 (1985), followed and clarified in St. v. Zabawa, 279 M 307, 928 P2d 151, 53 St. Rep. 1162 (1996).

Enhanced Sentence — Ex-Policeman — Homicide by Shooting — No Equal Protection Violation: Defendant convicted of negligent homicide with a revolver was given an extra 10 years for committing the offense with a dangerous weapon. His claim that he was punished for being an ex-policeman and that thus his equal protection rights were violated was clearly without merit. He cited no authority for the claim. Given the evidence produced at trial, holding him to a greater knowledge of the risks inherent in his actions for the purpose of deciding whether to enhance his negligent homicide sentence was unquestionably reasonable and therefore constitutionally sustainable. St. v. Stroud, 210 M 58, 683 P2d 459, 41 St. Rep. 919 (1984).

Negligent Homicide — Additional Sentence for Knowingly Using Gun Not Prohibited: That defendant was convicted of "negligent" homicide with a gun did not prohibit him from being given an additional sentence for "knowingly" using a dangerous weapon during the offense. St. v. Stroud, 210 M 58, 683 P2d 459, 41 St. Rep. 919 (1984).

Information Not Required to Allege Use of Weapon: Defendant contended his sentence could not be enhanced under this section because the allegation that a weapon was used was not contained in the information. The information filed in a criminal prosecution need not contain a specific allegation of the use of a dangerous weapon if the charging instrument otherwise properly identifies the crime for which the defendant is charged. The statute is for punishment and not one to define an element of the crime charged. St. v. Madera, 206 M 140, 670 P2d 552, 40 St. Rep. 1558 (1983). See also St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298, 47 St. Rep. 454 (1990), and St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994).

Consecutive Sentence Mandate — Sentences Prior to Enactment of Mandate: Defendant was convicted of negligent homicide and sentenced to 10 years and to an additional consecutive 5 years for the knowing use of a gun while committing the offense. At the time of sentencing, the court had discretion to make the 5 years run either consecutively or concurrently. This section was later amended to require that a sentence run consecutively. Defendant's contention on appeal that it was error to require the 5 years to run consecutively went to the equity of the requirement and not to its legality and should be directed to the Sentence Review Board rather than to the Supreme Court on appeal from the sentence. St. v. Hubbard, 200 M 106, 649 P2d 1331, 39 St. Rep. 1608 (1982).

Consistent Mental States — Knowing Use of Dangerous Weapon and Negligent Homicide: There is no conflict between the mental state described in this section, requiring the knowing use of a firearm or other dangerous weapon while engaged in the commission of an offense, and the negligent mental state in the statute making criminal homicide negligent homicide when it is committed negligently. It is not a denial of due process to find one guilty of negligent homicide and to further find that he knowingly used a firearm during commission of the offense and therefore enhance the penalty under this section. St. v. Hubbard, 200 M 106, 649 P2d 1331, 39 St. Rep. 1608 (1982).

Additional Penalty for Use of Weapon in Committing Crime — Not Double Jeopardy: A defendant, convicted of an offense committed with a weapon and given an additional sentence under 46-18-221, is not subjected to multiple punishments for the same offense in violation of the double jeopardy clauses of the federal and state constitutions because 46-18-221 does not constitute a separate offense or penalize the defendant for a separate offense; his sentence for an underlying offense is enhanced based upon the existence of an additional factor, the use of a weapon. (See 2001 amendment to this section by Ch. 16.) St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980), cited in St. v. Spurlock, 225 M 238, 731 P2d 1315, 44 St. Rep. 200 (1987), followed in St. v. Forsyth, 233 M 389, 761 P2d 363, 45 St. Rep. 1577 (1988), and St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298, 47 St. Rep. 454 (1990), and distinguished in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312, 56 St. Rep. 117 (1999).

Sentence Enhanced — Defendant Not Sentenced for Crime Not Charged: Defendant was convicted of the crime of aggravated burglary with a weapon, and the charging document, while omitting any mention of additional sentencing under 46-18-221, did mention that he was armed with a knife while committing the crime and was sentenced under 46-18-221 for an additional 5 years for the use of the knife. The defendant was not sentenced for a crime with which he was not charged because 46-18-221 does not create a separate substantive offense but enhances the penalty for an underlying offense. The defendant was not denied due process due to the additional sentencing because the jury was instructed on the crime of aggravated burglary with a weapon and found him guilty of that crime. (See 2001 amendment to this section by Ch. 16.) St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980).

Considerations for Application of Mandatory Minimum Sentence: Section 46-18-222, prior to amendment by sec. 1, Ch. 396, L. 1979, provided that although a loaded weapon was involved in the alleged assault, where no serious bodily injury was inflicted on the victim, the mandatory minimum sentence prescribed by law did not apply. It was therefore error to impose the minimum mandatory sentence. St. v. Nelson, 184 M 491, 603 P2d 1050 (1979).

WHEREAS, the Committee recommended that a bill be drafted to amend Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, to make nonsubstantive changes to clarify and streamline the statutes to eliminate contradictions, confusion, inconsistent terminology, and excessive internal references.

THEREFORE, the Legislature of the State of Montana finds it appropriate to so amend certain sentencing-related statutes."

1995 Amendments: Chapter 125 near end of introductory phrase substituted "46-18-201(5) through (7)" for "46-18-201(4) through (6)"; and in (6) substituted "protection of the victim and society" for "protection of society".

Chapter 482 in version effective July 1, 1997, near middle of introductory clause after "state", inserted "and 46-18-219".

Severability: Section 42, Ch. 125, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

Coordination Instruction — Effective Dates: Section 21, Ch. 482, L. 1995, provided: "(1) If House Bill No. 357 and [this act] [Senate Bill No. 66] are both passed and approved:

(a) [sections 1 through 18] of [this act] are effective July 1, 1997; and

(b) the sentencing commission shall include recommendations for implementing the public policy contained in [sections 1 through 18] of [this act].

(2) [Sections 19, 20, and this section] [enacted as codification and coordination instructions] are effective July 1, 1995.

(3) If House Bill No. 357 is not passed and approved, then this section is void." House Bill No. 357 was approved March 31, 1995, as Ch. 306, L. 1995. Therefore, the amendments to 46-18-222, enacted as sec. 14 of Senate Bill No. 66, are effective July 1, 1997.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 262 at beginning of (5) substituted "in a case in which the threat of bodily injury or actual infliction of bodily injury is an actual element of the crime" for "where applicable"; and made minor changes in style.

1991 Amendment: Inserted (6) providing an exception from the mandatory minimum sentence and allowing deferral or suspension of mandatory sentence of imprisonment for sexual assault involving a person under age 16 if the court concludes treatment in local community is better for rehabilitation of defendant and protection of society; and made minor changes in style.

1987 Amendment: Near end of introductory clause, after "subsections", deleted "(3)" and inserted "(6)".

1983 Amendments: Chapter 392, near end of introductory clause, inserted reference to 46-18-224.

Chapter 532 inserted last sentence of (2) stating that voluntary intoxication or a drugged condition is not an impairment for purposes of subsection (2).

Source: The subsection (2) exception inserted by sec. 1, Ch. 532, L. 1983, is modeled on the Wash. Rev. Code Ann., section 46.61.024, and Ariz. Rev. Stat. Ann., section 28-622.01.

1981 Amendments: Chapter 207 inserted ", and (5)" after "prescribed by subsections (3), (4)" in the first sentence.

Chapter 327 changed the reference to "46-18-502(2)" to "46-18-502(3)" to reflect amendment of that section.

Interim Study Committee Bill: Chapter 327, L. 1981 (HB 12), was introduced at the request of the interim Committee on Corrections Policy and Facility Needs. See committee report, Legislative Council, 1980.

Case Notes

Defendant Properly Deemed Ineligible for Deferred Sentence — "Threat" Not Synonymous With "Risk": The defendant entered into a plea agreement under which he would receive a deferred sentence on his felony criminal endangerment charge. Afterward, the prosecutor learned that the defendant had been previously convicted of a felony and was therefore not eligible for a deferred sentence under 46-18-201. The defendant argued that he was eligible under an exception to 46-18-222 because the term "threat" in 46-18-222 means the same as "risk" in the criminal endangerment section, 46-5-207. The District Court disagreed and imposed a suspended sentence. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, agreeing with the District Court that the terms are not synonymous and that the defendant was not eligible for a deferred sentence. St. v. Cleveland, 2014 MT 305, 377 Mont. 97, 338 P.3d 606.

Four-Year Mandatory Minimum Required When No Exceptions Apply: The District Court sentenced the defendant to 15 years with all but 31 days suspended for sexual intercourse without consent with a minor. The Supreme Court reversed the sentence, finding that none of the applicable exceptions to the 4-year mandatory minimum applied and that the District Court lacked statutory authority to suspend all but 31 days of the defendant's sentence. St. v. Rambold, 2014 MT 116, 375 Mont. 30, 325 P.3d 686.

Sentencing — District Court Departure from Persistent Felony Offender Statute — Sentence to Department of Corrections Instead of State Prison Considered Proper Departure: The defendant was convicted of felony partner or family member assault, designated as a persistent felony offender (PFO), and committed to the Department of Corrections (DOC) for the statutory minimum period of 5 years under 46-18-502. On appeal, the defendant argued that the District Court misinterpreted 46-18-222, which allows the court to forego restrictions when there is “no serious bodily injury” to the victim. The Supreme Court affirmed the sentence and determined that regardless of whether the prosecution proved “serious bodily injury”, the District Court correctly departed from the PFO statute by sentencing the defendant to the DOC rather than the state prison. Moreover, the District Court based its sentence on the defendant's likelihood of reoffending and the court's desire to rehabilitate him. St. v. Thompson, 2012 MT 208, 366 Mont. 260, 286 P.3d 581.

Parole Eligibility Restriction Inapplicable: After sentencing the defendant to three life sentences — two to run concurrently with each other and consecutive to the other life sentence — the District Court did not impose any parole restrictions. Rather, the court presumed that the defendant would not be parole eligible for 60 years pursuant to 46-23-201(4), which prevents a prisoner who is serving a life sentence from being parole eligible for 30 years. The defendant was 17 years old when he committed the offenses. Under 46-18-222, restrictions on parole eligibility do not apply if the offender was less than 18 years old at the time the offenses were committed. Under these circumstances, 46-18-222 takes precedence over the general parole restriction contained in 46-23-201. Citing St. v. Heafner, 2010 MT 87, 356 Mont. 128, 231 P.3d 1087, and St. v. Petersen, 2011 MT 22, 359 Mont. 200, 247 P.3d 731, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded with an order to strike the illegal parole restriction from the defendant's written sentence. St. v. Olivares-Coster, 2011 MT 196, 361 Mont. 380, 259 P.3d 760.

Ten-Year Sentence for Criminal Distribution of Dangerous Drugs Affirmed Despite Finding of Impaired Mental Capacity: Novak was sentenced to 10 years with 6 years suspended for selling 0.06 grams of methamphetamine to an undercover informant, despite a finding that Novak was eligible for an exception to the mandatory minimum sentence because of impaired mental capacity. Novak appealed the sentence, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The fact that Novak was eligible for a sentence exception did not mean that he was entitled to it. The sentencing court's oral pronouncement of sentence complied with statutory requirements by providing adequate reasons for imposing the sentence, and the sentence fell within the parameters of 45-9-101(4) and was not illegal. St. v. Novak, 2008 MT 157, 343 M 292, 183 P3d 887 (2008).

Mandatory Life Sentence Not Violative of Due Process, Cruel and Unusual Punishment, or Separation of Powers — Exception Properly Considered: Webb pleaded guilty to second offense sexual intercourse without consent and was sentenced to life in prison without parole pursuant to 46-18-219. Webb appealed the sentence on grounds that the mandatory life sentence violated procedural and substantive due process, the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, and the separation of powers doctrine. Webb also asserted that the sentencing court failed to properly consider the exception to mandatory sentencing set out in subsection (3) of this section. The Supreme Court affirmed. The sentencing court properly considered the exception and did not abuse its broad discretion in finding no unusual and substantial distress. The sentencing court offered Webb all the procedural due process necessary and did not violate substantive due process because the sentence fit within the statutory sentencing limits. Webb's contention that life without parole was cruel and unusual punishment failed because the sentence was commensurate with the gravity of the crime and consistent with state sentencing and correctional policy. The argument that mandatory sentences violate the separation of powers doctrine also failed because it is in the Legislature's province to distinguish between criminal offenses and to establish punishments, and enactment of 46-18-219 was based on constitutional principles and Montana public policy. St. v. Webb, 2005 MT 5, 325 M 317, 106 P3d 521 (2005). See also St. v. Bruns, 213 M 372, 691 P2d 817 (1984), and St. v. Dahms, 252 M 1, 825 P2d 1214 (1992).

Mandatory Minimum Sentence for Incest Properly Applied — Victims Under Age Sixteen: Bailey was convicted of incest with two victims under 16 years old, and Bailey was more than 3 years older than both victims. The District Court determined that 45-5-507(4) required the imposition of a mandatory minimum sentence of 4 years and sentenced Bailey to 10 years with the Department of Corrections, with 6 years suspended, on each count. Bailey asserted error, but the Supreme Court examined the sentence for legality and affirmed. The 4-year mandatory minimum sentence in 45-5-507(4) clearly applied, and 46-18-205 did not come into play because none of the exceptions in this section to the mandatory minimum sentence for incest existed, so the District Court did not err in sentencing Bailey. St. v. Bailey, 2004 MT 87, 320 M 501, 87 P3d 1032 (2004), following St. v. Fauque, 2000 MT 168, 300 M 307, 4 P3d 651 (2000).

Failure to Raise Sentencing Objections Before District Court — Issue Not Preserved for Appeal: Tucker pleaded guilty to attempted aggravated assault with a weapon. At the sentencing hearing, Tucker argued that one of the sentencing exceptions applied to him because his mental capacity was impaired because of his transsexualism combined with the stress of his fiancée's custody battles. The District Court disagreed and added the minimum 2-year weapon enhancement to his sentence. At no time did Tucker complain to the court that its findings were inadequate under 46-18-223 or allege that the sentence was illegal, excessive, or improper. Instead, Tucker argued on appeal that the sentencing court erred as a matter of law in failing to state the reasons why the sentencing exception did not apply. The Supreme Court refused to remand for resentencing because Tucker failed to bring the allegations of sentencing error to the attention of the District Court in a timely manner. The purpose of the contemporaneous objection requirement is to give the District Court the first opportunity to correct any error. Failure to do so constitutes a waiver of the right to appeal the issue. St. v. Tucker, 2000 MT 255, 301 M 466, 10 P3d 832, 57 St. Rep. 1046 (2000).

Failure to Include Written Findings of Fact Regarding Exceptions From Mandatory Minimum Sentence — Reversible Error: The District Court sentenced Sprinkle to 20 years for felony drug offenses pursuant to the mandatory minimum sentence requirement in 45-9-101, concluding that none of the exceptions to mandatory minimum sentencing in this section applied. However, the court failed to comply with 46-18-223, which requires the sentencing court to state in the judgment the reasons for its decision in writing and to identify the facts relied upon in making the decision. On appeal, Sprinkle asserted that he was entitled to an exception to mandatory minimum sentencing because his participation in the drug transaction was relatively minor. Without the required written findings of fact, the Supreme Court had no basis upon which to review the judgment, so the judgment was vacated and remanded for entry of findings of fact to support the conclusion that exceptions to mandatory minimum sentencing did not apply. St. v. Sprinkle, 2000 MT 188, 300 M 405, 4 P3d 1204, 57 St. Rep. 746 (2000).

No Claim to Unconstitutional Effect of Mandatory Minimum Sentence When Defendant Not Subject to Mandatory Minimum: Duffy was sentenced to 20 years for each offense of sexual abuse of his daughters, who were less than 16 years old at the time of the offense. On appeal, Duffy claimed that because of their ages, 45-5-503 and 45-5-507 required a minimum 4-year prison term, which deprived him of equal protection and due process because he did not qualify for the exception to the minimum term in subsection (5) of this section regarding instances involving a lack of serious bodily injury, asserting that he was similarly situated to persons convicted of sexual assault but treated differently because those offenders could qualify for the exception. However, before Duffy could claim standing to complain that he was unconstitutionally affected by the mandatory minimum sentences, he must have been subjected to those sentences, which was not the case here. Thus, Duffy was not affected by the disparate treatment of sex offenders based on the nature of the offenses and lacked standing to challenge the sentencing scheme on equal protection or due process grounds. St. v. Duffy, 2000 MT 186, 300 M 381, 6 P3d 453, 57 St. Rep. 734 (2000).

Four-Year Mandatory Minimum Sentence for Sexual Intercourse With Minor Properly Applied: By plea agreement, Fauque pleaded guilty to one count of sexual intercourse without consent and one count of sexual assault against his 14-year-old daughter. The District Court concluded that the 4-year minimum sentence provided in 45-5-503 applied and that Fauque had failed to establish entitlement to any exceptions to the mandatory minimum sentence provided in this section. The court sentenced Fauque to 25 years on each count, with all but 4 years suspended and the sentences to run concurrently. Fauque appealed on grounds that a direct conflict existed between the mandatory minimum sentence for sexual intercourse without consent when the victim is less than 16 and the defendant is 3 or more years older contained in 45-5-503 and the 30-day mandatory minimum sentence for sexual intercourse without consent when the victim is less than 16 contained in 46-18-201 (see 1999 amendment and enactment of 46-18-205). The Supreme Court examined the legislative intent of both sentencing provisions and found no conflict in this case. The 4-year mandatory minimum provided in 45-5-503 clearly applied to Fauque, who was 53 years old at the time that he assaulted his 14-year-old daughter and who did not argue any sentencing exception under this section. The mandatory minimum (now contained in 46-18-205) in 46-18-201 simply disallowed suspension of the first 30 days of a sentence under 45-5-503 under any circumstances, even if an exception existed under this section. Because no exception existed here, 46-18-201 did not come into play, so the Supreme Court affirmed Fauque's 4-year mandatory minimum sentence pursuant to 45-5-503. St. v. Fauque, 2000 MT 168, 300 M 307, 4 P3d 651, 57 St. Rep. 693 (2000).

Evidence of Voluntary Mental Impairment Insufficient to Trigger Waiver of Mandatory Minimum Sentence — Hearing Not Required: Keith was sentenced to 10 years in prison plus 10 years for use of a weapon, with 15 years suspended, for criminal endangerment. At the sentencing hearing, the District Court noted that evidence of Keith's reduced mental capacity was based on Keith's voluntary ingestion of alcohol and prescription drugs and that under subsection (2) of this section, the court could not waive the mandatory minimum sentence. Citing numerous cases, the Supreme Court held that the statute does permit the sentencing court to reject the mandatory minimum sentence if the court determines that defendant's mental capacity was significantly impaired during the commission of the offense but that the statute does not apply in cases when the maximum sentence or any sentence greater than the mandatory minimum is imposed. Here, there was no indication that the sentencing court ever intended to sentence Keith to either the 2-year mandatory minimum or to a period less than the 2-year mandatory minimum, so the exceptions did not apply. Further, because the exceptions were not an issue, Keith was not entitled to a hearing pursuant to 46-18-223. Nevertheless, in this case, the sentencing court did hold a hearing on its own motion but did not then abuse its discretion by denying Keith's request for a continuance of the sentencing hearing to allow evidence of Keith's mental capacity. St. v. Keith, 2000 MT 23, 298 M 165, 995 P2d 966, 57 St. Rep. 120 (2000).

Exceptions to Mandatory Sentencing Not Applicable When Sentence Is Greater Than Minimum Sentence and Findings Not Required: Zabawa argued that the lower court erred in failing to apply to him the exceptions to the mandatory minimum sentence and also erred in failing to include in the judgment a written statement of the reasons that the lower court declined to apply the exceptions. The Supreme Court held that the exceptions do not apply in cases in which the lower court sentences the offender to more than the minimum sentence. In such cases, there is no requirement that the court make findings on why it did not apply the exceptions. St. v. Zabawa, 279 M 307, 928 P2d 151, 53 St. Rep. 1162 (1996), followed in St. v. Keith, 2000 MT 23, 298 M 165, 995 P2d 966, 57 St. Rep. 120 (2000), and St. v. Legg, 2004 MT 26, 319 M 362, 84 P3d 648 (2004).

Statute Inapplicable Notwithstanding Difference Between Oral and Written Sentence: Graveley was convicted of solicitation to commit deliberate homicide. At the sentencing hearing, the District Court announced Graveley's sentence of 40 years in the custody of the Department of Corrections, with the first 10 years in a prison environment. The District Court's written judgment omitted the reference to the first 10 years. The Supreme Court held that a review of the oral record showed that the District Court was not predisposed to sentencing Graveley to the 10-year minimum sentence. The Supreme Court held that the District Court's oral pronouncement did not amount to a 10-year sentence, but a 40-year sentence with 10 years in a prison environment, and that the District Court reiterated the 40-year sentence in writing. Because this was not a minimum sentence, the Supreme Court held that this section was inapplicable. St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915 P2d 184, 53 St. Rep. 239 (1996).

Impairment of Mental Capacity Insufficient to Constitute Defense — Suspension of Sentence Proper: Defendant was convicted of attempt (deliberate homicide) and use of a dangerous weapon, for which he was sentenced to 10 years and 2 years, respectively. The District Court, after examining defendant's mental capacity at the time of the offense, held that incarceration was not appropriate in light of defendant's stellar community service record, the nature of the offense, the unlikelihood that defendant would ever attempt to harm the victim again, and defendant's remorse and lack of a previous criminal record. The court suspended both sentences, except for 15 days already served, and added a sentence of 4,000 hours of community service, citing St. v. Arbogast, 202 M 220, 656 P2d 828 (1983), as authority for suspending the mandatory minimum sentences. The Supreme Court distinguished Arbogast but affirmed the sentence suspension because defendant's mental capacity at the time of the offense was significantly impaired, but not so impaired as to constitute a defense. St. v. Niemi, 252 M 531, 830 P2d 1280, 49 St. Rep. 141 (1992).

Exception Properly Applied to Mandatory Sentence for Sexual Intercourse Without Consent: The state contended that the District Court erred in applying the exception contained in subsection (5) of this section when suspending all but 30 days of a sentence for sexual intercourse without consent because no serious bodily injury was inflicted on the victim. The Supreme Court cited numerous federal cases in resolving the ambiguity between 45-5-503(2) and subsection (5) of this section, concluding that because the threat or infliction of bodily harm may, depending on the circumstances, be an element of the offense of sexual intercourse without consent, the exception to the minimum sentence when no serious bodily harm was inflicted is applicable to that offense. Ambiguity regarding the applicability of the exception must be resolved in favor of leniency. St. v. Goodwin, 249 M 1, 813 P2d 953, 48 St. Rep. 539 (1991), followed in St. v. Van Robinson, 248 M 528, 813 P2d 967, 48 St. Rep. 558 (1991).

Application of Section 46-18-222 When Maximum Sentence Given: Section 46-18-221 requires a sentence of from 2 to 10 years when a person found guilty of any offense used a firearm during the commission of the offense. Defendant was sentenced to 10 years under this section. Therefore, 46-18-222, stating when a mandatory minimum sentence does not apply, could not be invoked because defendant was sentenced to the maximum possible sentence under 46-18-221. The purpose of 46-18-222 is to allow a judge who would otherwise have to pronounce the minimum sentence to sentence a defendant to less than the minimum sentence. St. v. Nichols, 222 M 71, 720 P2d 1157, 43 St. Rep. 1068 (1986), followed in St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915 P2d 184, 53 St. Rep. 239 (1996). See also St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994).

Maximum Sentence Imposed — Refusal of Hearing on Exception to Mandatory Minimum Sentence — No Error: Since defendant was given the maximum sentence for negligent homicide, there was no chance he would be given less than the mandatory minimum and it was therefore not error to refuse a hearing on whether one of the exceptions to imposing the mandatory minimum sentence was applicable to him. St. v. Stroud, 210 M 58, 683 P2d 459, 41 St. Rep. 919 (1984). See also St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994), and St. v. DeSalvo, 273 M 343, 903 P2d 202, 52 St. Rep. 1019 (1995).

Sentence in Excess of Mandatory Minimum Imposed After Finding of Mitigating Circumstance: Defendant was convicted of mitigated deliberate homicide. At the sentencing hearing, defense counsel asked that 46-18-222 be applied to defendant and that the 2-year minimum sentence for mitigated deliberate homicide not be imposed. The trial judge applied the provision of 46-18-222 relating to impaired mental capacity to defendant but sentenced defendant to more than the mandatory minimum sentence for mitigated deliberate homicide. The Supreme Court affirmed the sentence, ruling that since the trial judge had given consideration to defendant's situation and had given specific reasons for the sentence imposed, the trial judge's failure to state specifically that 46-18-222 did not apply did not constitute reversible error. St. v. Zampich, 205 M 231, 667 P2d 955, 40 St. Rep. 1235 (1983).

Killing Person Who Killed Defendant's Friend — Unusual or Substantial Duress Not Found: Defendant was convicted of negligent homicide after a shootout. At the trial he stated that he only intended to "wing" the victim, that victim had shot defendant's friend so defendant shot victim, that defendant only intended to wound victim, that "nobody sticks a gun in my face and gets away with it", that victim deserved to die and did not deserve to live, and that victim killed defendant's friend, so defendant killed victim. Defendant also had the presence of mind to temporarily incapacitate victim by kicking him in the groin and killed victim while victim was running away from defendant and posed no immediate threat to defendant. Although the circumstances of the shootout imposed a certain amount of duress upon defendant, it was not unusual or substantial so as to allow application of this section and except defendant from the mandatory minimum sentence. St. v. Hubbard, 200 M 106, 649 P2d 1331, 39 St. Rep. 1608 (1982).

Level of Impairment — Applicability of Section: This section is only applicable to bring a convicted defendant under the exceptions to mandatory minimum sentencing provisions. The degree of impairment contemplated in this section is not significant enough to constitute a defense to the prosecution or to require commitment and is to be considered separately from conviction and from any claims made under 46-14-311 and 46-14-312. St. v. Doney, 194 M 22, 636 P2d 1377, 38 St. Rep. 1707 (1981).

Finding of No Mitigating Factors Supported in Record — Alcohol and Sexual Problems: Where the trial court considered defendant's drinking and sexual problems but concluded that those conditions did not excuse defendant from accountability for his acts, and the evidence presented at the hearing and in the presentence investigation report supported the trial court's conclusion, there was no abuse of discretion in sentencing defendant as a persistent felony offender. [A 1983 amendment provided that voluntary intoxication is not a mental capacity impairment under this section.] St. v. Metz, 184 M 533, 604 P2d 102 (1979).

Considerations for Application of Mandatory Minimum Sentence: Section 46-18-222, prior to amendment by sec. 1, Ch. 396, L. 1979, provided that although a loaded weapon was involved in the alleged assault, where no serious bodily injury was inflicted on the victim, the mandatory minimum sentence prescribed by law did not apply. It was therefore error to impose the minimum mandatory sentence. St. v. Nelson, 184 M 491, 603 P2d 1050 (1979).

46-18-223. Hearing to determine application of exceptions.

Case Notes

Sentencing Hearing — Satisfied Statutory Procedures for Determining Whether Exception to Mandatory Minimum Sentence Applied — Defendant Not Entitled to Separate Hearing — Lack of Exception Referenced by District Court Judgment. St. v. Brown, 2022 MT 176, 410 Mont. 38, 517 P.3d 177.

Failure to Raise Sentencing Objections Before District Court — Issue Not Preserved for Appeal: Tucker pleaded guilty to attempted aggravated assault with a weapon. At the sentencing hearing, Tucker argued that one of the sentencing exceptions applied to him because his mental capacity was impaired because of his transsexualism combined with the stress of his fiancée's custody battles. The District Court disagreed and added the minimum 2-year weapon enhancement to his sentence. At no time did Tucker complain to the court that its findings were inadequate under this section or allege that the sentence was illegal, excessive, or improper. Instead, Tucker argued on appeal that the sentencing court erred as a matter of law in failing to state the reasons why the sentencing exception did not apply. The Supreme Court refused to remand for resentencing because Tucker failed to bring the allegations of sentencing error to the attention of the District Court in a timely manner. The purpose of the contemporaneous objection requirement is to give the District Court the first opportunity to correct any error. Failure to do so constitutes a waiver of the right to appeal the issue. St. v. Tucker, 2000 MT 255, 301 M 466, 10 P3d 832, 57 St. Rep. 1046 (2000). See also St. v. Hamilton, 2018 MT 253, 393 Mont. 102, 428 P.3d 849.

Failure to Include Written Findings of Fact Regarding Exceptions From Mandatory Minimum Sentence — Reversible Error: The District Court sentenced Sprinkle to 20 years for felony drug offenses pursuant to the mandatory minimum sentence requirement in 45-9-101, concluding that none of the exceptions to mandatory minimum sentencing in 46-18-222 applied. However, the court failed to comply with this section, which requires the sentencing court to state in the judgment the reasons for its decision in writing and to identify the facts relied upon in making the decision. On appeal, Sprinkle asserted that he was entitled to an exception to mandatory minimum sentencing because his participation in the drug transaction was relatively minor. Without the required written findings of fact, the Supreme Court had no basis upon which to review the judgment, so the judgment was vacated and remanded for entry of findings of fact to support the conclusion that exceptions to mandatory minimum sentencing did not apply. St. v. Sprinkle, 2000 MT 188, 300 M 405, 4 P3d 1204, 57 St. Rep. 746 (2000).

Evidence of Voluntary Mental Impairment Insufficient to Trigger Waiver of Mandatory Minimum Sentence — Hearing Not Required: Keith was sentenced to 10 years in prison plus 10 years for use of a weapon, with 15 years suspended, for criminal endangerment. At the sentencing hearing, the District Court noted that evidence of Keith's reduced mental capacity was based on Keith's voluntary ingestion of alcohol and prescription drugs and that under 46-18-222(2), the court could not waive the mandatory minimum sentence. Citing numerous cases, the Supreme Court held that the statute does permit the sentencing court to reject the mandatory minimum sentence if the court determines that defendant's mental capacity was significantly impaired during the commission of the offense but that the statute does not apply in cases when the maximum sentence or any sentence greater than the mandatory minimum is imposed. Here, there was no indication that the sentencing court ever intended to sentence Keith to either the 2-year mandatory minimum or to a period less than the 2-year mandatory minimum, so the exceptions did not apply. Further, because the exceptions were not an issue, Keith was not entitled to a hearing pursuant to this section. Nevertheless, in this case, the sentencing court did hold a hearing on its own motion but did not then abuse its discretion by denying Keith's request for a continuance of the sentencing hearing to allow evidence of Keith's mental capacity. St. v. Keith, 2000 MT 23, 298 M 165, 995 P2d 966, 57 St. Rep. 120 (2000).

Exceptions to Mandatory Sentencing Not Applicable When Sentence Is Greater Than Minimum Sentence and Findings Not Required: Zabawa argued that the lower court erred in failing to apply to him the exceptions to the mandatory minimum sentence and also erred in failing to include in the judgment a written statement of the reasons that the lower court declined to apply the exceptions. The Supreme Court held that the exceptions do not apply in cases in which the lower court sentences the offender to more than the minimum sentence. In such cases, there is no requirement that the court make findings on why it did not apply the exceptions. St. v. Zabawa, Sentence in Excess of Mandatory Minimum Imposed After Finding of Mitigating Circumstance: Defendant was convicted of mitigated deliberate homicide. At the sentencing hearing, defense counsel asked that 46-18-222 be applied to defendant and that the 2-year minimum sentence for mitigated deliberate homicide not be imposed. The trial judge applied the provision of 46-18-222 relating to impaired mental capacity to defendant but sentenced defendant to more than the mandatory minimum sentence for mitigated deliberate homicide. The Supreme Court affirmed the sentence, ruling that since the trial judge had given consideration to defendant's situation and had given specific reasons for the sentence imposed, the trial judge's failure to state specifically that 46-18-222 did not apply did not constitute reversible error. St. v. Zampich, 205 M 231, 667 P2d 955, 40 St. Rep. 1235 (1983).

Admissible Testimony — Testimony Claimed to Be Retrial of More Serious Prior Charge: Mitigated deliberate homicide conviction was reversed, and a negligent homicide plea bargain was made at a second trial following remand. It was not error to admit, in presentence hearing under this section, testimony claimed by defendant to constitute a retrial of the original mitigated deliberate homicide charge. St. v. Hubbard, 200 M 106, 649 P2d 1331, 39 St. Rep. 1608 (1982).

Finding of No Mitigating Factors Supported in Record — Alcohol and Sexual Problems: Where the trial court considered defendant's drinking and sexual problems but concluded that those conditions did not excuse defendant from accountability for his acts, and the evidence presented at the hearing and in the presentence investigation report supported the trial court's conclusion, there was no abuse of discretion in sentencing defendant as a persistent felony offender. St. v. Metz, 184 M 533, 604 P2d 102 (1979).

Record Not Reflective of Defendant's Ability to Pay Restitution — Remand: After pleading guilty to three counts of illegal branding, Mikesell was ordered to pay restitution, based in part on evidence of Mikesell's net worth. However, the record did not reflect all of Mikesell's liabilities and his ability to pay restitution from a ranching operation that was losing money. Mikesell was entitled to have the restitution award supported by evidence, and the Supreme Court reversed and remanded for further findings regarding Mikesell's ability to pay restitution and the setting of restitution payments accordingly. St. v. Mikesell, 2004 MT 146, 321 M 462, 91 P3d 1273 (2004).

46-18-225. Sentencing of nonviolent felony offenders — criteria — alternatives to be considered — court to state reasons for imprisonment.

Compiler's Comments

2005 Amendment: Chapter 517 in (1) at end of first sentence inserted "or a day reporting program provided for in 53-1-203"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2006.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 52 inserted (1) requiring consideration of alternatives to imprisonment for nonviolent felony offenders; in (2) in introductory clause substituted "sentencing judge" for "court"; in (2)(f) after "criminal act or" inserted "if the offender has a prior history of conviction for a criminal act, the offender"; inserted (3) requiring the sentencing judge to state reasons why alternatives to prison were not selected; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 52, L. 1999, provided: "WHEREAS, the Correctional Standards and Oversight Committee was authorized by the Fifty-Fifth Legislature to conduct a study of correctional standards and to act as a correctional oversight committee; and

WHEREAS, the Committee contracted for a review of Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, sentencing statutes; and

WHEREAS, the Committee found that the statutes providing for sentencing and judgment regarding criminal procedures are confusing and rife with cross-references, internal references, and inconsistent terminology that make the statutes difficult to read and understand; and

WHEREAS, the Committee recommended that a bill be drafted to amend Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, to make nonsubstantive changes to clarify and streamline the statutes to eliminate contradictions, confusion, inconsistent terminology, and excessive internal references.

THEREFORE, the Legislature of the State of Montana finds it appropriate to so amend certain sentencing-related statutes."

1997 Amendment: Chapter 189 in introductory clause, in (1), and in (2) substituted "a state prison" for "the state prison or the women's correctional system".

1995 Amendments: Chapter 482 in version effective July 1, 1997, in introductory clause, after "offender", inserted "to whom 46-18-219 does not apply".

Chapter 546 in introductory clause, (1), and (2) substituted "women's correctional system" for "women's correctional center". Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Coordination Instruction — Effective Dates: Section 21, Ch. 482, L. 1995, provided: "(1) If House Bill No. 357 and [this act] [Senate Bill No. 66] are both passed and approved:

(a) [sections 1 through 18] of [this act] are effective July 1, 1997; and

(b) the sentencing commission shall include recommendations for implementing the public policy contained in [sections 1 through 18] of [this act].

(2) [Sections 19, 20, and this section] [enacted as codification and coordination instructions] are effective July 1, 1995.

(3) If House Bill No. 357 is not passed and approved, then this section is void." House Bill No. 357 was approved March 31, 1995, as Ch. 306, L. 1995. Therefore, the amendments to 46-18-225, enacted as sec. 15 of Senate Bill No. 66, are effective July 1, 1997.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 10 throughout section substituted references to the Women's Correctional Center for references to a women's correctional facility; and made minor changes in style.

Effective Date: Section 8, Ch. 794, L. 1991, provided: "[This act] is effective July 1, 1991."

Failure to Specifically Address Statutory Criteria — No Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — Presentation of Facts Addressing Criteria Sufficient for Court to Consider for Sentencing: On appeal, the defendant claimed that his attorney was ineffective because the attorney failed to specifically invoke 46-18-225 at sentencing. The Supreme Court analyzed the defendant's claim under the second prong of the Strickland test and concluded that the defendant could not show that his attorney's failure to formally invoke the statute had prejudiced the defendant. Rather, the statute was implicitly invoked by the attorney's reference to facts in the case that spoke to the criteria set out in 46-18-225. St. v. Zink, 2014 MT 48, 374 Mont. 102, 319 P.3d 596, following St. v. Weisweaver, 2010 MT 198, 357 Mont. 384, 239 P.3d 952, and St. v. Wilson, 2011 MT 277, 362 Mont. 416, 264 P.3d 1146.

Burglary Conviction — Conditions Related to Sexual Offense Affirmed: The defendant appealed the District Court's imposition of conditions on the defendant's suspended sentence for burglary, which included designating the defendant a level 2 sexual offender and requiring that the defendant undergo sexual offender treatment, a psychosexual evaluation, and HIV testing and provided for employment and occupational restrictions, arguing that the conditions should be stricken because the conditions were permissible only when the conviction involved a sexual offense. The Supreme Court reversed the designation as a sexual offender but affirmed the other conditions, concluding that the statutes requiring certain conditions of probation for persons convicted of a sexual offense did restrict those conditions to sexual offenses alone but did not otherwise limit the broad discretion of a sentencing court. St. v. Leyva, 2012 MT 124, 365 Mont. 204, 280 P.3d 252.

No Ineffective Assistance When Attorney's Actions Were Within Broad Range of Reasonable Professional Assistance: Although it recommends consideration of alternatives to imprisonment, 46-18-225 does not preclude sentencing a nonviolent offender to prison. Furthermore, at the sentencing hearing, defense counsel urged the court to not designate the defendant a persistent felony offender and to sentence him under alternative sentencing provisions. Defense counsel also brought 46-18-225 to the attention of the court in the sentencing memorandum. The defendant failed to show that defense counsel's actions were outside the broad range of reasonable professional assistance. St. v. Weisweaver, 2010 MT 198, 357 Mont. 384, 239 P.3d 952.

Prison Sentence Affirmed Given Sentencing Court's Adequate Consideration of Prison Alternatives for Nonviolent Offender: Shults was sentenced to 50 years in prison as a persistent felony offender after being convicted of felony theft and felony escape. Shults appealed on grounds that the sentence should be remanded for further consideration of alternative punishment because Shults was a nonviolent offender. The Supreme Court declined to remand the sentence, noting that the sentencing court provided a 10-page statement explaining its reasons for imposing the prison sentence, including a recitation of Shults's 18-year criminal history — the commission of crimes that resulted in suffering for numerous victims, Shults's numerous unsuccessful opportunities to reform, and the fact that Shults continually used his intelligence and skills to try to subvert the justice system. The sentencing court clearly considered alternatives to prison and explained why incarceration was chosen. The findings were not clearly erroneous, and the court did not abuse its broad discretion in imposing the prison sentence, which the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Shults, 2006 MT 100, 332 M 130, 136 P3d 507 (2006).

Use of Weapon by Person in Group Robbery but No Evidence That Defendant Used Weapon — Sentence as Violent Offender Reversed: Ferguson was one of a group of persons that attempted a robbery. It was uncontested that someone in the group brandished a knife, but testimony was conflicting whether it was Ferguson. Nevertheless, the trial court enhanced Ferguson's sentence because he was part of a crime of violence when a knife was used. However, the mere finding that someone in the group used a knife did not rise to the level of a finding that Ferguson used a knife. Thus, the Supreme Court reversed that part of Ferguson's sentence and remanded for sentencing Ferguson as a nonviolent offender. St. v. Ferguson, 2005 MT 343, 330 M 103, 126 P3d 463 (2005).

No Evidence That Corporal Punishment Caused Mental Health Condition of Victim — Violent Felony Offender Designation Reversed: The sentencing court determined that Mason's excessive use of force in punishing a child with a belt constituted a violent offense and caused the child to develop a serious mental health condition, so Mason was designated a violent felony offender. However, the state produced no evidence that Mason caused the child's mental health condition or that the belt was used in a manner capable of producing death. Because the belt was not a deadly weapon, Mason's conduct did not satisfy the definition of crime of violence in 46-18-104. The violent felony offender designation was reversed. St. v. Mason, 2003 MT 371, 319 M 117, 82 P3d 903 (2003).

Error in Refusing to Classify Defendant as First-Time, Nonviolent Offender Following Conviction for Criminal Endangerment: Hocevar was convicted of criminal endangerment, which required a finding that her conduct created a substantial risk of death or serious bodily injury. The District Court refused Hocevar's request to be treated as a first-time, nonviolent felony offender because she committed a crime of violence. However, the definition of crime of violence in 46-18-104 means a crime in which an offender causes a serious bodily injury or death. Given the various options that were available to the jury, it could not be determined on appeal whether the jury found that Hocevar actually caused a substantial risk of death or merely caused a risk of serious permanent disfigurement or protracted loss or impairment of the function or process of a bodily member or organ. In light of the uncertainty, the District Court committed reversible error in concluding that Hocevar committed an act of violence and in refusing to classify Hocevar as a first-time, nonviolent felony offender. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000).

Misdemeanor Offender Not Entitled to Consideration of Mandatory Sentencing Requirement Applicable to Nonviolent Felony Offenders: Renee was sentenced to incarceration for three misdemeanor violations. On appeal, Renee contended that because the misdemeanors were nonviolent offenses, the District Court erred in not complying with 46-18-201 by considering alternatives to sentencing for Renee's nonviolent offenses. However, the plain language of 46-18-104(3) applies only to defendants who commit a particular kind of felony that is nonviolent. Therefore, a misdemeanor offender is not entitled to have a sentencing court consider the mandatory sentencing requirements of 46-18-201 and this section, which apply only to felony offenders. St. v. Renee, 1999 MT 135, 294 M 527, 983 P2d 893, 56 St. Rep. 545 (1999).

Nonviolent Felony Offenders Not Similarly Situated With Misdemeanor Offenders — No Equal Protection Violation in Different Felony and Misdemeanor Sentencing Schemes: Renee contended that Montana's nonviolent felony offender sentencing statutes violated his equal protection rights to physical liberty as a misdemeanor offender because both kinds of offenders may be subject to imprisonment, thus both felony and misdemeanor offenders are similarly situated classes dealt with unequally under the law. The Supreme Court disagreed. Relying on Tigner v. Tex., 310 US 141, 84 L Ed 1124, 60 S Ct 879 (1940), the court found that the constitution does not require that things that are different in fact or opinion be treated in law as though they were the same. Misdemeanor and felony offenders are not similarly situated because of differences in the quality and duration of punishment, as well as the long-term effects on an individual's liberty interest brought about by a felony conviction as compared to that for a misdemeanor conviction. Renee failed to make the necessary threshold showing that misdemeanor and nonviolent felony offenders are similarly situated, so the equal protection challenge failed. St. v. Renee, 1999 MT 135, 294 M 527, 983 P2d 893, 56 St. Rep. 545 (1999), distinguishing In re S.L.M., 287 M 23, 951 P2d 1365, 54 St. Rep. 1480 (1997).

District Court Required to Consider Alternatives — Alternative Sentences Allowed to Be Imposed: Alden pleaded guilty to several offenses, and at the sentencing hearing, the District Court considered but rejected alternatives to terms of imprisonment. The District Court's rejection was based upon testimony and written documents. Because there was testimony supporting Alden's contention that he should not have been sentenced to prison, Alden appealed the sentence. The Supreme Court held that the standard applicable to the exercise of the District Court's discretion is whether the law was incorrectly applied or whether the District Court's findings are clearly erroneous. The Supreme Court noted that the applicable statutes require the District Court to consider an alternative to imprisonment but only allow and do not require the District Court to impose that alternative. The Supreme Court found that the District Court had considered the alternatives but that the presentence investigation, Alden's admission, the absence of a reason or excuse for the offenses, the risk that Alden would reoffend, the need to protect society, the seriousness of the crime charged, and the ineffective nature of prior treatment all supported the District Court's view that imprisonment was necessary notwithstanding testimony supporting an opposite view. For these reasons, the Supreme Court affirmed the sentence. St. v. Alden, 282 M 45, 934 P2d 210, 54 St. Rep. 234 (1997).

Sexual Abuse — Failure of District Court to Consider Sentencing Alternatives — No Objection — Sentence Not Illegal or Violation of Due Process: Swoboda pleaded guilty to sexual abuse of children, was classified as a nondangerous offender, and was sentenced to 15 years with the Department of Corrections. On appeal, she claimed as error the District Court's failure to consider alternatives to incarceration. The Supreme Court noted that she had not objected at sentencing to the District Court's failure and declined to review the judgment. The Supreme Court noted that in the past, it had made an exception and reviewed such a failure of the District Court when the state conceded the failure of the District Court or when the sentence was illegal. Here, however, the Supreme Court noted that the sentence was not beyond the District Court's jurisdiction. Citing St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep. 310 (1996), the Supreme Court also held that the failure of the District Court was not a manifest miscarriage of justice and would not leave unsettled the question of the fundamental fairness of the trial or the proceedings. St. v. Swoboda, 276 M 479, 918 P2d 296, 53 St. Rep. 478 (1996).

Requirements for Sentencing Nonviolent Felony Offenders Mandatory: Savaria was convicted in District Court on seven counts of felony theft and was sentenced to 10 years in the state prison. Savaria appealed, claiming that the District Court had failed to consider the obligations imposed upon a District Court by 46-18-201 and this section in sentencing a nonviolent felony offender. The Supreme Court held that those considerations are mandatory and that under the circumstances, the District Court failed to properly sentence Savaria. St. v. Savaria, 274 M 197, 906 P2d 215, 52 St. Rep. 1153 (1995).

No Error in Trial Court's Considering Wishes of Victim: Stevens contended that the trial court erred in analyzing the law and sentencing him, a nonviolent offender, to a term of imprisonment. The Supreme Court held that although the statute establishing criteria for sentencing nonviolent offenders does not list the victim's wishes as a factor to be considered, neither does it prohibit consideration of the victim's wishes. Therefore, there had been no error on the trial court's part. St. v. Stevens, 273 M 452, 904 P2d 590, 52 St. Rep. 1078 (1995).

Failure to State Reasons for Not Selecting Alternatives to Imprisonment Must Be Objected to if Sentence Not Illegal: Nelson argued that the lower court failed to consider alternatives to imprisonment for a nonviolent offender as required by statute. The Supreme Court held that the lower court had failed to consider alternatives as required but that the sentence imposed by the lower court was not in excess of the maximum allowed by law and therefore was not illegal. The Supreme Court further held that since the sentence was not illegal, Nelson could not raise the consideration of alternatives on appeal when he had failed to object to the sentence when it was entered. St. v. Nelson, 274 M 11, 906 P2d 663, 52 St. Rep. 1069 (1995), distinguishing St. v. Lenihan, 184 M 338, 602 P2d 997 (1979), and St. v. Hatfield, 256 M 340, 846 P2d 1025 (1993), and following St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307 (1994). Nelson was followed, with respect to the District Court's failure to consider alternatives being raised for the first time on appeal, in St. v. Harper, 284 M 185, 943 P2d 1255, 54 St. Rep. 837 (1997). Nelson was followed, with respect to the exception arising when a defendant alleges that a sentence is illegal or exceeds statutory mandates, even if no objection is made at the time of sentencing, in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999).

Procedure for Considering Alternatives to Prison for Nonviolent Offender: Because the District Court did not consider alternatives to prison as required by 46-18-201, did not take into account the criteria contained in 46-18-201 and this section that require examination of alternatives to prison, and did not, as required by 46-18-201, state its reasons why alternatives to imprisonment were not selected, the prison sentence was vacated and the case remanded. St. v. Pence, 273 M 223, 902 P2d 41, 52 St. Rep. 937 (1995). However, see St. v. Wilson, 2011 MT 277, 362 Mont. 416, 264 P.3d 1146, in which the defendant argued that had the District Court explicitly considered each of the criteria enumerated in 46-18-225, the defendant would have received a more lenient sentence. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the sentence was fully supported by the criteria contained in 46-18-225 and that had the District Court explicitly addressed each criterion, a different sentence would not have resulted.

Failure to Consider Sentencing Alternatives to Incarceration for Nonviolent Felony Offense — Remand: Criminal sentencing alternatives are strictly matters of statute in Montana. Section 46-18-201 requires a trial court to consider alternatives to imprisonment when sentencing a nonviolent felony offender, and this section sets out 10 criteria that the court must consider. The court has no discretion in making these considerations. Therefore, when the court in this case considered pertinent facts concerning defendant's background but did not specifically consider any alternatives to incarceration, failure to consider the sentencing alternatives warranted remand for resentencing. St. v. Lamere, 272 M 355, 900 P2d 926, 52 St. Rep. 828 (1995), following St. v. Stevens, 259 M 114, 854 P2d 336 (1993).

Sentence of Imprisonment of Dangerous Offender — No Need to Consider Alternatives: After a conviction for kidnapping and assault, when the District Court clearly articulated numerous reasons for designating the defendant as a dangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) and its reasons were fully supported by the record, the court's reasons for designating the defendant a dangerous offender are sufficient to rule out alternatives to imprisonment. By its findings, the court, as a practical matter, satisfied the requirements of statutory criteria for sentencing. St. v. Eichenlaub, 272 M 332, 901 P2d 90, 52 St. Rep. 786 (1995).

Failure to State Reasons for Not Selecting Alternatives to Imprisonment as Error: The Supreme Court reversed a lower court's sentence for a nonviolent felony offender because the lower court had failed to state its reasons for not selecting alternatives to imprisonment and failed to indicate that it had examined the statutory sentencing criteria. St. v. Stevens, 259 M 114, 854 P2d 336, 50 St. Rep. 707 (1993).

Amendment effective May 11, 2007.

Severability: Section 29, Ch. 483, L. 2007, was a severability clause.

1999 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 52 throughout section substituted references to sentencing judge for references to court and substituted references to offender for references to defendant and person; in (1)(a) at beginning inserted exception clause; in (1)(b) after “provided in” substituted “the following sections” for “45-5-103, 45-5-202(3), 45-5-302(2), 45-5-303(2), 45-5-401(2), 45-5-502(3), 45-5-503(2) and (3), 45-9-101(2), (3), and (5)(d), 45-9-102(4), 45-9-103(2), and 45-9-109”; inserted (1)(b)(i) through (1)(b)(xi) listing various crimes; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Chapter 395 in (1) near beginning of first sentence and in (2) inserted “or nolo contendere”. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Chapter 432 inserted (1)(b)(iii) referring to 45-5-213. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

A composite section was prepared by the code commissioner by adding “assault with a weapon” to the reference to 45-5-213 inserted by Ch. 432 to reflect the changes made by Ch. 52, pursuant to sec. 14, Ch. 52, L. 1999.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 52, L. 1999, provided: “WHEREAS, the Correctional Standards and Oversight Committee was authorized by the Fifty-Fifth Legislature to conduct a study of correctional standards and to act as a correctional oversight committee; and

WHEREAS, the Committee contracted for a review of Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, sentencing statutes; and

WHEREAS, the Committee found that the statutes providing for sentencing and judgment regarding criminal procedures are confusing and rife with cross-references, internal references, and inconsistent terminology that make the statutes difficult to read and understand; and

WHEREAS, the Committee recommended that a bill be drafted to amend Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, to make nonsubstantive changes to clarify and streamline the statutes to eliminate contradictions, confusion, inconsistent terminology, and excessive internal references.

THEREFORE, the Legislature of the State of Montana finds it appropriate to so amend certain sentencing-related statutes.”

1991 Amendments: Chapter 42 in (1) changed subsection reference to 45-9-102.

Chapter 519 near end of (1) inserted “45-9-109”; and made minor changes in style.

1989 Amendment: In (1) inserted reference to 45-9-101(5)(d). Amendment effective April 20, 1989.

1987 Amendments: Chapter 370 in (1), near beginning of second sentence, changed “45-5-202(2)” to “45-5-202(3)”.

Chapter 610 in second sentence of (1) substituted reference to 45-5-103 for reference to 45-5-103(2).

1981 Amendment: Section 7, Ch. 198, L. 1981, provided in part:

“(2) There is added to those sections listed in subsection (1) of section 1 [46-18-231], following the language in those sections specifying the term of imprisonment for which an offender may be imprisoned, the words “and may be fined not more than $50,000” or other similar language allowing the court to fine the offender a maximum of $50,000 in addition to a term of imprisonment. The code commissioner shall change the listed sections in accordance with this section and may make minor incidental adjustments consistent with this section as may be necessary to reflect the intent of this section without changing the meaning of the listed sections as amended by this section.

(3) There is added to those sections listed in subsection (4) of this section, following any language in those sections specifying the term of imprisonment for which an offender may be imprisoned but without specifying a fine that may be ordered to be paid, the words “or shall be punished by a fine of not more than $50,000 or by both such fine and imprisonment”, or other similar language allowing the court to fine the offender a maximum of $50,000 in lieu of imprisonment or to punish the offender by both a fine and imprisonment. The code commissioner shall change the listed sections in accordance with this section and may make minor incidental adjustments consistent with this section as may be necessary to reflect the intent of this section without changing the meaning of the listed sections as amended by this section.

(4) 13-27-205, 13-27-206, 19-11-207 [renumbered 19-18-207], 20-9-435, 23-5-106 [now repealed], 30-13-142, 32-1-236, 32-1-473, 32-1-505, 45-5-104, 45-5-204, 45-5-105, 45-5-201, 45-5-203, 45-5-204, 45-5-304, 45-5-505, 45-5-603, 45-5-613, 45-5-621, 45-6-101 through 45-6-103, 45-6-204, 45-6-301, 45-6-316, 45-6-317, 45-6-325, 45-6-327, 45-7-101, 45-7-102, 45-7-201, 45-7-206 through 45-7-208, 45-8-106, 45-8-215, 45-8-318, 45-8-334, 45-8-335, 45-9-101(4), 45-9-102(4), 45-9-103(3), 45-9-107, 46-18-213, 46-18-502, 46-31-204, 50-38-107, 61-3-604, 81-5-102, and 81-9-118.”

Interim Study Committee Bill: Chapter 198, L. 1981 (SB 14), was introduced at the request of the interim Committee on Corrections Policy and Facility Needs. See committee report, Legislative Council, 1980.

Case Notes

Imposition of Mandatory Minimum Fine for DUI Per Se Not Exercise of Discretion — COVID-19 Stimulus Funds Are Protected Payment, But Municipal Court Did Not Require Defendant to Use Stimulus Funds to Pay Required Fine — No Error by Municipal Court. Whitefish v. Curran, 2023 MT 118, 412 Mont. 499, 531 P.3d 547.

Sentencing Courts Must Impose Mandatory Minimum Punishments But Retain Discretion Regarding How Defendants May Satisfy Punishment After Imposed — Failure of Municipal Court to Consider Alternate Method for Indigent Defendant to Satisfy Minimum Fine for DUI Per Se Was Abuse of Discretion. Whitefish v. Curran, 2023 MT 118, 412 Mont. 499, 531 P.3d 547.

Defendant’s Objection to Fine Raised for First Time on Appeal Not Considered — Trial Court’s Failure to Abide by Statutory Sentencing Requirements Not Reversible Error if Sentence Would Have Been Legal — Not Reviewable on Appeal Under Lenihan Rule: Kotwicki argued on appeal that the $25,000 fine imposed by the trial court was illegal because the trial court did not abide by the statutory requirements of this section to make a determination of the defendant’s ability to pay the fine. The Supreme Court held that the defendant was not entitled to raise the issue of an illegal sentence for the first time on appeal because in the case before it, the trial court, had it reviewed the statutory requirements, could have legally imposed the fine and therefore the trial court’s sentence was not illegal. The Supreme Court further held that the Lenihan rule of being able to raise, for the first time on appeal, the issue of an illegal sentence depends on whether the defendant raises a plausible allegation that the sentence is illegal and held that although Kotwicki alleged an illegal sentence, he failed to present a colorable claim that his sentence fell outside statutory parameters and warranted review. St. v. Kotwicki, 2007 MT 17, 335 M 344, 151 P3d 892 (2007), clarifying St. v. Lenihan, 184 M 338, 602 P2d 997 (1979), and St. v. McLeod, 2002 MT 348, 313 M 358, 61 P3d 126 (2002), and followed in St. v. Park, 2008 MT 429, 347 M 462, 198 P3d 321 (2008), St. v. Jones, 2008 MT 440, 347 M 512, 199 P3d 216 (2008), St. v. MacDonald, 2013 MT 105, 370 Mont. 1, 299 P3d 839, and St. v. Phillips, 2013 MT 317, 372 Mont. 317, 312 P3d 445.

Criminal Fines Distinct From Other Court-Imposed Compensatory Financial Obligations — Fisher Overruled: The plain meaning of “fine” in 46-18-403 does not encompass fees, costs, charges, or other court-imposed financial obligations. Criminal fines are punitive in nature and are distinct from other court-imposed financial obligations associated with a criminal proceeding that are compensatory in nature, such as an assessment of fees for probationary supervision or a charge to defray a local government’s costs in administering the criminal justice system. Voerding v. St., 2006 MT 125, 332 M 262, 136 P3d 502 (2006), overruling St. v. Fisher, 2003 MT 33, 314 M 222, 65 P3d 223 (2003), to the extent that Fisher suggests that the term “fine” in 46-18-403(2) encompasses other types of court-imposed financial obligations, such as fees, charges, and costs. See also St. v. VanWinkle, 2008 MT 208, 344 M 175, 186 P3d 1258 (2008).

Imposition of Mandatory Statutory Fine Without Specifying Payment Schedule or Consideration of Ability to Pay Not Erroneous: Mingus was convicted of DUI and fined the statutory minimum $1,000, as required in 61-8-731 (now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10). The fine was statutorily mandated and clearly within statutory parameters. Mingus asserted error because the sentencing court did not inquire into his ability to pay, as required in this section, or establish a payment schedule, as allowed in 46-18-234. The Supreme Court disagreed. Ability to pay and consideration of a payment schedule apply only to discretionary fines, not statutorily mandated fines. When a fine is mandated, the sentencing court has no discretion whether to impose the fine, irrespective of defendant’s ability to pay, nor is a sentencing court required to establish a payment schedule or specify when a mandatory fine must be paid under 61-8-731. St. v. Mingus, 2004 MT 24, 319 M 349, 84 P3d 658 (2004).

Failure of Sentencing Court to Consider Defendant’s Financial Resources and Ability to Pay Fine — Reversible Error: This section requires that the sentencing judge, prior to sentencing, consider whether a defendant will be able to pay a fine, taking into account the defendant’s financial resources and the nature of the burden that payment of the fine would impose. McLeod contended that the sentencing court failed to consider whether payment of a $1,000 fine for a drug conviction would conflict with McLeod’s ability to pay child support. The Supreme Court examined the record and agreed that the sentencing judge did not consider McLeod’s financial resources and the nature of the burden that payment of the fine would impose. The imposition of the fine was reversed for a further determination of whether McLeod had the ability to pay the fine. St. v. McLeod, 2002 MT 348, 313 M 358, 61 P3d 126 (2002). See also St. v. Moore, 2012 MT 95, 365 Mont. 13, 277 P3d 1212. However, see St. v. Gable, 2015 MT 200, 380 Mont. 101, 354 P3d 566.

Conditioning Suspended Portion of Incarceration Sentence Upon Entering Into Plan to Pay Fine in Installments: The court conditioned suspension of half the incarceration term upon defendant’s entering into a plan for payment of a fine in installments. The court did not impose the fine as a condition on the suspended portion of the incarceration term. Thus, the Sentence Review Board’s elimination of the suspended portion of the incarceration term did not eliminate the obligation to pay the fine. St. v. George, 2002 MT 300, 313 M 11, 59 P3d 1151 (2002).

Fine of Vacation Pay and Sick Leave Pay Absent Showing of Ability to Pay — Remand: The District Court fined defendant his vacation pay and sick leave pay as part of his sentence. Prior to entry of judgment but after the court made known its intention to levy the fine, defendant’s attorney notified the court that it held a prior lien on defendant’s vacation pay and sick leave pay. Because it was not clear from the record that defendant would be able to pay the fine levied by the court, the Supreme Court remanded for further proceedings on that part of the order that levied the fine, in accordance with this section. St. v. Sullivan, 266 M 313, 880 P2d 829, 51 St. Rep. 827 (1994).

Amendment effective July 1, 2009.

Case Notes

Order on Fees Reversed — District Court Misapprehended Effect of Evidence When Conducting Ability-to-Pay Analysis — Undisputed Evidence That Defendant Could Not Pay — Illegal to Impose Certain Fees in Sentencing Conditions. St. v. Dowd, 2023 MT 170, 413 Mont. 245, 535 P.3d 645.

District Court Erred When Finding Defendant Unable to Pay Jury Trial Costs But Assessing $9,428 in Pretrial Supervision Costs — Analysis of Defendant's Ability to Pay Applicable to Any Costs. St. v. Hardin, 2023 MT 132, 413 Mont. 26, 532 P.3d 466.

Court's Failure to Consider Defendant's Ability to Pay Jury Costs and Other Fees — Financial Assessments Stricken. St. v. Oliver, 2022 MT 104, 408 Mont. 519, 510 P.3d 1218.

Defendant's Explanation of Inability to Pay in Reference to Public Defender Fee Sufficient to Object to Statutory Surcharge: After the defendant indicated he was disabled, the District Court waived an $800 public defender fee but later imposed a $500 surcharge fee under 46-18-236. However, when the defendant notified the court of his inability to pay and articulated his reason for objecting to the costs, he invoked the protection of 46-18-232. Defendants do not need to repeat their objections to each individual, potentially unaffordable cost and may invoke their right under statutes such as 46-18-232 by making a general objection regarding the defendant's inability to pay. St. v. Steger, 2021 MT 321, 406 Mont. 536, 501 P.3d 394.

Convictions for False Statements Admissible for Truthfulness — Finding Regarding Ability to Pay Required to Impose Court Costs: The defendant appealed his conviction on evidentiary grounds and appealed the imposition of court costs. The Supreme Court affirmed that prior convictions for false statements to law enforcement may be admitted for the limited purpose of demonstrating the defendant's lack of credibility. The Supreme Court reversed the imposition of court costs, ruling that a District Court cannot impose court costs without a finding regarding the defendant's ability to pay, and remanded for that purpose. St. v. Frey, 2018 MT 238, 393 Mont. 59, 427 P.3d 86. See also St. v. Yeaton, 2021 MT 312, 406 Mont. 465, 500 P.3d. 583.

Prosecution Surcharge — Error — Remanded: Because the state did not present any evidence of additional recoupable costs, this section authorizes a District Court to impose only one fee of $100 under each separate felony criminal cause matter. Since the District Court erroneously imposed a prosecutor surcharge of $500, the Supreme Court remanded the matter. St. v. Barrows, 2018 MT 204, 392 Mont. 358, 424 P.3d 612.

Order to Pay Public Defender Costs — Meticulous and Scrupulous Findings of Ability to Pay — No Chilling of Constitutional Rights to Jury Trial: The defendant was convicted of murdering her husband and was ordered to pay the costs of her court-appointed public defender. On appeal, the defendant claimed that the District Court had failed to ascertain her ability to pay and to consider her forfeiture of her husband's estate. She also claimed that the award of costs had a chilling effect on her right to a jury trial. The Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed, noting that the District Court had met its burden by “scrupulously and meticulously” considering the defendant's current assets and her future ability to pay. Although she was not entitled to the victim's estate, the District Court correctly presumed that the defendant still owned an undivided interest in the marital property. St. v. Gable, 2015 MT 200, 380 Mont. 101, 354 P.3d 566.

Conditions Concerning Fines Mentioned in Oral Pronouncement but Missing in Written Sentence — Oral Pronouncement Controls: The District Court imposed an oral sentence that suspended certain fees and costs given the defendant's age, the sentence length, and the defendant's ability to work. However, the written sentence imposed the fines but failed to specify these conditions. The Supreme Court noted that the trial court had the power to impose certain conditions on fines and surcharges, and the costs were imposed and suspended pending the fulfillment of a specific obligation in the oral pronouncement of sentence. The Supreme Court held that the oral pronouncement concerning the conditions controlled. St. v. Hammer, 2013 MT 203, 371 Mont. 121, 305 P.3d 843, following St. v. Goff, 2011 MT 6, 359 Mont. 107, 247 P.3d 715. See also St. v. Barrows, 2018 MT 204, 392 Mont. 358, 424 P.3d 612.

Imposition of Mandatory Statutory Fine Without Specifying Payment Schedule or Consideration of Ability to Pay Not Erroneous: Mingus was convicted of DUI and fined the statutory minimum $1,000, as required in 61-8-731 (now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10). The fine was statutorily mandated and clearly within statutory parameters. Mingus asserted error because the sentencing court did not inquire into his ability to pay, as required in 46-18-231, or establish a payment schedule, as allowed in 46-18-234. The Supreme Court disagreed. Ability to pay and consideration of a payment schedule apply only to discretionary fines, not statutorily mandated fines. When a fine is mandated, the sentencing court has no discretion whether to impose the fine, irrespective of defendant's ability to pay, nor is a sentencing court required to establish a payment schedule or specify when a mandatory fine must be paid under 61-8-731. St. v. Mingus, 2004 MT 24, 319 M 349, 84 P3d 658 (2004).

Improper Imposition of District Court Costs Based on Local Court Rule: Blackwell pleaded guilty to DUI pursuant to a plea agreement on the day of trial. The District Court assessed Blackwell one-half of the jury costs, including 1 day of salary of the District Court Clerk, pursuant to the court's local rule rather than state sentencing statutes. Blackwell appealed the assessment, and the Supreme Court reversed. Although costs of jury service could have been imposed under this section, the statute does not authorize imposition of any portion of a Clerk's salary as costs. The District Court erred in relying on its local rule instead of applying this section, so the order assessing costs was vacated. St. v. Blackwell, 2001 MT 198, 306 M 267, 32 P3d 771 (2001). See also Missoula v. Franklin, 2018 MT 218, 392 Mont. 440, 425 P.3d 1285, striking a $25 surcharge assessed pursuant to a city ordinance.

Conditions Imposed in Written Judgment and Sentence Different From Those Imposed in Oral Sentence — Lane, Waters, and Simpson Reviewed — Test to Determine Which New Conditions Lawful or Unlawful — Payment of Restitution and Costs: Johnson was sentenced orally for writing bad checks and later contended that four of the conditions imposed in the written judgment and sentence by the District Court were unlawful under St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), because they were not announced orally when she was sentenced in open court. The Supreme Court reviewed its decisions in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142 (1999), and St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361 (1999), and reasoned that a written sentence would be held unlawful only if it substantively increased the defendant's loss of liberty or the defendant's sacrifice of property. Under this test, the Supreme Court held that two of the four penalties not mentioned by the District Court in its oral pronouncement of Johnson's sentence were unlawful, those being the restitution ordered to the Missoula County jail of money expended for Johnson's medical care and the requirement that Johnson pay for the costs of her prosecution in District Court. The Supreme Court held that the other two parts of the written sentence, the requirement that Johnson make restitution from money earned in prison and the imposition of certain "civil" restrictions as conditions of Johnson's suspended sentence, such as the requirement that Johnson stay out of gambling casinos, were lawfully imposed because they did not increase the amount of money that Johnson was ordered to pay or increase Johnson's deprivation of liberty in addition to those penalties imposed orally. The requirement for payment from prison earnings only specified where the money was to come from, and the "civil" restrictions were largely mentioned by the District Court at Johnson's sentencing hearing. St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000), followed in St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

Cost of Jury Selection and Prosecution Improperly Charged to Indigent Defendant: It was determined that Winterrowd was indigent, so counsel was appointed for him from the public defender's office. After being informed that Winterrowd had received a social security settlement and would no longer be considered indigent, the public defender moved to withdraw. Trial was continued to allow Winterrowd to obtain counsel. About 1 week before the scheduled hearing, Winterrowd moved for another continuance because the settlement had not arrived and he had not yet retained counsel. The state objected, arguing that Winterrowd had not demonstrated due diligence and that his claim that he would receive a settlement was unsupported by documentation. The trial court did not rule on the continuance motion. At the start of trial, Winterrowd again moved for a continuance, but the motion was denied. The trial proceeded through voir dire, with Winterrowd acting pro se. Following a break, the court granted the motion to continue and excused the jurors but ordered Winterrowd to pay the costs incurred in summoning the jurors and in prosecuting him. After granting the public defender's motion to withdraw, it was error for the court to charge Winterrowd with the costs when he was unable to obtain counsel. St. v. Winterrowd, 1998 MT 74, 288 M 208, 957 P2d 522, 55 St. Rep. 307 (1998).

Payment of Justice's Court Cost Imposed as Judgment of District Court Held Improper — Smith Reaffirmed: Morales was charged with assaulting a sports official, in violation of 45-5-211, after striking a basketball referee. Upon his conviction in Justice's Court, Morales appealed to District Court. Upon his conviction, the District Court ordered Morales to pay the costs of the trial in Justice's Court. The Supreme Court reaffirmed its holding in Billings v. Smith, 281 M 133, 932 P2d 1058 (1997), and held that a trial de novo in District Court has the effect of erasing any debt for costs in Justice's Court incurred before the appeal to District Court. St. v. Morales, 284 M 238, 943 P2d 1286, 54 St. Rep. 862 (1997), followed in St. v. Bustle, 2010 MT 68, 355 Mont. 487, 228 P.3d 1150.

Justice's Court Costs May Not Be Imposed as Part of District Court Sentence: Smith appealed his conviction in Justice's Court to District Court. The District Court found Smith guilty and as part of the sentence imposed the costs incurred in the Justice's Court proceedings. The Supreme Court held that an appeal to a District Court from a Justice's Court was a trial de novo and that only the costs of the District Court proceedings could be imposed as part of the sentence. Billings v. Smith, 281 M 133, 932 P2d 1058, 54 St. Rep. 96 (1997).

Expenses of Investigation Not Recoverable as Costs — Exception for Money Paid by Undercover Agents: Defendants Richard and David Fertterer were convicted of felony criminal mischief for illegally killing game. They contended on appeal that they could not be required to pay the costs of the investigation incurred by the state prior to the filing of the information. Citing Masanovich v. School District No. 1, 178 M 138, 582 P2d 1234 (1978), and St. v. Haynes, 633 P2d 38 (Oreg. App. 1981), the Supreme Court held that the costs of investigation were not recoverable because there was no statutory authority for the charge, as there is for other costs. However, the court made an exception, recognized in another Oregon case, for money paid directly to defendants by undercover agents. In this case, the state was allowed to recover guide service fees and other expenses paid to the Fertterers. St. v. Fertterer, 255 M 73, 841 P2d 467, 49 St. Rep. 846 (1992).

Jury Costs, Including Venue Change, Properly Chargeable — Insufficient Record: Defendants Richard and David Fertterer were convicted of felony criminal mischief for illegally killing game. They contended on appeal that they could not be required to pay the costs of the jury trial, especially those costs involving a change of venue that Fertterers claimed was made necessary by extensive pretrial publicity caused by the state. The Supreme Court held that there was no factual record to support Fertterers' charges and that no motion had been made by them at trial on the matter and no hearing requested. The Supreme Court concluded that the plain language of the statute authorized the charging of the costs. St. v. Fertterer, 255 M 73, 841 P2d 467, 49 St. Rep. 846 (1992).

Imposition of Trial Costs Not Unconstitutional: Defendant contended that this section and 46-18-233 are unconstitutional because they leave it to the discretion of the judge whether to impose costs of prosecution, thus permitting discrimination in violation of equal protection of the law. In striking down defendant's argument, the Supreme Court held that it is within the trial court's discretion to impose prosecution, jury, and counsel costs on defendant. St. v. Pease, 227 M 424, 740 P2d 659, 44 St. Rep. 1203 (1987).

Constitutionality: Defendant was convicted of deliberate homicide and was assessed costs and expenses as part of his sentence. Defendant contended that 46-18-232 was unconstitutional since it enhanced punishment in retribution for a defendant's exercise of a fundamental constitutional right. Statutes that allow a discretionary imposition of costs have been upheld against due process arguments. The statute does no more than deprive a financially able defendant of available funds that, in fairness, should be remitted to the public coffers. St. v. Weinberger, 204 M 278, 665 P2d 202, 40 St. Rep. 844 (1983).

Imposition of Trial Costs Not Unconstitutional: Defendant contended that 46-18-232 and this section are unconstitutional because they leave it to the discretion of the judge whether to impose costs of prosecution, thus permitting discrimination in violation of equal protection of the law. 46-18-234. When payment of fine or costs due.Case Notes

Illegal Sentencing — No Active Acquiescence to Sentencing Conditions Lacking Statutory Authority: The Municipal Court imposed a suspended jail sentence and fines totaling over $400. When the defendant indicated that he could not pay the fine, the Municipal Court offered an installment plan subject to a $10 contract fee, a 10% annual interest rate, and a condition that no prepayments would be allowed unless authorized. On review, the Supreme Court found no statutory authority for the Municipal Court to impose the $10 contract fee, the interest rate, or the bar on prepayment. Overruling St. v. Micklon, 2003 MT 45, 314 Mont. 291, 65 P.3d 559, the Supreme Court held that a defendant cannot “actively acquiesce” or “participate” in the imposition of a sentencing condition that is not statutorily authorized and remanded to the Municipal Court with instructions to strike the unauthorized portions of the sentence. Kalispell v. Salsgiver, 2019 MT 126, 396 Mont. 57, 443 P.3d 504.

Imposition of Mandatory Statutory Fine Without Specifying Payment Schedule or Consideration of Ability to Pay Not Erroneous: Mingus was convicted of DUI and fined the statutory minimum $1,000, as required in 61-8-731 (now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10). The fine was statutorily mandated and clearly within statutory parameters. Mingus asserted error because the sentencing court did not inquire into his ability to pay, as required in 46-18-231, or establish a payment schedule, as allowed in this section. The Supreme Court disagreed. Ability to pay and consideration of a payment schedule apply only to discretionary fines, not statutorily mandated fines. When a fine is mandated, the sentencing court has no discretion whether to impose the fine, irrespective of defendant’s ability to pay, nor is a sentencing court required to establish a payment schedule or specify when a mandatory fine must be paid under 61-8-731. St. v. Mingus, 2004 MT 24, 319 M 349, 84 P.3d 658 (2004).

Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Chapter 546 in (1)(c) substituted “department of public health and human services” for “department of family services”; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995. The Ch. 546 amendment in (1)(c) was rendered void by the Ch. 509 amendment.

Chapter 1, Sp. L. 1985, amended Ch. 680, L. 1985, by substituting “department of commerce” for “supreme court administrator” in (1).

1983 Amendment: Inserted exception at end of section relating to fines imposed for violating Title 45, chapter 9.

Case Notes

Order That Defendant Pay “Assessments” to Community Entities as Part of Sentence for Sexual Assault Illegal: As part of Krum’s sentence for two counts of felony sexual assault, the District Court ordered Krum to pay a $5,000 assessment to the Park County Court Automation Fund, $2,500 to the Tri-County Network for Domestic Violence, and $2,500 to the Park County Big Brothers and Sisters in order to give back to society and to those who assist victims of these types of crimes. Krum appealed the assessments, and the Supreme Court reversed. Although the sentencing court had authority to fine Krum up to $50,000 for each conviction, the court did not include a fine per se in Krum’s sentence, but instead ordered the payment of assessments to the community entities. However, this section provides that all fines and costs collected from a criminal defendant be paid to the Department of Revenue for deposit in the general fund, and a District Court may not redirect money collected from a defendant simply by labeling the money as an assessment instead of a fine. The state argued that the assessments were authorized as a condition of sentencing pursuant to 46-18-202 because the assessments were reasonably related to the underlying crimes, but the Supreme Court held that 46-18-202 does not provide the necessary authority for imposing assessments in the first place. The assessments were not limitations on Krum’s conduct and could not be considered restitution because the money was not payable to the victims. Thus, the assessment portion of the sentence was unauthorized and illegal. The remainder of the sentence was affirmed, but the case was remanded with instructions to strike the illegal assessments from the sentence. St. v. Krum, 2007 MT 229, 339 M 154, 168 P3d 658 (2007), followed in St. v. Stephenson, 2008 MT 64, 342 M 60, 179 P3d 502 (2008), to the extent that a fine or surcharge payable to the community service program that is imposed without statutory authority is illegal. Stephenson was followed in St. v. VanWinkle, 2008 MT 208, 344 M 175, 186 P3d 1258 (2008).

Amendment effective July 1, 1999.

(Temporary version) Chapter 411 in second sentence in (6)(b) after “salaries of its” inserted “county attorney and”; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1999, and terminates July 1, 2001.

A county may retain up to 10% of the funds remitted to the state treasurer to cover only the costs of administering this section”; and inserted (6)(b) concerning charges collected under subsection (1) by District or Justices’ Courts.

Order on Fees Reversed — District Court Misapprehended Effect of Evidence When Conducting Ability-to-Pay Analysis — Undisputed Evidence That Defendant Could Not Pay — Illegal to Impose Certain Fees in Sentencing Conditions. St. v. Dowd, 2023 MT 170, 413 Mont. 245, 535 P.3d 645.

District Court’s Imposition of $20 Charge for Misdemeanor in Written Order Incorrect — Remanded to Amend Charge to $15 to Comply With Statute. St. v. Pehringer, 2023 MT 146, 413 Mont. 122, 533 P.3d 657.

Court’s Failure to Consider Defendant’s Ability to Pay Jury Costs and Other Fees — Financial Assessments Stricken. St. v. Oliver, 2022 MT 104, 408 Mont. 519, 510 P.3d 1218.

Defendant’s Explanation of Inability to Pay in Reference to Public Defender Fee Sufficient to Object to Statutory Surcharge: After the defendant indicated he was disabled, the District Court waived an $800 public defender fee but later imposed a $500 surcharge fee under 46-18-236. However, when the defendant notified the court of his inability to pay and articulated his reason for objecting to the costs, he invoked the protection of 46-18-232. Defendants do not need to repeat their objections to each individual, potentially unaffordable cost and may invoke their right under statutes such as 46-18-232 by making a general objection regarding the defendant's inability to pay. St. v. Steger, 2021 MT 321, 406 Mont. 536, 501 P.3d 394.

Imposition of Surcharge Without Consideration of Ability to Pay Erroneous: The defendant appealed the District Court's imposition of a $500 surcharge on his fine, arguing that it was erroneous given that he had no assets and his only income was monthly Social Security disability payments. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded the imposition of the fine, agreeing with the defendant that the District Court should have conducted an inquiry into his ability to pay the surcharge. St. v. Ingram, 2020 MT 327, 402 Mont. 374, 478 P.3d 799.

Illegal Sentencing — No Active Acquiescence to Sentencing Conditions Lacking Statutory Authority: The Municipal Court imposed a suspended jail sentence and fines totaling over $400. When the defendant indicated that he could not pay the fine, the Municipal Court offered an installment plan subject to a $10 contract fee, a 10% annual interest rate, and a condition that no prepayments would be allowed unless authorized. On review, the Supreme Court found no statutory authority for the Municipal Court to impose the $10 contract fee, the interest rate, or the bar on prepayment. Overruling St. v. Micklon, 2003 MT 45, 314 Mont. 291, 65 P.3d 559, the Supreme Court held that a defendant cannot "actively acquiesce" or "participate" in the imposition of a sentencing condition that is not statutorily authorized and remanded to the Municipal Court with instructions to strike the unauthorized portions of the sentence. Kalispell v. Salsgiver, 2019 MT 126, 396 Mont. 57, 443 P.3d 504.

Imposition of Statutory Surcharges and Court Technology Fee Incorrect: A District Court may not increase a defendant's orally imposed criminal sentence in the subsequent written judgment. Because the court failed to impose the $15 misdemeanor surcharge in its oral pronouncement of sentence, the surcharge was invalid. Further, the court information technology fee may be assigned only one time per case, not one time for each charge. St. v. Reynolds, 2017 MT 317, 390 Mont. 58, 408 P.3d 503.

No Error in Allowing Parole Officer to Set Restitution Schedule — Refusal to Waive Administrative Fees Proper: Denham contended that it was error for the sentencing court to delegate the scheduling of monthly restitution payments to a parole officer because the version of 46-18-244 in effect at the time of the crime did not provide for that delegation of authority. The Supreme Court held that the amendments to the statute were purely procedural and did not constitute retroactive legislation, impair Denham's rights, or impose additional duties on Denham, so allowing the parole officer to set the restitution schedule was not error. Denham also appealed the $60,099 restitution and the 10% administrative fee and minimal surcharges. However, Denham assured the court at sentencing of his ability to pay the restitution amount, so it was reasonable to assume that he also had the ability to pay the administrative fee and surcharges. The sentencing court was affirmed. St. v. Denham, 2005 MT 26, 326 M 24, 107 P3d 1263 (2005).

Conviction Charge as Penalty — Distribution: The charge imposed on criminal defendants by this section is a penalty or a forfeiture. 42 A.G. Op. 63 (1988).

Collection of Charge Upon Forfeiture of Bail Bond: In order to collect the additional charge required by 46-18-236 in the event the offender posts bail and chooses not to appear, a court may exercise its power under 46-9-302 and increase the bail schedule for minor offenses in a like amount. 41 A.G. Op. 59 (1986).

2003 Amendment: Chapter 272 throughout section substituted references to person for references to prisoner; in (1) near middle of introductory clause after "corrections" inserted "or a person supervised by the department"; and in (2) near middle of first sentence after "report to the" substituted "office of victims services in the department of justice" for "board of crime control". Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

Order for Restitution Upon Imposition of Deferred or Suspended Sentence — 1999 Amendments to Sentencing Statute Clarified: Heath was convicted of theft and possession of burglary tools and sentenced to 10 years in prison with 2 years suspended upon conditions, including payment of restitution. Heath appealed on grounds that the 1999 amendments to 46-18-201 no longer allowed a sentencing court to impose restitution as a condition of a suspended or deferred sentence. Upon amendment in 1999, an internal reference in 46-18-201(5) was not changed to reflect the renumbering of the other subsections, which resulted in an ambiguity in the plain language of the 46-18-201, potentially rendered 46-18-251(2) and this section meaningless, created uncertain directives for payment of restitution for all victims in 46-18-241(1) and 46-18-244(2), and created a potentially absurd application of 46-18-201(1). Because of the potentially absurd consequences of the 1999 amendment, the Supreme Court looked beyond the words of the statute and inquired whether the Legislature intended to make any change in the substance and effect of 46-18-201. The court concluded that the 1999 amendment was a simple codification error that resulted in a cross-reference problem that was completely inconsistent with legislative intent to authorize sentencing courts to impose restitution when necessary for rehabilitation or for the protection of the victim or society if there is an appropriate correlation to the offense committed. Heath's argument failed, and the imposition of restitution as a condition of Heath's suspended sentence was affirmed. (Note: The erroneous internal reference in 46-18-201(5) was deleted in 2003.) St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004), followed in *St. v. Case Notes

Protected Benefit Defendant’s Sole Source of Income — Restitution Order Did Not Require Benefit as Source of Payment: The District Court ordered the defendant to pay restitution for the costs of his extradition from Georgia even though he had testified that his only source of income was protected disability benefits. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that imposing restitution on a defendant whose only income is a protected benefit is not illegal if the order does not mandate a protected benefit as the source of payment. The Supreme Court also noted that the defendant could still petition the District Court to waive or modify the amount of restitution based on his financial circumstances. St. v. Corriher, 2021 MT 275, 406 Mont. 120, 497 P.3d 579.

Drug Charges — Restitution for Entire Cost of Remediation of Apartment Reversed — Inadequate Evidence Criminal Conduct Caused Damage: The defendant pleaded guilty to drug-related offenses after police officers found numerous drugs and drug paraphernalia not only in his room but throughout the apartment the defendant shared with three other people. The District Court ordered the defendant to pay restitution in an amount equal to the entire cost of remediating the apartment due to methamphetamine contamination. The defendant appealed, arguing that the state had not proven that he alone had caused the entirety of the damage to the apartment. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that there was insufficient evidence of a causal connection between the criminal conduct to which the defendant had pleaded guilty and the apartment renovation expenses. St. v. Cole, 2020 MT 259, 401 Mont. 502, 474 P.3d 323.

Responsibility for Restitution Limited — District Court’s Broader Order Erroneous: A group of people repeatedly went to an absent couple’s property, entered various buildings on their property, and stole from and damaged that property. A man pleaded guilty to entering the couple’s guest house and stealing collectible dolls. He denied involvement in the other burglaries and thefts, and evidence did not demonstrate his entering other buildings on the property. The District Court held the man jointly and severally responsible for the couple’s pecuniary losses. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, holding that the District Court erroneously ordered the man to pay restitution for pecuniary losses sustained as a result of the various burglaries, and remanded for a new determination of restitution. The Supreme Court explained that an offender is responsible only for pecuniary victim losses the offender has agreed to pay or that are directly or indirectly caused by an offense the offender committed or is criminally accountable for. St. v. Pierre, 2020 MT 160, 400 Mont. 283, 466 P.3d 494.

Wages as Pecuniary Damages: An employee with a company laptop stopped showing up for work, did not return the laptop, and did not give work conducted on the laptop to the company. The District Court adjudged the employee guilty of embezzlement and ordered restitution payments, including payments for wages paid to other employees to recreate his work, reimbursement of wages paid to him, and the billable value of hours others spent cooperating with law enforcement. The employee appealed that some of these things were not pecuniary damages authorized by 46-18-243. The Supreme Court affirmed in part and reversed in part, noting that as a general rule wages paid to a defendant are not recoverable as restitution and that the wage payments to persons cooperating with law enforcement can be pecuniary damages but their billable hours cannot. St. v. Lowry, 2019 MT 191, 397 Mont. 11, 446 P.3d 1148.

Reliance on Document Not Admitted — Court Required to Balance Privacy Interests Against Disclosure: After the defendant's conviction for negligent endangerment, a hearing was held on the amount of restitution to be awarded to the Department of Justice's crime victims compensation program, which had provided counseling services to the defendant's victim. The Municipal Court denied the defendant's request to examine the form based on the victim's right of privacy in the information that the form contained and subsequently awarded restitution to the program. Because the defendant had a right to receive and rebut the treatment plan form because it was relied on by witnesses to establish how much of the counseling costs were related to the defendant's offense and because the victim may have had a protectable expectation of privacy regarding some of the contents, the Municipal Court erred by not determining the contents of the document and balancing the competing interests of privacy and disclosure. St. v. McClelland, 2015 MT 281, 381 Mont. 164, 357 P.3d 906.

Amount of Restitution Properly Based on Information in Life Care Plan: After pleading guilty to negligent vehicular assault, the defendant was ordered by the District Court to pay more than $600,000 in restitution to the couple he had seriously injured. In support of their requested amount of restitution in excess of $1 million, the plaintiffs offered a life care plan authored by a certified life care planner. On appeal, the defendant argued that the District Court had erred because the calculations offered by the plaintiffs were too speculative and amounted to uncorroborated hearsay. The Supreme Court disagreed, finding that the District Court had sufficient information on which to base the award of restitution. St. v. Passwater, 2015 MT 159, 379 Mont. 372, 351 P.3d 382.

Award of Lost Wages as Restitution Only if Recoverable in Related Civil Action — Discovery Request Too Broad Without Demonstration of Substantial Need: The defendant was convicted of criminal mischief and cruelty to animals for fatally shooting a family's dog. During sentencing, the District Court ordered the defendant to pay $9,357 in restitution. The amount included the family's replacement of the dog, medical bills, lost wages for time spent cooperating with the prosecution, and traveling expenses. On appeal, the defendant argued that the lost wages were not included within the statutory scope of restitution, that the medical bills did not arise out of his activities, and that he should have been allowed to conduct discovery to analyze the bills claimed by the family. The Supreme Court reversed in part, holding that lost wages did not constitute out-of-pocket expenses in 46-18-243 and that unless a person could recover the wages in a civil action arising out of the same facts, they could not constitute restitution, and affirmed in part, holding that the defendant's broad discovery motion was properly denied because he did not demonstrate a substantial need. St. v. Barrick, 2015 MT 94, 378 Mont. 441, 347 P.3d 241.

Adequate Definition of Security for Jury — Willful Conduct Standard Applicable to Securities Act Violations — Omission of Investment Prospectus Not Fraudulent at Time — Securities Restitution Properly Awarded: The defendant, a pastor, was approached by the plaintiff, a member of his congregation, about investing money. The defendant convinced the plaintiff to purchase stock in the defendant's Mexico-domiciled company. Ultimately, the investment promises never materialized and the defendant was convicted of failure to register as a securities salesperson, failure to register a security, and fraudulent practices under the Securities Act of Montana. On appeal, the defendant argued that the term "security" was not adequately or specifically defined for the jury, that the "willful" standard was inappropriate to attach to the charges, that the conviction of fraudulent practices was improper because neither the statute nor administrative rule required an investment prospectus at the time of the violation, and that the award of restitution was improper. The Supreme Court held that the evidence showed that the jury reasonably concluded that the defendant had sold a security because the shares in the company constituted a stock, that the Legislature specifically included a willful standard for Securities Act violations, that the fraudulent practices conviction was improper because failure to provide a prospectus was not part of the statute at the time, and that the award of restitution was proper because the loss stemmed directly from the defendant's conduct. St. v. Himes, 2015 MT 91, 378 Mont. 419, 345 P.3d 297.

Restitution for Victim's Counseling Services Received Prior to Crime Improper: The defendant was charged with violating a restraining order that had been granted based on allegations he had sexually assaulted a girl. As a part of his sentence, he was ordered to pay restitution for counseling services received by the girl. However, some of her counseling had been received prior to her knowing that the defendant had violated the restraining order. The defendant appealed the order of restitution, arguing that he had never been convicted of sexual assault and therefore could not be ordered to pay restitution for counseling that occurred prior to his violating the restraining order. The Supreme Court, agreeing that there was no requisite causal connection between violation of the protective order and counseling services rendered before the violation, vacated the award and remanded the matter for a recalculation of restitution for counseling services rendered after the girl learned of the violation of the restraining order. St. v. Thorpe, 2015 MT 14, 378 Mont. 62, 342 P.3d 5, followed in St. v. Henderson, 2015 MT 56, 378 Mont. 301, 343 P.3d 566.

Getaway Driver Accountable for Robbery — Restitution Not Specified by District Court — Sentence Greater Than Under Failed Plea Agreement: The defendant was convicted of accountability for robbery after serving as the getaway driver. The defendant originally agreed with the state to a 20-year sentence with 15 years suspended. This agreement was withdrawn because the District Court did not agree to the terms. After trial, the District Court ordered restitution to be determined at a later date, sentenced the defendant to 30 years in prison with 10 suspended, and required the defendant to register as a violent offender. On appeal, the defendant argued that restitution must be specified by the District Court, that imposing a greater sentence after trial was improper, and that it was improper to require registration as a violent offender because he was convicted of accountability. The Supreme Court agreed with the defendant regarding restitution and remanded for a determination. However, the Supreme Court found that the District Court properly sentenced the defendant by giving specific reasons for the sentence imposed and that the defendant's crime qualified as a violent offense under the Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act. St. v. Hanna, 2014 MT 346, 377 Mont. 418, 341 P.3d 629.

Valid Authority to Impose Restitution Recommendation — Doctrine of Case Inapplicable: After a prior Supreme Court decision determined that the District Court lacked authority to impose a restitution payment as a condition of parole, the District Court was not prevented by the law of the case doctrine from restating its parole eligibility restrictions and conditions as recommendations or from specifying the total amount of restitution. Furthermore, although the defendant argued that her sentence violated due process because it was based on the amount of time it would take her to pay restitution, the District Court did not err when it based the defendant's sentence on many factors but did not make financial obligations the basis of the sentence. St. v. Winter, 2014 MT 235, 376 Mont. 284, 333 P.3d 222.

No Reduction in Restitution for Portion Paid by Medical Insurer — Restitution Order Proper: The defendant pleaded guilty to assault with a weapon and criminal mischief for attacking another motorist but challenged the District Court's order requiring him to pay $6,418.33 in restitution to the victim for medical and dental expenses related to the assault, claiming that the amount should be reduced because the victim's insurer had reimbursed the victim for a portion of the expenses. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that because the restitution statutes reflect an intent to require an offender to make full restitution to any victim who has sustained pecuniary loss, the defendant was not entitled to a reduction in the amount of restitution ordered by the District Court. St. v. Fenner, 2014 MT 131, 375 Mont. 131, 325 P.3d 691.

Restitution Award Not Supported by Substantial Evidence: While driving drunk, the defendant collided with the victim's garage and subsequently pleaded guilty to DUI and reckless driving. Restitution was imposed in an amount that included costs associated with repainting the victim's entire house, rather than just the damaged attached garage. The defendant appealed, arguing that his insurance had already compensated the victim for damages to the garage and that repainting the entire house was not appropriate because only the garage had been damaged. The Supreme Court reversed, concluding that substantial evidence did not support the restitution award because the only evidence offered concerning restitution was conflicting estimates from the defendant and the victim. St. v. Aragon, 2014 MT 89, 374 Mont. 391, 321 P.3d 841, followed in St. v. Simpson, 2014 MT 175, 375 Mont. 393, 328 P.3d 1144. However, see St. v. Ailer, 2018 MT 18, 390 Mont. 200, 410 P.3d 964, holding that substantial evidence did support the award and amount of restitution.

Affidavit From Independent Adjuster Supported by Documentation Sufficient to Establish Amount of Restitution: Following his conviction for felony theft by insurance fraud, the defendant appealed the award of restitution, arguing that the affidavit of loss from an independent adjuster hired by the insurance company was insufficient to satisfy the requirement of a victim-submitted affidavit. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that determining the amount of loss under the insurance claim was within the scope of the adjuster's duties, the adjuster was authorized to investigate and settle the claim on behalf of the insurance company, the affidavit was properly sworn, and the amount was supported by documentation in the record. St. v. Schaeffer, 2014 MT 47, 374 Mont. 93, 321 P.3d 809.

Restitution Not Required for Victims' Tax Liabilities Incurred With or Without Crime: The District Court ordered the defendant to pay restitution as a condition of a deferred sentence for felony theft. The defendant appealed the portion of the restitution that included the victims' income and excise tax liabilities and the victims' attorney fees in obtaining advice about dealing with the tax consequences of the defendant's crime. The Supreme Court reversed the District Court in part, concluding the defendant should not be required to make restitution for the income tax liabilities that the victims had faced or would face upon receiving monetary restitution, because the victims were subject to that tax liability with or without the defendant's crime. The Supreme Court also affirmed the District Court in part, concluding that restitution was proper for: (1) the victims' excise tax liability for early withdrawal of retirement money that the victims would not have faced, but for the defendant's crime; and (2) the victims' attorney fees that were incurred to address and rectify the effects of the defendant's criminal conduct. St. v. Cerasani, 2014 MT 2, 373 Mont. 192, 316 P.3d 819.

Open-Ended Restitution Award Vacated for Lack of Specificity: A 17-year-old defendant was charged as an adult with one count of sexual intercourse without consent and one count of sexual assault. Subsequently, the defendant was sentenced and the District Court ordered restitution payments for victim counseling in an amount to be determined by a statement of costs that would be filed by the prosecution within 30 days of the final judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court vacated the restitution requirement on the grounds that the judgment failed to comply with 46-18-244, which requires a judgment to set a specific amount. St. v. Dietsch, 2013 MT 245, 371 Mont. 460, 308 P.3d 111.

Award of Restitution When Causation Not Element of Offense — No Error — Sworn Testimony at Restitution Hearing Sufficient Evidence to Support Amount Awarded: The defendant was involved in a collision between her vehicle and the victim's bicycle, but because she apparently was unaware of the collision, she drove away from the scene of the accident. After a jury found the defendant guilty of failure to remain at the scene of an accident in violation of 61-7-103 and failure to notify authorities of an accident in violation of 61-7-108, the defendant's sentence included an order to pay the victim $4,148.60 in restitution. The defendant appealed the award of restitution on the grounds that neither of the two charges she was convicted of included causation as an element. The Supreme Court concluded that because the lower court properly found that the victim's losses resulted from the defendant's commission of the offenses, there was no error in awarding restitution, even though causation was not an element of either offense, and held that the victim's sworn testimony at the restitution hearing provided sufficient substantive evidence to support the amount of the award. Billings v. Edward, 2012 MT 186, 366 Mont. 107, 285 P.3d 523.

Imposition of Restitution Without Comparative Negligence Analysis Improper: After the defendant pleaded guilty to eluding a peace officer, the Municipal Court ordered him to pay over $7,000 in restitution to the City of Whitefish for vehicle damage caused when two police cars collided upon approaching the defendant's house after a police chase through the city. The District Court affirmed the award, but the Supreme Court reversed, concluding that the Municipal Court was obligated to consider any possible negligence on the part of the officers in assessing the amount of restitution and that the defendant's assertion of negligence per se was sufficient to raise the defense of comparative negligence. Whitefish v. Jentile, 2012 MT 185, 366 Mont. 94, 285 P.3d 515.

Criminal Endangerment — Bodily Injury — Restitution for Lost Wages: A defendant entered a guilty plea to felony criminal endangerment after he crashed into a car driven by a minor, who suffered multiple injuries. The District Court imposed on the defendant a 10-year commitment to the Department of Corrections with all but 180 days suspended and ordered him to pay the minor's wages for the summer, her father's lost wages, and her unpaid medical expenses. The defendant appealed, contending that the District Court had improperly awarded restitution for lost wages and had abused its discretion in imposing the maximum sentence. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the District Court was reasonable in including the minor's lost wages for summer employment as part of restitution and that the District Court properly considered the defendant's prior drunk-driving infractions in imposing the maximum sentence. St. v. Dodson, 2011 MT 302, 363 Mont. 63, 265 P.3d 1254.

Future Restitution Must Be Specific Amount: The trial court imposed on the defendant a restitution obligation requiring payment of all future medical expenses incurred by the victim as a result of the defendant's criminal conduct. The Supreme Court held and the state acknowledged that statutory language requires the amount of restitution to be stated as a specific amount of money. The matter was remanded to the trial court with directions to set the amount of restitution as a specific dollar sum. St. v. Guill, 2011 MT 32, 359 Mont. 225, 248 P.3d 826.

Knowing and Active Participation in Crime — Who Actually Caused Damage Irrelevant: A minor who knowingly and actively participated in the theft of a van and computer, and who participated in the "possession" of the van for many hours by driving it, satisfied the causal standards justifying payment of restitution under this section, and whether he was the driver of the van when it was wrecked was irrelevant. In re S.F., Jr., 2010 MT 244, 358 Mont. 185, 244 P.3d 316.

Full Restitution for Theft Without Consideration of Offender's Ability to Pay — No Error: Following conviction for theft by common scheme, Brownback was ordered to pay restitution in full. Brownback appealed on grounds that the sentencing court erred by failing to consider Brownback's ability to pay restitution. The Supreme Court disagreed. The former provision requiring a sentencing court to consider an offender's ability to pay was removed from the restitution statutes in 2003 and was replaced by the mandate that District Courts require an offender to pay full restitution. Therefore, the sentencing court did not err in requiring Brownback to pay full restitution without considering the ability to pay. St. v. Brownback, 2010 MT 96, 356 Mont. 190, 232 P.3d 385.

Expenses Recoverable in Civil Action Properly Imposed as Restitution — Sufficient Evidence of Restitution Amount: Essig was convicted of stalking and sentenced to pay restitution of $5,582.03, including counseling expenses for the victim's children, blood testing for one of the children, and the cost of six memory cards for a digital camera. Essig contested the restitution and the amount, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Under 46-18-243, pecuniary loss includes general damages that a person could recover in a civil action against the defendant. In this case, the evidence showed that the expenses could have been recovered in a civil action by the victim and thus were legally imposed as restitution. The value of the various items was supported by the evidence and their inclusion as restitution was not erroneous. St. v. Essig, 2009 MT 340, 353 M 99, 218 P3d 838 (2009). However, see St. v. Johnson, 2011 MT 286, 362 Mont. 473, 235 P.3d 638 (declining to address a challenge to a restitution award when the defendant failed to object to the imposition of restitution at his sentencing hearing).

Sufficient Connection Between Victim of Vehicle Accident and Evidence Tampering to Warrant Defendant's Payment of Victim's Funeral Expenses as Restitution: Sherman was thrown from her car in a vehicle accident, and as she lay in the road, she was struck and killed by Ness's vehicle. Ness did not stop and subsequently repaired and washed his car in an effort to conceal evidence of the accident. Ness was convicted of tampering with evidence and ordered to pay $3,500 for Sherman's funeral expenses as restitution. Ness challenged the restitution on grounds that because Sherman was not a victim of the evidence tampering conviction, there was no nexus between the crime and the restitution. The Supreme Court disagreed. Pursuant to St. v. LaTray, 2000 MT 262, 302 M 11, 11 P3d 116 (2000), classification of a person as a victim for purposes of ordering restitution does not depend on the person's relationship to the elements of the crime for which the defendant is convicted. In this case, restitution for Sherman's funeral expenses was not wholly unrelated to Ness's crime, and the expenses were based on Ness's involvement, which created a nexus between restitution and the crime. Because the funeral expenses were paid to Sherman's estate directly out of the crime victims compensation account, that account was entitled to $3,500 restitution. St. v. Ness, 2009 MT 300, 352 M 317, 216 P3d 773 (2009). See also St. v. Jent, 2013 MT 93, 369 Mont. 468, 299 P.3d 332, ordering the defendant to pay for medical bills related to the victim's later suicide attempt following his assault on the victim.

Mitigation of Damages as Restitution for Criminal Activity — Additional Restitution of Loss of Income Warranted: Kalal was convicted of theft of a tractor; he received a 2-year deferred sentence and was ordered to pay restitution for the value of the tractor and other stolen property. Kalal satisfied the restitution obligation, but Petranek, the victim of the theft, sought additional restitution for loss of income because he had anticipated using the tractor for various income-producing activities, including building a fence, building a cabin, and seeding land for grass production and farming. The District Court noted that other tractors could be rented, but that Petranek's limited availability to work on projects presented serious impediments to renting a tractor. The court thus determined that Petranek suffered a loss of income for summer grazing and cabin rental in the amount of $15,960. Kalal appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Applying precedents from the fields of tort and contract law, the court recognized that an injured person is not expected to do what is unreasonable or impracticable, so the applicable standard is what would a reasonable and prudent person be expected to do, if capable, under the circumstances. While recognizing the duty to mitigate damages, the District Court correctly reasoned that no reasonable person could be expected to spend money or time that the person does not have to mitigate an injury for which the person is not responsible. Therefore, under these circumstances and given the impracticability and expense of renting and transporting a tractor a long distance for short periods of time, the restitution award of $15,960 for Petranek's loss of income was reasonable. St. v. Kalal, 2009 MT 103, 350 M 128, 204 P3d 1240 (2009).

Drug Task Force Considered Victim of Drug Offense — Restitution to Task Force as Part of Plea Agreement Affirmed: As part of a plea agreement on a drug charge, Jones agreed to pay $125 in restitution to the Eastern Montana Drug Task Force. Jones later appealed the restitution condition on grounds that it was illegal because the task force was not a victim of the drug distribution offense. The Supreme Court disagreed. Because Jones agreed in the plea agreement to pay restitution to the task force, the task force was a victim, as defined in 46-18-243(2)(a)(vi), to whom the sentencing court could require Jones to pay restitution. St. v. Jones, 2008 MT 440, 347 M 512, 199 P3d 216 (2008), distinguishing St. v. Krum, 2007 MT 229, 339 M 154, 168 P3d 658 (2007).

Defendant Not Involved in Initial Vehicle Theft or Damage — Restitution Not Owing: Seghetti stole a vehicle and picked up Breeding and another friend for a ride, during which the vehicle was damaged while Seghetti was driving. Seghetti then revealed that the vehicle was stolen, and Breeding suggested driving the vehicle to California. During the trip, Breeding and Seghetti shared the driving. California police stopped the vehicle for a broken turn signal, and Breeding and Seghetti were subsequently charged with and convicted of felony theft. At sentencing, the District Court ordered that Breeding pay restitution for damage to the vehicle. Asserting that he was not driving when the damage occurred and thus was not responsible for the damage, Breeding appealed the restitution order. The Supreme Court reversed. Without a causal connection between Breeding's commission of theft and the damage inflicted earlier by Seghetti, there was no basis for requiring Breeding to pay restitution for that damage, so the District Court was ordered to strike the restitution requirement from Breeding's sentence. St. v. Breeding, 2008 MT 162, 343 M 323, 184 P3d 313 (2008). See also St. v. Cole, 2020 MT 259, 401 Mont. 502, 474 P.3d 323, in which restitution was reversed when the state failed to prove causal nexus.

Restitution Obligations Not Discharged Upon Fulfillment of Criminal Sentence: As a condition of sentences for theft, burglary, and deceptive practices, Brown was ordered to pay restitution. Upon completion of his prison sentences, Brown was released without having paid restitution in full. Brown was subsequently imprisoned following conviction for other criminal offenses, and the Department of Corrections began garnishing Brown's prison wages to satisfy the unpaid restitution obligations from the previous sentences. Brown requested that the District Court waive payment of the restitution on grounds that the Department lacked authority to garnish his prison wages to pay restitution obligations from sentences that were previously discharged. The court agreed and ordered the Department to cease garnishment and to reimburse any money collected to satisfy those obligations. The state appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. Unlike the other conditions of Brown's sentences, the restitution obligations were civil judgments required by this section to be paid in full, and those obligations were not discharged or fulfilled by virtue of Brown's completion of the criminal sentences and discharge from prison. Pursuant to 46-18-244, the Department was authorized to garnish Brown's prison wages to satisfy the previously unpaid restitution. St. v. Brown, 2008 MT 115, 342 M 476, 182 P3d 75 (2008). See also St. v. Ferre, 2014 MT 96, 374 Mont. 428, 322 P.3d 1047.

Reimbursement to Insurer That Reimbursed Victim Affirmed: An insurer that reimbursed a victim for pecuniary loss had the right of subrogation to the extent of the reimbursement, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in ordering defendant to pay restitution to the insurer to make the insurer whole. St. v. Sharp, 2006 MT 301, 334 M 470, 148 P3d 625 (2006).

Imposition of Restitution Based on Documented Losses Not Violative of Constitutional Prohibition Against Excessive Fines: As set out in St. v. Good, 2004 MT 296, 323 M 378, 100 P3d 644 (2004), a restitution award violates the constitutional prohibition against excessive fines if the award is grossly disproportional to the gravity of the offense. Here, Kuykendall was convicted of criminal endangerment and ordered to pay restitution of over $10,000 to a peace officer who was injured during the crime. Kuykendall asserted that the restitution amount was grossly disproportional to the crime of criminal endangerment, but the Supreme Court disagreed. The amount of loss suffered by the officer was documented and was not refuted by Kuykendall at trial. The sentencing court relied on the only evidence presented at the sentencing hearing, and the amount of restitution ordered was directly related to the amount of loss and thus was not grossly disproportional. The restitution amount was not excessive and was affirmed. St. v. Kuykendall, 2006 MT 110, 332 M 180, 136 P3d 983 (2006).

Improper Order to Pay Child Support as Condition of Sentence for Possession of Dangerous Drugs: Erickson entered a plea agreement on drug charges, and although it was not part of the agreement, the sentencing court ordered that Erickson also forfeit one-third of his prison earnings as restitution to be paid toward Erickson's delinquent child support. Erickson never invited or acquiesced to the child support order. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that possession of dangerous drugs is a victimless crime for which restitution cannot be owed and also noted that the amount of restitution must be determined and fixed. The court agreed with Erickson that there was no connection between drug crimes and the failure to pay child support, so ordering payment of child support arrearages as restitution was not an appropriate condition of sentencing for a drug crime. However, in this case, the sentencing court made it clear that the order to pay child support was in lieu of requiring Erickson to pay cleanup costs associated with a clandestine drug lab, attorney costs, or jury costs. The sentencing court could have imposed both costs and restitution if not for the imposition of the illegal child support obligation, so the Supreme Court was unable to determine what sentence would have been imposed if the law had been correctly applied. The case was remanded for resentencing on whether Erickson must pay restitution and costs. St. v. Erickson, 2005 MT 276, 329 M 192, 124 P3d 119 (2005).

Restitution Amount Set by Sentencing Court Rather Than Jury — No Error: After the jury found Field guilty of theft by deception, the District Court imposed restitution in the amount of $17,632.67. Field contended that under Apprendi v. N.J., 530 US 466 (2000), any fact that increases a penalty for a crime above the statutory maximum must be submitted to the jury and proved beyond a reasonable doubt and that because the restitution amount was set by the court rather than by the jury, Field should not be required to pay restitution in the court-ordered amount. The Supreme Court held that the Apprendi rule does not apply to restitution because restitution is not a criminal punishment, but rather is a civil remedy administered for convenience by courts that have entered criminal convictions. Thus, once the jury found Field guilty of theft by deception, the District Court was free to apply the maximum statutory sentences and to order Field to pay an appropriate amount of restitution. St. v. Field, 2005 MT 181, 328 M 26, 116 P3d 813 (2005). See also U.S. v. George, 403 F3d 470 (7th Cir. 2005).

No Prejudice in Property Valuation When Less Than Full Restitution Required: The total losses incurred by individuals and businesses in a fire started by Gilbert was $5,721,684.57. In calculating the value of a building destroyed in the fire for establishing restitution, the District Court used replacement value rather than actual value. Gilbert contended that failure to use actual value was reversible error under St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000). The Supreme Court agreed that actual value should have been used but that Gilbert failed to show that any prejudice resulted from the error. Gilbert's presentence investigation report adequately documented Gilbert's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, and Gilbert was ordered to pay only $24,000 in restitution, which was but a minuscule fraction of the losses. Any error by the District Court in using replacement value for the building did not prejudice Gilbert because he was not required to pay full restitution. St. v. Gilbert, 2004 MT 368, 324 M 530, 106 P3d 127 (2004), following St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Restitution Order Proper Given Defendant's Ability to Pay: The sentencing court ordered Thaut to pay $69,457 in restitution. Thaut appealed the award on grounds that the court failed to meet statutory requirements establishing Thaut's financial resources and future ability to pay and on grounds that due process rights were violated when the court failed to consider several factors in Thaut's ability to pay, including Thaut's age and short time to work following parole, minimum wage employment history, lack of assets and ability to acquire assets in the future, and mental health issues related to an alleged prior head injury. However, the presentence investigation and supplemental presentence investigation provided adequate documentation regarding Thaut's ability to pay restitution and to work hard to earn a living. Further, Thaut had no documented physical limitations and was unemployed only because he was incarcerated. The District Court's determination that Thaut had the ability to pay medical expenses, a grant from the Board of Crime Control, and property damages was amply supported by the record, and the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Thaut, 2004 MT 359, 324 M 460, 103 P3d 1012 (2004).

Restitution Order Reimbursing Victim for Mortgage Payments and Cost of Installing Surveillance Equipment Not Unconstitutional Excessive Fine or Cruel and Unusual Punishment: Good was found guilty of assault and as part of his sentence was ordered to pay restitution to the victim of approximately $6,000. Good argued that restitution constituted an excessive fine and cruel and unusual punishment. The Supreme Court held that although by nature all fines are punitive, the test to determine if the fine is excessive is whether the fine is grossly disproportional. When the amount of restitution is geared directly to the amount of the victim's loss caused by the defendant's illegal activity, proportionality is built into the order. The Supreme Court also held that in the instant case, there was a finding that the defendant was not indigent and had the means to pay the restitution and therefore the order did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. St. v. Good, 2004 MT 296, 323 M 378, 100 P3d 644 (2004).

Improper Inclusion of Social Security Benefits When Determining Income for Purposes of Restitution: An order that Social Security benefits be included in appellant's net income for purposes of determining the amount of net income to be paid as restitution improperly burdened appellant's Social Security benefits. Including Social Security benefits in income conflicts with 42 U.S.C. 407(a), which provides that the benefits cannot be subjected to execution, levy, attachment, garnishment, or other legal process. The order was an improper attempt to subject the benefits to "other legal process". St. v. Eaton, 2004 MT 283, 323 M 287, 99 P3d 661 (2004). See also Whitefish v. Curran, 2023 MT 118, 412 Mont. 499, 531 P.3d 547, finding that COVID-19 stimulus payments are protected similar to Social Security benefits.

Review of Legality of Imposing Restitution — Failure to Raise Issue Below: If a defendant appeals a sentence in a criminal case on the grounds that it is illegal or exceeds statutory mandates, the issue may be reviewed even if no objection was made at the time of sentencing. Therefore, defendant's claim that an order to pay restitution as a condition to a suspended sentence was illegal was not waived by his failure to raise the issue below and would be reviewed on appeal. St. v. Eaton, 2004 MT 283, 323 M 287, 99 P3d 661 (2004).

Restitution Properly Ordered When Dismissed Charges Related to Charge for Which Defendant Convicted: McIntire was charged with felony burglary, misdemeanor theft, and misdemeanor forgery. Pursuant to a plea agreement, McIntire pleaded guilty to the burglary charge and the other charges were dismissed. The trial court ordered McIntire to pay restitution, but McIntire contended that because the forgery charges were dismissed, restitution could not be ordered to compensate for the forged checks and that the court lacked authority to impose restitution when there was no longer a victim with respect to the dismissed forgery charges. The Supreme Court disagreed. The victim was the same for both crimes, and the burglary was directly connected to the forgery, constituting an ongoing criminal transaction, so dismissal of the forgery charges did not deprive the court of authority to impose a restitution obligation on McIntire for the checks stolen from the victim during the burglary and for the pecuniary loss from the subsequent forgery of those checks. St. v. McIntire, 2004 MT 238, 322 M 496, 97 P3d 576 (2004).

Question Whether Restitution Connected to Crime — Remand for Reconsideration of Restitution: McDanold assisted in kidnapping and assaulting Berry, who was later killed by another man who was also involved in the kidnapping and assault. Although McDanold did not kill Berry, upon McDanold's conviction, the District Court ordered McDanold to pay restitution to Berry's parents and to the crime victims compensation fund. On appeal, McDanold contended that the sentencing court improperly ordered the restitution because the expenses were unrelated to McDanold's crimes and also asserted that he had been double-billed for some expenses that had been paid by the crime victims compensation fund. The state contended that there was an arguable connection between McDanold's offenses and the pecuniary losses to Berry's parents and to the fund. The Supreme Court remanded for reconsideration of restitution, including the parents' claims and whether they had indeed been compensated in part by the crime victims compensation fund. St. v. McDanold, 2004 MT 167, 322 M 31, 97 P3d 1076 (2004).

Costs Directly Related to Defendant's Criminal Conduct Properly Included in Restitution Calculation: Thompson was a maintenance worker at a commercial building and had keys to the entire building. Thompson was convicted of stealing and then pawning tools from the maintenance room in the building and was ordered to pay restitution, including the costs of rekeying the entire building. Thompson contended that requiring payment of the cost of rekeying the building went beyond recovery for any pecuniary losses and was an abuse of discretion. The Supreme Court disagreed. The reason the building was rekeyed was a direct result of Thompson's criminal conduct, and the expense was an out-of-pocket loss directly related to the thefts, so including those special damage expenses in the restitution calculation was proper. St. v. Thompson, 2004 MT 131, 321 M 332, 91 P3d 12 (2004).

Order for Restitution Upon Imposition of Deferred or Suspended Sentence — 1999 Amendments to Sentencing Statute Clarified: Heath was convicted of theft and possession of burglary tools and sentenced to 10 years in prison with 2 years suspended upon conditions, including payment of restitution. Heath appealed on grounds that the 1999 amendments to 46-18-201 no longer allowed a sentencing court to impose restitution as a condition of a suspended or deferred sentence. Upon amendment in 1999, an internal reference in 46-18-201(5) was not changed to reflect the renumbering of the other subsections, which resulted in an ambiguity in the plain language of the 46-18-201, potentially rendered 46-18-237 and 46-18-251(2) meaningless, created uncertain directives for payment of restitution for all victims in 46-18-244(2) and subsection (1) of this section, and created a potentially absurd application of 46-18-201(1). Because of the potentially absurd consequences of the 1999 amendment, the Supreme Court looked beyond the words of the statute and inquired whether the Legislature intended to make any change in the substance and effect of 46-18-201. The court concluded that the 1999 amendment was a simple codification error that resulted in a cross-reference problem that was completely inconsistent with legislative intent to authorize sentencing courts to impose restitution when necessary for rehabilitation or for the protection of the victim or society if there is an appropriate correlation to the offense committed. Heath's argument failed, and the imposition of restitution as a condition of Heath's suspended sentence was affirmed. (Note: The erroneous internal reference in 46-18-201(5) was deleted in 2003.) St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004), followed in St. v. McDanold, 2004 MT 167, 322 M 31, 97 P3d 1076 (2004), and St. v. McIntire, 2004 MT 238, 322 M 496, 97 P3d 576 (2004).

Restitution Adequately Documented in PSI Report and Information Submitted by Victim: Heath contended that the presentence investigation report (PSI) contained insufficient information to document his ability to pay restitution and the victim's pecuniary loss, citing St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098 (1994), St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866 (1999), and St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000). The Supreme Court distinguished Brown, Hilgers, and Pritchett on grounds that the PSI report deficiencies in those cases were not present in Heath's case. Rather, the court followed St. v. Flanagan, 2003 MT 123, 316 M 1, 68 P3d 796 (2003), and St. v. Dunkerson, 2003 MT 234, 317 M 228, 76 P3d 1085 (2003), finding that the PSI report adequately addressed Heath's employability, assets and debts, and capability of paying restitution. The valuation of the victim's pecuniary loss was adequately provided in documentation submitted by the victim and, coupled with expert testimony on the value of recovered items, provided substantial credible evidence upon which to base the restitution amount. St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Failure of Presentence Report to Document Restitution Concerns — Payment of Restitution at Discretion of Probation Officer Improper: Following a sexual assault conviction, Flanagan was ordered to pay for all offense-related medical and counseling costs, after payment by the victim's insurance, and all future costs for the next 2 years. Flanagan asserted that the restitution plan was illegal based on St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000), because the presentence investigation report did not document Flanagan's monthly expenses or address his future ability to pay restitution and because the development of a restitution schedule was left to the discretion of the probation officer. The Supreme Court agreed and remanded for addition to the presentence report of documentation of Flanagan's monthly expenses and future ability to pay restitution and to allow the District Court to hold a hearing to enter a sentence and judgment addressing Flanagan's ability to pay and the time of restitution payments. St. v. Flanagan, 2003 MT 123, 316 M 1, 68 P3d 796 (2003).

Proof of Inability to Pay Restitution — Deferment of Sentence Extended to Allow Payment — Error: A probationer sufficiently proved that her failure to continue restitution payments was not caused by lack of a good faith effort to pay and that her income was insufficient to make even the $10 monthly payment that her probation officer was apparently willing to accept. The state's argument that she might soon receive a workers' compensation lump-sum settlement that she could use to pay the remaining restitution and would receive a "windfall" if her deferred sentence and probation were not extended for 2 years for failure to pay so that she could make further payments had no merit. Disability benefits are not a windfall; they are partial compensation for the loss of earning capacity. In addition, the duty to pay restitution remains until it is fully paid, and restitution may be collected in a civil proceeding at any time, including after the conclusion of state supervision under a sentence. Therefore, the District Court abused its discretion when it did not excuse the probationer's failure to pay, and the order extending the deferred sentence and probation for 2 years was reversed. St. v. Welling, 2002 MT 308, 313 M 67, 59 P3d 1146 (2002).

District Court Error in Postponing Determination of Restitution: The District Court provided that as a condition of probation, restitution would be an amount stipulated by counsel and approved by the court. The Supreme Court held that 46-18-242 and this section require the trial court to establish the amount of restitution and terms of payment at the time of sentencing and remanded the case to the District Court for a determination of restitution. Gilbert v. St., 2002 MT 258, 312 M 189, 59 P3d 24 (2002).

Imposition of Restitution Upon Satisfaction of Statutory Procedures: Benoit was convicted of felony theft for falsifying voided transactions and customer discounts while employed at a restaurant over a 1½-year period. Benoit was ordered to pay $15,933.90 in restitution to the employer, based on calculations by the business manager who examined transaction records during the time that Benoit was on duty, and estimated the business's pecuniary losses. Benoit contested the restitution award on grounds that documentation of the victim's pecuniary loss was not provided in the presentence investigation or at the restitution hearing and that because the restitution amounts were speculative, the District Court had no authority to impose restitution. The Supreme Court noted that a sentencing court is required to impose a sentence that includes full restitution if the victim is found to have sustained a pecuniary loss, but restitution may not be imposed unless the procedures in 46-18-242 through 46-18-249 and this section are satisfied. Failure of a presentence investigation to document a victim's loss and the offender's financial resources and ability to pay restitution, as required in 46-18-242, renders the judgment illegal, but that information was included in the presentence report in this case. Therefore, the District Court did have authority to impose restitution. Further, although the actual losses resulting from Benoit's admitted theft could not be determined with certainty, the method employed in calculating the loss was reasonable based on the best evidence available under the circumstances. The employer was entitled to recover its estimated pecuniary losses, plus reasonable out-of-pocket expenses incurred in cooperating in the investigation and prosecution of the case, including wages paid to three employees who assisted in calculating restitution. St. v. Benoit, 2002 MT 166, 310 M 449, 51 P3d 495 (2002), followed in St. v. O'Connor, 2009 MT 222, 351 M 329, 212 P3d 276 (2009), and in St. v. Dodson, 2011 MT 302, 363 Mont. 63, 265 P.3d 1254, with regard to reasonableness of the method employed in calculating the loss based on the best evidence available under the circumstances. See also St. v. O'Connell, 2011 MT 242, 362 Mont. 171, 261 P.3d 1042, which held that the District Court erred in ordering the defendant to pay lost profits as part of the defendant's restitution obligation when the evidence presented was not calculated by the use of reasonable methods based on the best evidence available under the circumstances. However, see St. v. Johnson, 2011 MT 286, 362 Mont. 473, 235 P.3d 638 (declining to address a challenge to a restitution award when the defendant failed to object to the imposition of restitution at his sentencing hearing).

No Abuse of Discretion in Imposing Sentence Greater Than Sentence Suggested in Plea Agreement — Sentence Adequately Explained: Wells was charged with DUI, negligent vehicular assault, operation of a motor vehicle without insurance, and driving with a revoked license. Wells entered a plea agreement in which he pleaded guilty to negligent vehicular assault and driving with a revoked license and agreed to pay restitution, and the prosecution agreed to recommend a 5-year sentence with all but 18 months suspended. At the sentencing hearing, Wells' probation officer disagreed with the recommended sentence, stating that 18 months was an insufficient time for Wells to deal with his alcohol and drug problems and that restitution was unlikely given Wells' work and drug abuse history. The sentencing court considered the testimony and the evidence and imposed a 5-year sentence without any time suspended. Wells appealed on grounds that the sentence was not adequately explained and was erroneous. Under St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298 (1980), the sentencing court has the discretion to impose the maximum sentence allowed by law but should provide any rationale for the sentence. Here, the court provided a rationale, explaining the nature of the offense and the degree of harm done by Wells and describing Wells' history of drug abuse and inability to pay restitution as well as a concern for future harm to society. Wells was informed that the judge was not bound by the terms of the plea agreement and retained the authority to impose a greater or lesser sentence than recommended, within the statutory limits for the offense. The sentence was adequately explained and within statutory limits and was thus affirmed. St. v. Wells, 2001 MT 112, 305 M 303, 27 P3d 47 (2001).

Payment of Child Support Improper Condition of Sentence for Felony DUI — Victim and Correlation to Underlying Offense Necessary for Imposition of Restitution: Horton was arrested for DUI, and a search of his driving record revealed nine prior DUI convictions. A further search showed that Horton also owed more than $47,000 in back child support. Horton was charged with felony DUI, with driving with a suspended or revoked license, as a habitual traffic offender operating a motor vehicle, and with felony nonsupport. By plea agreement, Horton agreed to plead guilty to the traffic offenses in exchange for dismissal of the nonsupport charge. The plea agreement stated that the state would recommend a 13-month sentence to be served in prerelease, followed by 4 years of probation, and, as a condition of the probationary sentence, provided that Horton would also make regular child support payments plus an additional sum monthly toward the support arrearage. As set out in the agreement, Horton pleaded guilty to the traffic offenses, and the nonsupport charge was dismissed. At sentencing, the habitual traffic offender charge was subsequently dismissed for failure of the state to prove that a valid habitual offender designation was in place at the time of the offense, and in addition, Horton's counsel objected to the court ordering payment of any child support arrearage, arguing that because the nonsupport charge had been dismissed, Horton would be paying restitution on a count for which he had not been convicted. Nevertheless, the court ordered Horton to pay support and promised to revoke his probation and sentence him to 4 years in prison with no parole if support was not paid. On appeal, Horton argued that the District Court abused its discretion and exceeded statutory mandates when it required him to pay restitution for an offense that was dismissed, citing St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098 (1994), for the position that restitution is statutorily limited to the victim of the crime and that because there was no victim who sustained pecuniary or economic loss as a result of the felony DUI or driving with a suspended or revoked license, restitution was inappropriate. The state argued that Horton was attempting to receive the benefit of the plea agreement—having the felony nonsupport charge dismissed—without holding up his end of the bargain by paying child support. The Supreme Court noted that a plea agreement is subject to contract law and that the court will not assist a defendant in escaping the obligations of a plea agreement once its benefits are received. However, the court also pointed out that a District Court's authority to impose sentences in criminal cases is defined and constrained by statute. The statutory authority for payment of restitution is in 46-18-201, which limits payment of restitution to the victim of a crime for which a defendant is convicted, and because Horton was not convicted of nonsupport, there was no victim to whom Horton could be ordered to pay restitution. The state also contended that ordering Horton to pay child support was proper because under 46-18-202(1), a sentencing court may impose any condition reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of the victim and society. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), a sentencing condition must have some correlation or connection to the underlying offense, but there was no correlation or connection between Horton's conviction for DUI and ordering him to pay child support. Thus, the Supreme Court ordered that the portion of Horton's sentence requiring payment of child support be stricken. St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001), followed in St. v. Setters, 2001 MT 101, 305 M 253, 25 P3d 893 (2001).

Conditions Imposed in Written Judgment and Sentence Different From Those Imposed in Oral Sentence — Lane, Waters, and Simpson Reviewed — Test to Determine Which New Conditions Lawful or Unlawful — Payment of Restitution and Costs: Johnson was sentenced orally for writing bad checks and later contended that four of the conditions imposed in the written judgment and sentence by the District Court were unlawful under St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), because they were not announced orally when she was sentenced in open court. The Supreme Court reviewed its decisions in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142 (1999), and St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361 (1999), and reasoned that a written sentence would be held unlawful only if it substantively increased the defendant's loss of liberty or the defendant's sacrifice of property. Under this test, the Supreme Court held that two of the four penalties not mentioned by the District Court in its oral pronouncement of Johnson's sentence were unlawful, those being the restitution ordered to the Missoula County jail of money expended for Johnson's medical care and the requirement that Johnson pay for the costs of her prosecution in District Court. The Supreme Court held that the other two parts of the written sentence, the requirement that Johnson make restitution from money earned in prison and the imposition of certain "civil" restrictions as conditions of Johnson's suspended sentence, such as the requirement that Johnson stay out of gambling casinos, were lawfully imposed because they did not increase the amount of money that Johnson was ordered to pay or increase Johnson's deprivation of liberty in addition to those penalties imposed orally. The requirement for payment from prison earnings only specified where the money was to come from, and the "civil" restrictions were largely mentioned by the District Court at Johnson's sentencing hearing. St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000), followed in St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

Restitution Proper for Ambulance and Towing Charges Related to Hit and Run and High-Speed Chase: LaTray was convicted of DUI, operating a vehicle without proof of insurance, operating a vehicle while a habitual traffic offender, leaving the scene of an accident, and criminal endangerment. The charges stemmed from a hit-and-run accident and subsequent high-speed chase, which ended when LaTray lost control of his car, went into a ditch, and rolled the vehicle. Officials at the scene called an ambulance as a precautionary measure and called a tow truck to remove LaTray's vehicle from the ditch. As restitution, the sentencing court ordered LaTray to pay the costs of the ambulance and tow truck. LaTray appealed on grounds that restitution is limited to pecuniary losses suffered by direct victims, as defined in terms of the offenses for which he was convicted, asserting that the ambulance company and towing service were not victims of his offenses, so restitution could not be ordered for their reimbursement. The Supreme Court disagreed. The plain language of this section does not limit restitution to a victim defined in terms of the offense or to a loss arising directly from the criminal conduct. Also, St. v. Morgan, 198 M 391, 646 P2d 1177 (1982), makes it clear that classification of a victim for restitution purposes does not depend on the individual's relationship to the elements of the crime for which a defendant is sentenced. Further, restitution is not confined to the amount by which a defendant is enriched at a victim's expense, but rather the restitution statute empowers courts to impose restitution for economic loss as a result of a crime. Here, the ambulance and towing companies suffered an economic loss in out-of-pocket expenses for services for which they were not reimbursed, and the losses were the direct result of LaTray's criminal conduct, which created a situation for which the services were reasonably necessary for the safety of the public or LaTray himself. The restitution order was affirmed. St. v. LaTray, 2000 MT 262, 302 M 11, 11 P3d 116, 57 St. Rep. 1098 (2000). See also St. v. Brewer, 1999 MT 269, 296 M 453, 989 P2d 407 (1999).

Failure to Document Defendant's Financial Resources and Ability to Pay Restitution and Victim's Pecuniary Loss — Restitution Sentence Improper: The general mandate to sentencing courts is that a sentence must include full restitution whenever it is found that the victim of an offense has sustained a pecuniary loss, subject to mandatory detailed statutory procedures and qualifications. Here, although the District Court received some evidence of these amounts during the sentencing hearing, the failure of the presentence investigation report to document the victim's pecuniary loss, as well as the defendant's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, provided the court no authority to impose a sentence of restitution and rendered its judgment illegal. St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000), following St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098 (1994), and St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866 (1999), and distinguished in St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Sentence of Restitution Based on Defendant's Indigency Constituting Due Process Violation: Pritchett entered the garage of a former employer in an effort to return two hunting rifles that he had stolen and pawned to support his gambling habit. Pritchett dropped his flashlight and, unable to find it in the dark, lit a cigarette lighter, which ignited a leaking propane bottle and caused an explosion that destroyed the garage and its contents. Pritchett was convicted of burglary and ordered to pay restitution of $63,569.25. Noting that the amount of restitution was "enormous", the probation officer who prepared the presentence investigation report stated that Pritchett should receive a 20-year suspended sentence to allow adequate time to pay off the restitution. The District Court adopted the sentencing recommendation exactly as proposed. Although the court did not expressly state that it was sentencing Pritchett to the maximum term to provide sufficient time to pay the ordered restitution, there was sufficient evidence in the record to show that the length of the sentence was based on Pritchett's indigency because, given Pritchett's limited financial resources, no shorter time would allow payment of restitution. Under St. v. Farrell, 207 M 483, 676 P2d 168 (1984), basing a prison term on a defendant's indigency is a violation of the right to due process. Thus, the Supreme Court vacated the sentence and remanded for further proceedings. St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000).

Defendant Not Responsible for Restitution in Excess of Damages Caused by Criminal Conduct: During the course of a drug investigation, Beavers admitted accepting stolen property in exchange for illegal drugs. The District Court ordered Beavers to pay restitution to the victims of the thefts, even though Beavers did not actually steal the property. Under St. v. Blanchard, 270 M 11, 889 P2d 1180 (1995), an accused is liable for restitution for offenses to which the accused has admitted guilt, been found guilty, or has agreed to pay restitution, so Beavers was not responsible for restitution for offenses she did not commit. Beavers' admission of the offense of receiving stolen property was sufficient to satisfy the causal standard of this section, that the victim suffered loss as a result of Beavers' offense, so the court did not abuse its discretion in ordering restitution; however, Beavers was required to pay restitution only for the property that formed the basis of the offense, not for property that was stolen by others but not received and possessed by Beavers. When stolen property is recovered, the amount of restitution owed is the difference between the value of the property taken and the salvage value of the property returned, and the state has the burden of establishing those values. The case was remanded for calculation of the amount of restitution owed. St. v. Beavers, 2000 MT 145, 300 M 49, 3 P3d 614, 57 St. Rep. 567 (2000).

When Restitution Owing: Under 46-18-201, the sentencing court is required to provide for full restitution by a defendant to the victim of a criminal offense who sustains a pecuniary loss. Here, Hilgers' issuance of more than 50 bad checks and stealing cash and diverting checks and money orders from his employer in an amount exceeding $33,500 clearly qualified as a pecuniary loss. The court found the state's witnesses more credible than Hilgers, providing adequate support in the record as to the amount owing. The restitution amount was not clearly erroneous and was affirmed on appeal. However, the Supreme Court remanded for lack of documentation, as required under 46-18-242, regarding Hilgers' financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, finding the information in the presentence report regarding Hilgers' age, education, assets and obligations, and marital and employment status inadequate in addressing Hilgers' resources and ability to pay the amount in question. St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866, 56 St. Rep. 1146 (1999), following St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996), distinguishing St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098, 51 St. Rep. 24 (1994), followed in St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000), and distinguished in St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Inclusion in Restitution of Costs Related to Pecuniary Loss — Wages Paid to Embezzler Not Recoverable as Pecuniary Loss: Under this section, a sentencing court may include in restitution costs paid by the victim as a result of defendant's criminal act as long as the costs are considered pecuniary loss, as defined by 46-18-243. This loss may include economic loss as a result of the crime, out-of-pocket losses, such as medical expenses, and reasonable out-of-pocket expenses incurred by the victim in filing charges or in cooperating in the investigation and prosecution of the offense. Here, Brewer embezzled over $96,000 and was ordered to pay restitution, but argued that the fact that this section excludes general damages militated against the inclusion in the restitution obligation of amounts beyond the total stolen from the employer. Brewer improperly characterized the employer's out-of-pocket losses as general damages. The employer paid accounting firms, employees, labor contractors, a software company, and a locksmith more than $15,000 in an attempt to reconstruct books and repair damage resulting from Brewer's crime. Those expenses were all considered out-of-pocket losses within the context of this section and were properly includable in the restitution calculation. However, wages paid to Brewer over the course of employment did not constitute pecuniary loss and were not recoverable as restitution. St. v. Brewer, 1999 MT 269, 296 M 453, 989 P2d 407, 56 St. Rep. 1090 (1999). See also St. v. Morgan, 198 M 391, 646 P2d 1177 (1982), and St. v. Korang, 237 M 390, 773 P2d 326, 46 St. Rep. 892 (1989).

Interest Properly Imposed on Restitution Obligation: Brewer embezzled over $96,000 and was ordered to pay restitution to the employer, including 10% interest on the restitution obligation. Brewer contended that interest in this case was per se an abuse of discretion insofar as it exceeded the employer's pecuniary loss. The issue of whether interest may be properly applied to restitution under this section was a case of first impression in Montana. Interest is not expressly provided for by the restitution statute, which provides for restitution to a victim who suffers a pecuniary loss, defined in 46-18-243 as special damages, but not general damages, that a person could recover in a civil action arising out of the facts constituting the criminal activity. Interest is a special damage available in a civil action under 27-1-210 and thus was properly applied to Brewer's restitution. However, interest is not allowed on damages such as pain and suffering, mental anguish or suffering, or punitive damages. St. v. Brewer, 1999 MT 269, 296 M 453, 989 P2d 407, 56 St. Rep. 1090 (1999).

No Evidence That Victim Will Be Unjustly Enriched — Credit Against Restitution Properly Denied: Kober stole money from the Montana State University-Bozeman student health service and was ordered to pay restitution. Because the stolen money was considered taxable income, Kober was also charged with failing to properly report income for state income tax purposes. From the proceeds of the subsequent sale of the family home, Kober paid $46,004.67 to the Department of Revenue to satisfy its lien for back income taxes. Because the money was placed in the general fund from which the University System receives part of its funding, Kober maintained that the University System would benefit from the payment of the back income taxes and that in order to avoid a windfall unjustly enriching the university, the restitution amount should be offset by $46,004.67. However, Kober did not establish that any of the $46,004.67 would actually be distributed to or benefit Montana State University-Bozeman or the student health service, so the District Court properly denied Kober's request for a credit against restitution. St. v. Kober, 1999 MT 264, 296 M 425, 989 P2d 399, 56 St. Rep. 1076 (1999).

Chapter 7 Bankruptcy Discharge Held Not to Discharge Restitution Obligation: After Woods was convicted and sentenced for writing a bad check, he was given a Chapter 7 discharge in bankruptcy. Woods then argued to the Supreme Court that the requirement that he make restitution was also discharged. Citing Kelly v. Robinson, 479 US 36 (1986), the Supreme Court held that Woods's Chapter 7 discharge did not discharge his restitution obligation. In making its ruling, the Supreme Court distinguished Pennsylvania Dept. of Public Welfare v. Davenport, 495 US 552 (1990), in which the U.S. Supreme Court held that Chapter 13 bankruptcy discharges do in fact discharge restitution obligations but also noted that the result in Davenport had been overturned by legislation enacted by the U.S. Congress. St. v. Woods, 286 M 355, 951 P2d 981, 54 St. Rep. 1445 (1997).

Requiring Defendant to Pay Restitution for Admitted Offenses for Which Defendant Is Not Charged or Convicted: Blanchard argued that the lower court erred in requiring him, as part of the plea bargain, to pay restitution for offenses that he admitted committing but for which he was never charged or convicted. The Supreme Court held that the issue is one of first impression in Montana but that other jurisdictions have held that an accused is liable for restitution for offenses admitted to even if the accused is not charged or convicted of the crimes and especially in cases in which the accused has agreed to pay the restitution as part of a plea bargain. The Supreme Court also held that the lower court had not erred in ordering the restitution when it was intended to serve a rehabilitative purpose. St. v. Blanchard, 270 M 11, 889 P2d 1180, 52 St. Rep. 54 (1995), and followed in St. v. Beavers, 2000 MT 145, 300 M 49, 3 P3d 614, 57 St. Rep. 567 (2000). See also St. v. Simpson, 2014 MT 175, 375 Mont. 393, 328 P.3d 1144, disallowing restitution for offenses to which the defendant did not admit and for which the defendant was not charged or convicted.

Inability to Pay Restitution — Not Violative of Equal Protection in Light of State Correctional Policy and Previous Offenses: A defendant convicted of felony theft was sentenced to 5 years in the state prison with 2 years suspended and, in addition, was ordered to pay restitution. The defendant asserted on appeal that he was sentenced to a prison term because of his indigency, in violation of his right to equal protection. However, the District Judge specifically noted the prison term was necessary to protect the property of others and that the defendant's criminal record contained three previous misdemeanor thefts. The Supreme Court found these to be sufficient reasons to support incarceration and upheld the state's correctional policy outlined in 46-18-101. The court noted that the sentence was well within the parameters of punishment for felony theft in 45-6-301. Finding no abuse of discretion or violation of the defendant's constitutional rights, the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Carroll, 220 M 466, 716 P2d 212, 43 St. Rep. 531 (1986).

Compiler's Comments

2019 Amendment: Chapter 456 in (1) at end inserted "if requested pursuant to 46-18-111"; in (2) after "a presentence report is not" deleted "authorized or"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2019.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 272 in (1) in introductory clause after "victim" deleted "of the offense" and after "loss" deleted "as a result of the offense"; in (1)(a) substituted "a list of the offender's assets" for "documentation of the offender's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution"; in (1)(b) at beginning substituted "an affidavit that specifically describes" for "documentation of", after "loss" inserted "and the replacement value in dollars of the loss", and at end after "victim" deleted "or by the board of crime control if compensation for the victim's loss has been reimbursed by the state"; in (2) near middle after "court" substituted "shall accept" for "may receive" and after "evidence of" deleted "the offender's ability to pay and"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

The amendments to this section made by Ch. 114, L. 2003, were rendered void by sec. 9, Ch. 272, L. 2003, a coordination section.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 10, Ch. 272, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to offenders who have an unpaid restitution obligation on [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2003.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 118 at end of (1)(b) substituted “reimbursed by the state” for “reimbursed by the crime victims compensation and assistance account”. Amendment effective March 23, 2001.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 118, L. 2001, provided: “WHEREAS, the 1995 Legislature in Senate Bill No. 83 changed funding for the crime victims compensation and assistance program from an earmarked special revenue account to the general fund; and

WHEREAS, the crime victims compensation and assistance program has been supported entirely by general fund money since fiscal year 1996; and

WHEREAS, repealing section 53-9-109 is necessary in order to clarify the conflict that currently exists between actual appropriation practices and the law.”

1995 Amendment: Chapter 125 near beginning of (1) substituted reference to victim’s pecuniary loss for “restitution may be a proper condition of a deferred or suspended sentence”; at end of (1)(b) inserted reference to Board of Crime Control and crime victims compensation and assistance account; and made minor changes in style.

Severability: Section 42, Ch. 125, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

Case Notes

Secondhand Affidavit Insufficient to Establish Pecuniary Loss: In a restitution hearing, a bar owner testified as to his pecuniary loss as well as the pecuniary loss of two other victims who did not submit restitution affidavits or appear and testify as to their losses. A secondhand affidavit was invalid as it was not based on the witness’s personal knowledge, and the Supreme Court reversed and remanded the District Court’s award of restitution for the victims who did not submit evidence. St. v. Cleveland, 2018 MT 199, 392 Mont. 338, 423 P.3d 1074.

Getaway Driver Accountable for Robbery — Restitution Not Specified by District Court — Sentence Greater Than Under Failed Plea Agreement: The defendant was convicted of accountability for robbery after serving as the getaway driver. The defendant originally agreed with the state to a 20-year sentence with 15 years suspended. This agreement was withdrawn because the District Court did not agree to the terms. After trial, the District Court ordered restitution to be determined at a later date, sentenced the defendant to 30 years in prison with 10 suspended, and required the defendant to register as a violent offender. On appeal, the defendant argued that restitution must be specified by the District Court, that imposing a greater sentence after trial was improper, and that it was improper to require registration as a violent offender because he was convicted of accountability. The Supreme Court agreed with the defendant regarding restitution and remanded for a determination. However, the Supreme Court found that the District Court properly sentenced the defendant by giving specific reasons for the sentence imposed and that the defendant’s crime qualified as a violent offense under the Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act. St. v. Hanna, 2014 MT 346, 377 Mont. 418, 341 P.3d 629.

Restitution Award Not Supported by Substantial Evidence: While driving drunk, the defendant collided with the victim’s garage and subsequently pleaded guilty to DUI and reckless driving. Restitution was imposed in an amount that included costs associated with repainting the victim’s entire house, rather than just the damaged attached garage. The defendant appealed, arguing that his insurance had already compensated the victim for damages to the garage and that repainting the entire house was not appropriate because only the garage had been damaged. The Supreme Court reversed, concluding that substantial evidence did not support the restitution award because the only evidence offered concerning restitution was conflicting estimates from the defendant and the victim. St. v. Aragon, 2014 MT 89, 374 Mont. 391, 321 P.3d 841, followed in St. v. Simpson, 2014 MT 175, 375 Mont. 393, 328 P.3d 1144. However, see St. v. Ailer, 2018 MT 18, 390 Mont. 200, 410 P.3d 964, holding that substantial evidence did support the award and amount of restitution.

Affidavit From Independent Adjuster Supported by Documentation Sufficient to Establish Amount of Restitution: Following his conviction for felony theft by insurance fraud, the defendant appealed the award of restitution, arguing that the affidavit of loss from an independent adjuster hired by the insurance company was insufficient to satisfy the requirement of a victim-submitted affidavit. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that determining the amount of loss under the insurance claim was within the scope of the adjuster’s duties, the adjuster was authorized to investigate and settle the claim on behalf of the insurance company, the affidavit was properly sworn, and the amount was supported by documentation in the record. St. v. Schaeffer, 2014 MT 47, 374 Mont. 93, 321 P.3d 809.

Award of Restitution When Causation Not Element of Offense — No Error — Sworn Testimony at Restitution Hearing Sufficient Evidence to Support Amount Awarded: The defendant was involved in a collision between her vehicle and the victim’s bicycle, but because she apparently was unaware of the collision, she drove away from the scene of the accident. After a jury found the defendant guilty of failure to remain at the scene of an accident in violation of 61-7-103 and failure to notify authorities of an accident in violation of 61-7-108, the defendant's sentence included an order to pay the victim $4,148.60 in restitution. The defendant appealed the award of restitution on the grounds that neither of the two charges she was convicted of included causation as an element. The Supreme Court concluded that because the lower court properly found that the victim's losses resulted from the defendant's commission of the offenses, there was no error in awarding restitution, even though causation was not an element of either offense, and held that the victim's sworn testimony at the restitution hearing provided sufficient substantive evidence to support the amount of the award. Billings v. Edward, 2012 MT 186, 366 Mont. 107, 285 P.3d 523.

Failure to Object to Payment of Restitution at Sentencing — No Consideration on Appeal: As a part of his sentencing for felony intimidation, the defendant was ordered to pay restitution for the cost of his victim's past and future counseling. Although the presentence investigation (PSI) did not contemplate restitution, the District Court ordered at the sentencing hearing that the defendant pay restitution for the victim's counseling costs. On appeal, the defendant claimed that the District Court erred in ordering the payment of restitution because the PSI did not address restitution, but because the defendant did not object to the award of restitution at the hearing, the Supreme Court declined to address the defendant's challenge to restitution. However, the Supreme Court nevertheless remanded the case to the District Court to comply with 46-18-244 (1999) and to specify the amount the defendant would have to pay for future counseling costs. St. v. Johnson, 2011 MT 286, 362 Mont. 473, 235 P.3d 638, followed in St. v. Simpson, 2014 MT 175, 375 Mont. 393, 328 P.3d 1144.

Failure of Defendant to Object to Lack of Loss Affidavit at Sentencing Hearing — Restitution Properly Assessed: Following sentencing and assessment of restitution, Schmidt objected to the state's failure to include an affidavit substantiating the amount of a victim's pecuniary loss in the presentence investigation report. However, Schmidt did not object to the lack of an affidavit at the sentencing hearing or to the necessity, amount, or calculation of restitution until receiving an unfavorable sentence. The Supreme Court held that the imposition of restitution met statutory requirements and affirmed. St. v. Schmidt, 2009 MT 450, 354 M 280, 224 P3d 618 (2009).

Report Containing List of Victim's Medical Expenses Insufficient to Serve as Victim-Submitted Affidavit: A presentence investigation report set out the medical expenses paid by or on behalf of a crime victim, but no documentation or evidence of payment was included. The Supreme Court concluded that the report was not sufficient in form and substance to serve as the victim-submitted affidavit of medical expenses required under 46-18-242(1)(b) to form the basis for establishing the amount of restitution owed by defendant for the victim's medical expenses. St. v. Hunt, 2009 MT 265, 352 M 70, 214 P3d 1234 (2009). See also McDermott v. Carie, LLC, 2005 MT 293, 329 M 295, 124 P3d 168 (2005).

Affidavit Required: The state charged Smietanka with the felony offense of sexual intercourse without consent. Smietanka and the state subsequently entered into a plea agreement pursuant to which the state agreed to amend the information to charge misdemeanor offenses of assault and negligent endangerment and eliminate the sexual intercourse without consent offense. The state further agreed to recommend that the District Court sentence Smietanka to a 6-month suspended sentence on each count, with the sentences to run concurrently, and with credit for 200 days for time served in jail. In return, Smietanka agreed to plead guilty to the two misdemeanor offenses and to pay a fine, public defender fees, and costs as determined by the court. Smietanka appeared in District Court and pleaded guilty to the two misdemeanor offenses. The court accepted the guilty pleas and proceeded directly to sentencing. The state then recommended a 6-month suspended sentence on the assault offense and a concurrent 12-month suspended sentence on the negligent endangerment offense, with 200 days credit for time served. The state also requested that the court impose restitution payable to the Montana Department of Justice's crime victims compensation program (CVCP). In support of its request for restitution, the state presented the court with a letter from the CVCP stating that the victim of Smietanka's offenses had filed an application for compensation benefits. The state also called a Deputy County Attorney as a witness, who testified that she had called the CVCP, verified that the CVCP paid $765.98 on behalf of the victim, and made a handwritten notation to that effect at the bottom of the CVCP letter. The District Court sentenced Smietanka on the assault offense to a 6-month suspended term in the Jefferson County jail. It deferred imposition of sentence on the negligent endangerment offense for 2 years. Smietanka was given credit against his sentences for 200 days of time served in jail. The court also imposed restitution of $765.98, public defender fees of $1,000, and various fees and surcharges. The court entered judgment on the convictions and sentences, and Smietanka appealed. Smietanka contended that the state failed to present the District Court with an affidavit from the CVCP specifically describing its alleged pecuniary loss and the state conceded that it failed to present the required affidavit describing the nature of the expenses for which it requested reimbursement. In light of this concession, the District Court erred in ordering Smietanka to pay restitution without adequate documentary support as required by this section. St. v. Smietanka, 2008 MT 357, 346 M 353, 195 P3d 797, (2008).

Determination of Restitution When Amount of Actual Loss Unknown: McMaster admitted taking money from Wright, but the actual amount could not be determined. The District Court received several restitution recommendations ranging from $12,914 proposed in the presentence investigation report to $334,425 based on a cash flow analysis. After considering testimony from numerous experts and from McMaster and Wright, the Court set restitution at $30,000, and McMaster appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. As established in St. v. Benoit, 2002 MT 166, 310 M 449, 51 P3d 495 (2002), a victim may recover losses even though the actual losses are uncertain if the losses are calculated by use of reasonable methods based on the best available evidence. Nothing requires a court or victim to substantiate a restitution calculation with documentation, nor is a court circumscribed from relying on victim testimony presented at a sentencing hearing. The court properly considered McMaster's written statement and Wright's nonexpert undocumented testimony presented at the sentencing hearing. Substantial evidence supported the court's findings and the court did not abuse its discretion when it set restitution at $30,000. St. v. McMaster, 2008 MT 268, 345 M 172, 190 P3d 302 (2008).

Adequate Information in Presentence Investigation Report to Meet Statutory Requirements for Restitution Payments: Kuykendall asserted that his sentence imposing restitution was illegal because the sentencing court failed to consider his financial resources and future ability to pay restitution. Noting the 2003 amendments to this section, the Supreme Court disagreed. The presentence investigation report stated that Kuykendall was unemployed and had no income, no assets, and no debt, and it detailed the losses suffered by the victim. That information was adequate to meet the statutory requirements for setting out Kuykendall's ability to pay restitution. St. v. Kuykendall, 2006 MT 110, 332 M 180, 136 P3d 983 (2006).

Imposition of Restitution Based on Documented Losses Not Violative of Constitutional Prohibition Against Excessive Fines: As set out in St. v. Good, 2004 MT 296, 323 M 378, 100 P3d 644 (2004), a restitution award violates the constitutional prohibition against excessive fines if the award is grossly disproportional to the gravity of the offense. Here, Kuykendall was convicted of criminal endangerment and ordered to pay restitution of over $10,000 to a peace officer who was injured during the crime. Kuykendall asserted that the restitution amount was grossly disproportional to the crime of criminal endangerment, but the Supreme Court disagreed. The amount of loss suffered by the officer was documented and was not refuted by Kuykendall at trial. The sentencing court relied on the only evidence presented at the sentencing hearing, and the amount of restitution ordered was directly related to the amount of loss and thus was not grossly disproportional. The restitution amount was not excessive and was affirmed. St. v. Kuykendall, 2006 MT 110, 332 M 180, 136 P3d 983 (2006).

Restitution Improper Absent Documentation of Victim's Loss: This section requires the sentencing court to consider some documentation of a victim's pecuniary loss, and restitution may not be imposed unless this statutory requirement is satisfied. In this case, absent evidence of the victim's loss in the presentence investigation report or at the sentencing hearing, it was improper to order Hirt to pay restitution to the victim of a sexual assault. St. v. Hirt, 2005 MT 285, 329 M 267, 124 P3d 147 (2005). See also St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000).

Joint and Several Liability for Restitution Properly Imposed: Following conviction for three counts of burglary, the District Court found Workman jointly and severally liable for the full amount of restitution to the burglary victims and ordered Workman to pay restitution in the amount of $26,840.33. Workman was accompanied in the burglaries by four accomplices, and Workman argued that he should be held responsible only for his proportionate share as divided among all the defendants. That argument was rejected, and Workman appealed on grounds that restitution was improperly imposed. Workman relied on the 2001 version of this section, contending that the required documentation of his financial resources was inaccurate, and on the 2001 version of 46-18-244, arguing that the sentencing court failed to establish a payment schedule or set the amount of installment payments. The Supreme Court noted that both the required documentation and payment schedule provisions were deleted by the 2003 Legislature and are no longer required. Workman's argument that restitution should be apportioned among his accomplices also failed because the fate of the accomplices was immaterial to the court's authority to impose restitution. Under the 2003 versions of the restitution laws and given that Workman stipulated that he owed the full amount, the District Court properly held Workman jointly and severally liable for the pecuniary loss suffered by his victims. St. v. Workman, 2005 MT 22, 326 M 1, 107 P3d 462 (2005).

No Prejudice in Property Valuation When Less Than Full Restitution Required: The total losses incurred by individuals and businesses in a fire started by Gilbert was $5,721,684.57. In calculating the value of a building destroyed in the fire for establishing restitution, the District Court used replacement value rather than actual value. Gilbert contended that failure to use actual value was reversible error under St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000). The Supreme Court agreed that actual value should have been used but that Gilbert failed to show that any prejudice resulted from the error. Gilbert's presentence investigation report adequately documented Gilbert's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, and Gilbert was ordered to pay only $24,000 in restitution, which was but a minuscule fraction of the losses. Any error by the District Court in using replacement value for the building did not prejudice Gilbert because he was not required to pay full restitution. St. v. Gilbert, 2004 MT 368, 324 M 530, 106 P3d 127 (2004), following St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

No Standing to Raise Constitutionality of Restitution Statutes Absent Showing of Direct Personal Injury: The 2003 Legislature amended the state restitution statutes, and Thaut sought to challenge the constitutionality of the amendments on numerous grounds. However, Thaut was unable to show a direct personal injury resulting from application of the restitution laws. Pursuant to St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298 (1990), and Helena Parents Comm'n v. Lewis & Clark County Comm'rs, 277 M 367, 922 P2d 1140 (1996), Thaut lacked standing to challenge the constitutionality of the restitution statutes, and the Supreme Court declined to address the issue. St. v. Thaut, 2004 MT 359, 324 M 460, 103 P3d 1012 (2004). See also St. v. Ellis, 2007 MT 210, 339 M 14, 167 P3d 896 (2007), in which defendant established direct economic injury and thus standing to challenge the constitutionality of repayment conditions on equal protection grounds through the District Court's order to repay $2,398 in costs of appointed counsel.

Restitution Order Proper Given Defendant's Ability to Pay: The sentencing court ordered Thaut to pay $69,457 in restitution. Thaut appealed the award on grounds that the court failed to meet statutory requirements establishing Thaut's financial resources and future ability to pay and on grounds that due process rights were violated when the court failed to consider several factors in Thaut's ability to pay, including Thaut's age and short time to work following parole, minimum wage employment history, lack of assets and ability to acquire assets in the future, and mental health issues related to an alleged prior head injury. However, the presentence investigation and supplemental presentence investigation provided adequate documentation regarding Thaut's ability to pay restitution and to work hard to earn a living. Further, Thaut had no documented physical limitations and was unemployed only because he was incarcerated. The District Court's determination that Thaut had the ability to pay medical expenses, a grant from the Board of Crime Control, and property damages was amply supported by the record, and the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Thaut, 2004 MT 359, 324 M 460, 103 P3d 1012 (2004).

Failure of Sentencing Court to Establish Restitution Amount — Reversible Error: Following conviction for burglarizing casinos, Eixenberger was ordered by the District Court to pay restitution for losses and damages sustained by the casinos in a sum to be determined, plus interest. Eixenberger challenged the restitution award amount, and the Supreme Court reversed. It was error for the sentencing court to order payment of restitution in an amount to be determined rather than to specify the total amount, as required in 46-18-244. The presentence investigation report also failed to document the victims' pecuniary losses and Eixenberger's resources and ability to pay, as required by this section, so further sentencing proceedings were warranted on remand. St. v. Eixenberger, 2004 MT 127, 321 M 298, 90 P3d 453 (2004).

Restitution Adequately Documented in PSI Report and Information Submitted by Victim: Heath contended that the presentence investigation report (PSI) contained insufficient information to document his ability to pay restitution and the victim's pecuniary loss, citing St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098 (1994), St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866 (1999), and St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000). The Supreme Court distinguished Brown, Hilgers, and Pritchett on grounds that the PSI report deficiencies in those cases were not present in Heath's case. Rather, the court followed St. v. Flanagan, 2003 MT 123, 316 M 1, 68 P3d 796 (2003), and St. v. Dunkerson, 2003 MT 234, 317 M 228, 76 P3d 1085 (2003), finding that the PSI report adequately addressed Heath's employability, assets and debts, and capability of paying restitution. The valuation of the victim's pecuniary loss was adequately provided in documentation submitted by the victim and, coupled with expert testimony on the value of recovered items, provided substantial credible evidence upon which to base the restitution amount. St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004). See also St. v. Passwater, 2015 MT 159, 379 Mont. 372, 351 P.3d 382, in which the life care plan submitted with the presentence investigation provided an adequate basis for setting the amount of restitution.

Restitution Sentence Proper Despite Failure to List Pecuniary Loss in Presentence Investigation Report — Remand to Determine Restitution When Amount Undetermined: Following Dunkerson's conviction for theft and burglary, the District Court ordered restitution for the victim. The presentence investigation (PSI) report listed the loss as an undetermined amount. Failure of a PSI report to document a victim's pecuniary loss and the offender's ability to pay renders a restitution sentence illegal, although a full evidentiary hearing can vitiate the need for loss documentation in a PSI report. Here, the PSI report noted that the victim needed more time to accurately account for restitution owed, which satisfied the loss requirement of this section, so the District Court did not err in ordering restitution even though the amount of restitution was not in the PSI report. However, the court did err by not specifying the amount owed and the time and method of payment, so the case was remanded to determine the amount and method of payment pursuant to 46-18-244. St. v. Dunkerson, 2003 MT 234, 317 M 228, 76 P3d 1085 (2003).

Failure of Presentence Report to Document Restitution Concerns — Payment of Restitution at Discretion of Probation Officer Improper: Following a sexual assault conviction, Flanagan was ordered to pay for all offense-related medical and counseling costs, after payment by the victim's insurance, and all future costs for the next 2 years. Flanagan asserted that the restitution plan was illegal based on St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000), because the presentence investigation report did not document Flanagan's monthly expenses or address his future ability to pay restitution and because the development of a restitution schedule was left to the discretion of the probation officer. The Supreme Court agreed and remanded for addition to the presentence report of documentation of Flanagan's monthly expenses and future ability to pay restitution and to allow the District Court to hold a hearing to enter a sentence and judgment addressing Flanagan's ability to pay and the time of restitution payments. St. v. Flanagan, 2003 MT 123, 316 M 1, 68 P3d 796 (2003).

District Court Error in Postponing Determination of Restitution: The District Court provided that as a condition of probation, restitution would be an amount stipulated by counsel and approved by the court. The Supreme Court held that 46-18-241 and this section require the trial court to establish the amount of restitution and terms of payment at the time of sentencing and remanded the case to the District Court for a determination of restitution. Gilbert v. St., 2002 MT 258, 312 M 189, 59 P3d 24 (2002).

Imposition of Restitution Upon Satisfaction of Statutory Procedures: Benoit was convicted of felony theft for falsifying voided transactions and customer discounts while employed at a restaurant over a 1½-year period. Benoit was ordered to pay $15,933.90 in restitution to the employer, based on calculations by the business manager who examined transaction records during the time that Benoit was on duty, and estimated the business's pecuniary losses. Benoit contested the restitution award on grounds that documentation of the victim's pecuniary loss was not provided in the presentence investigation or at the restitution hearing and that because the restitution amounts were speculative, the District Court had no authority to impose restitution. The Supreme Court noted that a sentencing court is required to impose a sentence that includes full restitution if the victim is found to have sustained a pecuniary loss, but restitution may not be imposed unless the procedures in 46-18-241 through 46-18-249 are satisfied. Failure of a presentence investigation to document a victim's loss and the offender's financial resources and ability to pay restitution, as required in this section, renders the judgment illegal, but that information was included in the presentence report in this case. Therefore, the District Court did have authority to impose restitution. Further, although the actual losses resulting from Benoit's admitted theft could not be determined with certainty, the method employed in calculating the loss was reasonable based on the best evidence available under the circumstances. The employer was entitled to recover its estimated pecuniary losses, plus reasonable out-of-pocket expenses incurred in cooperating in the investigation and prosecution of the case, including wages paid to three employees who assisted in calculating restitution. St. v. Benoit, 2002 MT 166, 310 M 449, 51 P3d 495 (2002), followed in St. v. O'Connor, 2009 MT 222, 351 M 329, 212 P3d 276 (2009), and in St. v. Dodson, 2011 MT 302, 363 Mont. 63, 265 P.3d 1254, with regard to reasonableness of the method employed in calculating the loss based on the best evidence available under the circumstances. However, see St. v. Johnson, 2011 MT 286, 362 Mont. 473, 235 P.3d 638 (declining to address a challenge to a restitution award when the defendant failed to object to the imposition of restitution at his sentencing hearing). See also St. v. O'Connell, 2011 MT 242, 362 Mont. 171, 261 P.3d 1042, which held that the District Court erred in ordering the defendant to pay lost profits as part of the defendant's restitution obligation when the evidence presented was not calculated by the use of reasonable methods based on the best evidence available under the circumstances.

Failure to Document Victim's Pecuniary Loss and Offender's Financial Resources and Ability to Pay Restitution — Restitution Condition Vacated: Muhammad was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with a minor. One condition of sentencing was a requirement that Muhammad pay $5,000 in restitution. Under 46-18-201, a sentencing judge shall require a defendant to pay full restitution to a victim if the judge finds that the victim has sustained a pecuniary loss. Imposition of restitution is subject to detailed statutory procedures and qualifications, which include documented evidence of the victim's loss and the offender's ability to pay. The sentencing court is required to specify the amount, method, and time of each payment to the victim. Here, the presentence investigation did not document the victim's pecuniary loss or Muhammad's future ability to pay restitution, nor did the sentencing court consider Muhammad's future ability to pay because the relevant evidence was not presented to the court. Therefore, the Supreme Court held that the restitution condition of the sentence was illegal, and that condition was vacated. St. v. Muhammad, 2002 MT 47, 309 M 1, 43 P3d 318 (2002), following St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000), and followed in St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007).

Failure to Document Defendant's Financial Resources and Ability to Pay Restitution and Victim's Pecuniary Loss — Restitution Sentence Improper: The general mandate to sentencing courts is that a sentence must include full restitution whenever it is found that the victim of an offense has sustained a pecuniary loss, subject to mandatory detailed statutory procedures and qualifications. Here, although the District Court received some evidence of these amounts during the sentencing hearing, the failure of the presentence investigation report to document the victim's pecuniary loss, as well as the defendant's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, provided the court no authority to impose a sentence of restitution and rendered its judgment illegal. St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000), following St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098 (1994), and St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866 (1999), and distinguished in St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004). See also St. v. Johnson, 2011 MT 116, 360 Mont. 443, 254 P.3d 578, followed in St. v. Simpson, 2014 MT 175, 375 Mont. 393, 328 P.3d 1144.

When Restitution Owing: Under 46-18-201, the sentencing court is required to provide for full restitution by a defendant to the victim of a criminal offense who sustains a pecuniary loss. Here, Hilgers' issuance of more than 50 bad checks and stealing cash and diverting checks and money orders from his employer in an amount exceeding $33,500 clearly qualified as a pecuniary loss. The court found the state's witnesses more credible than Hilgers, providing adequate support in the record as to the amount owing. The restitution amount was not clearly erroneous and was affirmed on appeal. However, the Supreme Court remanded for lack of documentation, as required under this section, regarding Hilgers' financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, finding the information in the presentence report regarding Hilgers' age, education, assets and obligations, and marital and employment status inadequate in addressing Hilgers' resources and ability to pay the amount in question. St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866, 56 St. Rep. 1146 (1999), following St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996), distinguishing St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098, 51 St. Rep. 24 (1994), followed in St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000), and distinguished in St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004). See also St. v. Johnson, 2011 MT 116, 360 Mont. 443, 254 P.3d 578, followed in St. v. Simpson, 2014 MT 175, 375 Mont. 393, 328 P.3d 1144.

Financial Resources and Future Ability to Pay Restitution Properly Considered: In imposing interest on Brewer's restitution obligation, Brewer contended that the court did not properly consider her financial resources and future ability to pay restitution or specify the amount, method, and time of each payment, as required by 46-18-244. At the sentencing hearing, Brewer testified that: (1) she had obtained two jobs; (2) because her husband's wages covered the household expenses, she intended to put all her wages toward restitution; and (3) she had already made nearly $6,000 in restitution payments and intended to continue the payments. Based on this testimony, the District Court properly considered Brewer's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution in ordering repayment according to a schedule of repayment arrived at with the probation officer. St. v. Brewer, 1999 MT 269, 296 M 453, 989 P2d 407, 56 St. Rep. 1090 (1999).

Presentence Investigation Inadequate to Support Restitution — Restitution Order Inadequate: Brown was convicted of felony criminal endangerment and negligent homicide after killing one pedestrian and injuring another when he lost control of his vehicle. The District Court ordered Brown to make restitution to the one victim and to the families of both victims. The presentence investigation report contained no documentation of the pecuniary loss of either victim and inadequate documentation of Brown's financial resources, especially his future earning capacity. The Supreme Court noted that as probable consequences of these errors, the District Court's order for restitution did not require Brown to pay a specific amount at a specific time. For these reasons, the Supreme Court held that the order could not lawfully be made and remanded the case to the District Court. St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098, 51 St. Rep. 24 (1994), distinguished in St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866, 56 St. Rep. 1146 (1999), in which the failure of the presentence investigation to set forth the amount of restitution was not considered fatal because defendant was given a hearing and because defendant had entered a plea bargain providing that the amount was to be agreed upon by the parties prior to sentencing and if the parties were unable to agree on an amount, it would be determined by the court, and St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004), and followed in St. v. Rinkenbach, 2003 MT 348, 318 M 499, 82 P3d 8 (2003).

Restitution Proper Only if Sentence Deferred or Suspended: The Supreme Court vacated the lower court's restitution order on the basis that no portion of the defendant's sentence was deferred or suspended as is required by the statute before restitution can be ordered. St. v. Mazurkiewicz, 245 M 172, 799 P2d 1066, 47 St. Rep. 1962 (1990), distinguished in St. v. Bourne, 259 M 274, 855 P2d 222, 50 St. Rep. 791 (1993), in which restitution was clearly attendant to conditions of parole if and when parole occurred.

Case Notes

Workers' Compensation Insurer Entitled to Restitution for Pecuniary Loss — Defendant's Financial Situation Made Payment of Restitution Unjust: The defendant pleaded guilty to the offense of misdemeanor assault for striking a peace officer while waiting for an initial appearance in Justice Court in another matter. The plea agreement called for the defendant to pay restitution to the Montana State Fund (MSF) for its workers' compensation payments to the peace officer and medical providers. The defendant argued at the restitution hearing that MSF was not a victim under 46-18-243 because it had not suffered a pecuniary loss, that the statute did not authorize payment of general damages, and that she was unable to afford and would be unduly burdened by the full amount of restitution suggested. The District Court held that MSF qualified as a victim insurer and thus was entitled to the full amount of restitution within 5 months of the sentence. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that MSF was entitled to restitution for pecuniary loss. However, the Supreme Court reversed the District Court's failure to waive restitution pursuant to 46-18-246, reasoning that the uncontroverted evidence of the defendant's dire financial situation made it otherwise unjust to require the defendant to pay the restitution imposed. St. v. Lodahl, 2021 MT 156, 404 Mont. 362, 491 P.3d 661.

Drug Charges — Restitution for Entire Cost of Remediation of Apartment Reversed — Inadequate Evidence Criminal Conduct Caused Damage: The defendant pleaded guilty to drug-related offenses after police officers found numerous drugs and drug paraphernalia not only in his room but throughout the apartment the defendant shared with three other people. The District Court ordered the defendant to pay restitution in an amount equal to the entire cost of remediating the apartment due to methamphetamine contamination. The defendant appealed, arguing that the state had not proven that he alone had caused the entirety of the damage to the apartment. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that there was insufficient evidence of a causal connection between the criminal conduct to which the defendant had pleaded guilty and the apartment renovation expenses. St. v. Cole, 2020 MT 259, 401 Mont. 502, 474 P.3d 323.

Pecuniary Loss Includes Special Damages: The defendant in a felony criminal mischief case argued that restitution of $937.69, representing the replacement cost of the items damaged, was all that was permitted by law. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court, noting that 46-18-243 specifically includes special damages and, in this case, special damages included $2,817.78 of employee expenses for which evidence was provided at the sentencing hearing. St. v. Higgins, 2020 MT 52, 399 Mont. 148, 458 P.3d 1036.

Generic Reference to Earlier Brief Insufficient to Preserve Due Process Claim for Appeal: The defendant was convicted of embezzling money from her bank employer. At the initial sentencing hearing, the defendant objected to the state's request for restitution, claiming most of the requested restitution was for costs incurred in furtherance of litigation, rather than recovery of the embezzled funds. After requesting briefs from the parties with a possible evidentiary hearing only if there was a factual dispute about the amount claimed, the District Court rejected that argument, holding the claimed amounts were compensable under subsections (1)(a) and (1)(d) of this section. At the final sentencing hearing when the bank provided updated amounts for its claimed expenses, the defendant made a generic statement of objection to the restitution and referenced the defendant's original position in the brief. The District Court ordered restitution for the bank's updated amount. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the defendant had failed to preserve a due process challenge. St. v. Johns, 2019 MT 292, 398 Mont. 152, 454 P.3d 692.

Deduction of Payout From Offender's Insurance: A criminal defendant who injured three people was ordered to pay restitution. No deduction was made for insurance payouts to the victims from the defendant's insurance company. On appeal, the Supreme Court distinguished this case from St. v. Fenner, 2014 MT 131, 375 Mont. 131, 325 P.3d 691, in which an injured person's own insurance was not deducted from restitution payments, and stated that insurance payouts from the offender's insurance should be deducted from a restitution award to avoid double recovery. The Supreme Court remanded for a deduction of insurance payments. St. v. Santoro, 2019 MT 192, 397 Mont. 19, 446 P.3d 1141.

Wages as Pecuniary Damages: An employee with a company laptop stopped showing up for work, did not return the laptop, and did not give work conducted on the laptop to the company. The District Court adjudged the employee guilty of embezzlement and ordered restitution payments, including payments for wages paid to other employees to recreate his work, reimbursement of wages paid to him, and the billable value of hours others spent cooperating with law enforcement. The employee appealed that some of these things were not pecuniary damages authorized by 46-18-243. The Supreme Court affirmed in part and reversed in part, noting that as a general rule wages paid to a defendant are not recoverable as restitution and that the wage payments to persons cooperating with law enforcement can be pecuniary damages but their billable hours cannot. St. v. Lowry, 2019 MT 191, 397 Mont. 11, 446 P.3d 1148.

Animal Cruelty — Sufficient Evidence to Support County Costs of Boarding Animals: The defendant was charged with several counts of animal cruelty related to the operation of a dog kennel, and the animals were taken to a number of shelters. After being convicted, the defendant was sentenced to pay the costs to the county for caring for the animals. The defendant disputed the amount of costs, stating that the county would have incurred some of the included costs regardless of her case, and she appealed that portion of the costs. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that all of the costs were reasonably supported by the evidence. St. v. Warren, 2019 MT 49, 395 Mont. 15, 439 P.3d 357.

Award of Lost Wages as Restitution Only if Recoverable in Related Civil Action — Discovery Request Too Broad Without Demonstration of Substantial Need: The defendant was convicted of criminal mischief and cruelty to animals for fatally shooting a family's dog. During sentencing, the District Court ordered the defendant to pay $9,357 in restitution. The amount included the family's replacement of the dog, medical bills, lost wages for time spent cooperating with the prosecution, and traveling expenses. On appeal, the defendant argued that the lost wages were not included within the statutory scope of restitution, that the medical bills did not arise out of his activities, and that he should have been allowed to conduct discovery to analyze the bills claimed by the family. The Supreme Court reversed in part, holding that lost wages did not constitute out-of-pocket expenses in 46-18-243 and that unless a person could recover the wages in a civil action arising out of the same facts, they could not constitute restitution, and affirmed in part, holding that the defendant's broad discovery motion was properly denied because he did not demonstrate a substantial need. St. v. Barrick, 2015 MT 94, 378 Mont. 441, 347 P.3d 241.

Adequate Definition of Security for Jury — Willful Conduct Standard Applicable to Securities Act Violations — Omission of Investment Prospectus Not Fraudulent at Time — Securities Restitution Properly Awarded: The defendant, a pastor, was approached by the plaintiff, a member of his congregation, about investing money. The defendant convinced the plaintiff to purchase stock in the defendant's Mexico-domiciled company. Ultimately, the investment promises never materialized and the defendant was convicted of failure to register as a securities salesperson, failure to register a security, and fraudulent practices under the Securities Act of Montana. On appeal, the defendant argued that the term "security" was not adequately or specifically defined for the jury, that the "willful" standard was inappropriate to attach to the charges, that the conviction of fraudulent practices was improper because neither the statute nor administrative rule required an investment prospectus at the time of the violation, and that the award of restitution was improper. The Supreme Court held that the evidence showed that the jury reasonably concluded that the defendant had sold a security because the shares in the company constituted a stock, that the Legislature specifically included a willful standard for Securities Act violations, that the fraudulent practices conviction was improper because failure to provide a prospectus was not part of the statute at the time, and that the award of restitution was proper because the loss stemmed directly from the defendant's conduct. St. v. Himes, 2015 MT 91, 378 Mont. 419, 345 P.3d 297.

Getaway Driver Accountable for Robbery — Restitution Not Specified by District Court — Sentence Greater Than Under Failed Plea Agreement: The defendant was convicted of accountability for robbery after serving as the getaway driver. The defendant originally agreed with the state to a 20-year sentence with 15 years suspended. This agreement was withdrawn because the District Court did not agree to the terms. After trial, the District Court ordered restitution to be determined at a later date, sentenced the defendant to 30 years in prison with 10 suspended, and required the defendant to register as a violent offender. On appeal, the defendant argued that restitution must be specified by the District Court, that imposing a greater sentence after trial was improper, and that it was improper to require registration as a violent offender because he was convicted of accountability. The Supreme Court agreed with the defendant regarding restitution and remanded for a determination. However, the Supreme Court found that the District Court properly sentenced the defendant by giving specific reasons for the sentence imposed and that the defendant's crime qualified as a violent offense under the Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act. St. v. Hanna, 2014 MT 346, 377 Mont. 418, 341 P.3d 629.

No Reduction in Restitution for Portion Paid by Medical Insurer — Restitution Order Proper: The defendant pleaded guilty to assault with a weapon and criminal mischief for attacking another motorist but challenged the District Court's order requiring him to pay $6,418.33 in restitution to the victim for medical and dental expenses related to the assault, claiming that the amount should be reduced because the victim's insurer had reimbursed the victim for a portion of the expenses. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that because the restitution statutes reflect an intent to require an offender to make full restitution to any victim who has sustained pecuniary loss, the defendant was not entitled to a reduction in the amount of restitution ordered by the District Court. St. v. Fenner, 2014 MT 131, 375 Mont. 131, 325 P.3d 691.

Restitution Not Required for Victims' Tax Liabilities Incurred With or Without Crime: The District Court ordered the defendant to pay restitution as a condition of a deferred sentence for felony theft. The defendant appealed the portion of the restitution that included the victims' income and excise tax liabilities and the victims' attorney fees in obtaining advice about dealing with the tax consequences of the defendant's crime. The Supreme Court reversed the District Court in part, concluding the defendant should not be required to make restitution for the income tax liabilities that the victims had faced or would face upon receiving monetary restitution, because the victims were subject to that tax liability with or without the defendant's crime. The Supreme Court also affirmed the District Court in part, concluding that restitution was proper for: (1) the victims' excise tax liability for early withdrawal of retirement money that the victims would not have faced, but for the defendant's crime; and (2) the victims' attorney fees that were incurred to address and rectify the effects of the defendant's criminal conduct. St. v. Cerasani, 2014 MT 2, 373 Mont. 192, 316 P.3d 819.

State Not "Victim" Eligible for Restitution: A District Court ordered a defendant who pleaded guilty to sexual assault to pay restitution to the state for the costs of extraditing him from New Mexico. The defendant appealed the order for restitution. The Supreme Court reversed, concluding that the state did not qualify as a "victim" under 46-18-243 and was not eligible to receive restitution for costs related to his extradition. St. v. Brothers, 2013 MT 222, 371 Mont. 254, 307 P.3d 306, followed in St. v. Macy, 2014 MT 34, 374 Mont. 8, 318 P.3d 706.

State Not Victim for Restitution Purposes — Expenses of Interviewing Witnesses: The state was not a victim entitled to restitution when the state did not suffer from property damage or incur costs in apprehending the defendant but, rather, incurred expenses when interviewing a potential defense witness. St. v. Jay, 2013 MT 79, 369 Mont. 332, 298 P.3d 396.

Award of Restitution When Causation Not Element of Offense — No Error — Sworn Testimony at Restitution Hearing Sufficient Evidence to Support Amount Awarded: The defendant was involved in a collision between her vehicle and the victim's bicycle, but because she apparently was unaware of the collision, she drove away from the scene of the accident. After a jury found the defendant guilty of failure to remain at the scene of an accident in violation of 61-7-103 and failure to notify authorities of an accident in violation of 61-7-108, the defendant's sentence included an order to pay the victim $4,148.60 in restitution. The defendant appealed the award of restitution on the grounds that neither of the two charges she was convicted of included causation as an element. The Supreme Court concluded that because the lower court properly found that the victim's losses resulted from the defendant's commission of the offenses, there was no error in awarding restitution, even though causation was not an element of either offense, and held that the victim's sworn testimony at the restitution hearing provided sufficient substantive evidence to support the amount of the award. Billings v. Edward, 2012 MT 186, 366 Mont. 107, 285 P.3d 523.

State as Victim of Crime — Restitution Owed: Brownback's mother engaged in a 6-year scheme to embezzle money from the state and then pass the money on to Brownback to support his gambling addiction. An investigation into his mother's embezzlement led to charges against Brownback for theft by common scheme. Following conviction, Brownback was ordered to pay nearly $1 million in restitution, including $739,312 to the state for the money his mother embezzled and passed on to him. Brownback contested the restitution award on grounds that he did not know that the money he received from his mother was embezzled from the state. The Supreme Court affirmed the restitution award. But for Brownback's continuing course of conduct, the state would not have lost $739,312. The causation standard for restitution was therefore satisfied, and because the state was a victim that suffered pecuniary loss, the state was entitled to full restitution. Even though Brownback thought the money was coming from his stepfather rather than the state, Brownback knew all along that he was obtaining unauthorized control over the property of the owner, so Brownback's ignorance that the money was embezzled from the state did not negate the mental state for theft. A person may not steal property from a stranger with impunity, so Brownback's mistake as to the identity of the source of the money did not affect the causal relationship. St. v. Brownback, 2010 MT 96, 356 Mont. 190, 232 P.3d 385, distinguishing St. v. Breeding, 2008 MT 162, 343 Mont. 323, 184 P.3d 313.

Expenses Recoverable in Civil Action Properly Imposed as Restitution — Sufficient Evidence of Restitution Amount: Essig was convicted of stalking and sentenced to pay restitution of $5,582.03, including counseling expenses for the victim's children, blood testing for one of the children, and the cost of six memory cards for a digital camera. Essig contested the restitution and the amount, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Under 46-18-243, pecuniary loss includes general damages that a person could recover in a civil action against the defendant. In this case, the evidence showed that the expenses could have been recovered in a civil action by the victim and thus were legally imposed as restitution. The value of the various items was supported by the evidence and their inclusion as restitution was not erroneous. St. v. Essig, 2009 MT 340, 353 M 99, 218 P3d 838 (2009). However, see St. v. Johnson, 2011 MT 286, 362 Mont. 473, 235 P.3d 638 (declining to address a challenge to a restitution award when the defendant failed to object to the imposition of restitution at his sentencing hearing).

Sufficient Connection Between Victim of Vehicle Accident and Evidence Tampering to Warrant Defendant's Payment of Victim's Funeral Expenses as Restitution: Sherman was thrown from her car in a vehicle accident, and as she lay in the road, she was struck and killed by Ness's vehicle. Ness did not stop and subsequently repaired and washed his car in an effort to conceal evidence of the accident. Ness was convicted of tampering with evidence and ordered to pay $3,500 for Sherman's funeral expenses as restitution. Ness challenged the restitution on grounds that because Sherman was not a victim of the evidence tampering conviction, there was no nexus between the crime and the restitution. The Supreme Court disagreed. Pursuant to St. v. LaTray, 2000 MT 262, 302 M 11, 11 P3d 116 (2000), classification of a person as a victim for purposes of ordering restitution does not depend on the person's relationship to the elements of the crime for which the defendant is convicted. In this case, restitution for Sherman's funeral expenses was not wholly unrelated to Ness's crime, and the expenses were based on Ness's involvement, which created a nexus between restitution and the crime. Because the funeral expenses were paid to Sherman's estate directly out of the crime victims compensation account, that account was entitled to $3,500 restitution. St. v. Ness, 2009 MT 300, 352 M 317, 216 P3d 773 (2009). See also St. v. Jent, 2013 MT 93, 369 Mont. 468, 299 P.3d 332, ordering the defendant to pay for medical bills related to the victim's later suicide attempt following his assault on the victim.

Restitution Proper for Felony Criminal Endangerment: As part of Perkins' plea agreement on a charge of felony criminal endangerment, the state was allowed to seek restitution, and the sentencing court assessed $5,947 in restitution. Perkins appealed. The state conceded that $78.44 was not supported by documentation, but the Supreme Court held that there was sufficient legal authority for the sentencing court to impose restitution as part of the sentence. Therefore, the restitution award was affirmed but was reduced by $78.44. St. v. Perkins, 2009 MT 150, 350 M 387, 208 P3d 386 (2009).

Mitigation of Damages as Restitution for Criminal Activity — Additional Restitution of Loss of Income Warranted: Kalal was convicted of theft of a tractor; he received a 2-year deferred sentence and was ordered to pay restitution for the value of the tractor and other stolen property. Kalal satisfied the restitution obligation, but Petranek, the victim of the theft, sought additional restitution for loss of income because he had anticipated using the tractor for various income-producing activities, including building a fence, building a cabin, and seeding land for grass production and farming. The District Court noted that other tractors could be rented, but that Petranek's limited availability to work on projects presented serious impediments to renting a tractor. The court thus determined that Petranek suffered a loss of income for summer grazing and cabin rental in the amount of $15,960. Kalal appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Applying precedents from the fields of tort and contract law, the court recognized that an injured person is not expected to do what is unreasonable or impracticable, so the applicable standard is what would a reasonable and prudent person be expected to do, if capable, under the circumstances. While recognizing the duty to mitigate damages, the District Court correctly reasoned that no reasonable person could be expected to spend money or time that the person does not have to mitigate an injury for which the person is not responsible. Therefore, under these circumstances and given the impracticability and expense of renting and transporting a tractor a long distance for short periods of time, the restitution award of $15,960 for Petranek's loss of income was reasonable. St. v. Kalal, 2009 MT 103, 350 M 128, 204 P3d 1240 (2009).

Drug Task Force Considered Victim of Drug Offense — Restitution to Task Force as Part of Plea Agreement Affirmed: As part of a plea agreement on a drug charge, Jones agreed to pay $125 in restitution to the Eastern Montana Drug Task Force. Jones later appealed the restitution condition on grounds that it was illegal because the task force was not a victim of the drug distribution offense. The Supreme Court disagreed. Because Jones agreed in the plea agreement to pay restitution to the task force, the task force was a victim, as defined in 46-18-243(2)(a)(vi), to whom the sentencing court could require Jones to pay restitution. St. v. Jones, 2008 MT 440, 347 M 512, 199 P3d 216 (2008), distinguishing St. v. Krum, 2007 MT 229, 339 M 154, 168 P3d 658 (2007).

Determination of Restitution When Amount of Actual Loss Unknown: McMaster admitted taking money from Wright, but the actual amount could not be determined. The District Court received several restitution recommendations ranging from $12,914 proposed in the presentence investigation report to $334,425 based on a cash flow analysis. After considering testimony from numerous experts and from McMaster and Wright, the Court set restitution at $30,000, and McMaster appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. As established in St. v. Benoit, 2002 MT 166, 310 M 449, 51 P3d 495 (2002), a victim may recover losses even though the actual losses are uncertain if the losses are calculated by use of reasonable methods based on the best available evidence. Nothing requires a court or victim to substantiate a restitution calculation with documentation, nor is a court circumscribed from relying on victim testimony presented at a sentencing hearing. The court properly considered McMaster's written statement and Wright's nonexpert undocumented testimony presented at the sentencing hearing. Substantial evidence supported the court's findings and the court did not abuse its discretion when it set restitution at $30,000. St. v. McMaster, 2008 MT 268, 345 M 172, 190 P3d 302 (2008).

Defendant Not Involved in Initial Vehicle Theft or Damage — Restitution Not Owing: Seghetti stole a vehicle and picked up Breeding and another friend for a ride, during which the vehicle was damaged while Seghetti was driving. Seghetti then revealed that the vehicle was stolen, and Breeding suggested driving the vehicle to California. During the trip, Breeding and Seghetti shared the driving. California police stopped the vehicle for a broken turn signal, and Breeding and Seghetti were subsequently charged with and convicted of felony theft. At sentencing, the District Court ordered that Breeding pay restitution for damage to the vehicle. Asserting that he was not driving when the damage occurred and thus was not responsible for the damage, Breeding appealed the restitution order. The Supreme Court reversed. Without a causal connection between Breeding's commission of theft and the damage inflicted earlier by Seghetti, there was no basis for requiring Breeding to pay restitution for that damage, so the District Court was ordered to strike the restitution requirement from Breeding's sentence. St. v. Breeding, 2008 MT 162, 343 M 323, 184 P3d 313 (2008). See also St. v. Cole, 2020 MT 259, 401 Mont. 502, 474 P.3d 323, in which restitution was reversed when the state failed to prove causal nexus.

Reimbursement to Insurer That Reimbursed Victim Affirmed: An insurer that reimbursed a victim for pecuniary loss had the right of subrogation to the extent of the reimbursement, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in ordering defendant to pay restitution to the insurer to make the insurer whole. St. v. Sharp, 2006 MT 301, 334 M 470, 148 P3d 625 (2006).

Restitution Owing Under Youth Court Act — Market Value Versus Replacement Cost — Deduction of Salvage Value From Restitution Amount: T.M.R., a youth, stole a vehicle from his friend's parents' garage and went for a joyride. The vehicle was destroyed, and the youth was placed on probation and ordered to pay restitution. The parties disagreed on the amount of restitution owed. The Supreme Court noted that prior to the 2003 amendments to adult sentencing statutes, restitution was consistently based on market value if it could be ascertained. Unlike the adult sentencing statutes, the Montana Youth Court Act was not amended in 2003 to include replacement cost as a way to determine restitution. Thus, the court concluded that the more equitable and consistent approach to determine restitution under the Act was to measure damages based on market value. The court noted that the victims received $500 in salvage value for the vehicle and also held that the restitution amount should be reduced by the amount of salvage received. In re T.M.R., 2006 MT 246, 334 M 64, 144 P3d 809 (2006).

Restitution Proper for Insurance Fraud: Borsberry was convicted of insurance fraud and ordered to pay restitution of $22,997.52 to the insurer in repayment of the fraudulently obtained amount. Borsberry appealed on grounds that restitution was not proper because the insurer was not a victim who suffered a pecuniary loss. The Supreme Court disagreed. Borsberry's policy contained a provision that his policy would be voided if a fraudulent claim was filed. The insurer paid the fraudulent claim under a reservation of rights and suffered a pecuniary loss based on Borsberry's criminal activity. Under Tyler v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 255 M 174, 841 P2d 538 (1992), insurance payments made under fraudulent claims entitle the insurer to restitution in the amount of the payments. The restitution fell within statutory parameters and was affirmed. St. v. Borsberry, 2006 MT 126, 332 M 271, 136 P3d 993 (2006).

No Prejudice in Property Valuation When Less Than Full Restitution Required: The total losses incurred by individuals and businesses in a fire started by Gilbert was $5,721,684.57. In calculating the value of a building destroyed in the fire for establishing restitution, the District Court used replacement value rather than actual value. Gilbert contended that failure to use actual value was reversible error under St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000). The Supreme Court agreed that actual value should have been used but that Gilbert failed to show that any prejudice resulted from the error. Gilbert's presentence investigation report adequately documented Gilbert's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, and Gilbert was ordered to pay only $24,000 in restitution, which was but a minuscule fraction of the losses. Any error by the District Court in using replacement value for the building did not prejudice Gilbert because he was not required to pay full restitution. St. v. Gilbert, 2004 MT 368, 324 M 530, 106 P3d 127 (2004), following St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Cost of Installing Surveillance Equipment Subject to Restitution as Pecuniary Loss Incurred in Cooperation in Investigation of Offense: Good, convicted of assault, argued that the District Court erred in requiring him to pay restitution for surveillance equipment installed by Huseby at the insistence of law enforcement officials after Huseby was assaulted and subjected to other abuse by Good, who lived next door to him at the time. Prior to his conviction for assault, Good had obtained a court order for the removal of the equipment as an invasion of his family's privacy. The Supreme Court held that the cost of the surveillance equipment did fit the statutory definition of pecuniary loss in this section as a cost incurred in cooperating with law enforcement in the investigation of an offense and therefore was a cost for which restitution could be ordered. St. v. Good, 2004 MT 296, 323 M 378, 100 P3d 644 (2004).

Mortgage Payments Subject to Restitution as Pecuniary Losses That Would Be Compensable in Civil Action: Good, convicted of assault, argued that the District Court erred in requiring him to pay restitution for mortgage payments made by Huseby on his former residence, which Huseby was unable to rent, when Huseby moved from that residence and purchased a new home after being assaulted and subjected to other abuse by Good, who lived next door to him at the time. The Supreme Court held that although Good may not have been able to predict that his behavior would lead to Huseby's moving, Good's abominable behavior was the proximate cause of the move and would have been compensable in civil court and therefore was subject to a restitution order as a pecuniary loss as defined in this section. St. v. Good, 2004 MT 296, 323 M 378, 100 P3d 644 (2004).

Restitution Properly Ordered When Dismissed Charges Related to Charge for Which Defendant Convicted: McIntire was charged with felony burglary, misdemeanor theft, and misdemeanor forgery. Pursuant to a plea agreement, McIntire pleaded guilty to the burglary charge and the other charges were dismissed. The trial court ordered McIntire to pay restitution, but McIntire contended that because the forgery charges were dismissed, restitution could not be ordered to compensate for the forged checks and that the court lacked authority to impose restitution when there was no longer a victim with respect to the dismissed forgery charges. The Supreme Court disagreed. The victim was the same for both crimes, and the burglary was directly connected to the forgery, constituting an ongoing criminal transaction, so dismissal of the forgery charges did not deprive the court of authority to impose a restitution obligation on McIntire for the checks stolen from the victim during the burglary and for the pecuniary loss from the subsequent forgery of those checks. St. v. McIntire, 2004 MT 238, 322 M 496, 97 P3d 576 (2004).

Question Whether Restitution Connected to Crime — Remand for Reconsideration of Restitution: McDanold assisted in kidnapping and assaulting Berry, who was later killed by another man who was also involved in the kidnapping and assault. Although McDanold did not kill Berry, upon McDanold's conviction, the District Court ordered McDanold to pay restitution to Berry's parents and to the crime victims compensation fund. On appeal, McDanold contended that the sentencing court improperly ordered the restitution because the expenses were unrelated to McDanold's crimes and also asserted that he had been double-billed for some expenses that had been paid by the crime victims compensation fund. The state contended that there was an arguable connection between McDanold's offenses and the pecuniary losses to Berry's parents and to the fund. The Supreme Court remanded for reconsideration of restitution, including the parents' claims and whether they had indeed been compensated in part by the crime victims compensation fund. St. v. McDanold, 2004 MT 167, 322 M 31, 97 P3d 1076 (2004).

Liability of Illegal Branding Defendant for Cost of Boarding Confiscated Livestock With Livestock Commission: When Mikesell was investigated for illegal branding of livestock on his property, the cattle were seized and taken to the Miles City Livestock Commission. Mikesell pleaded guilty to three counts of illegal branding, and the cost of the feed bill at the Livestock Commission was assessed as restitution. Mikesell contended that the feed cost should not be assessed because the cattle remained at the Livestock Commission long after he had requested that the cattle be released to him. However, the prosecution did not allow release of the cattle to Mikesell because they did not belong to him. Because the cost was associated with the illegal branding charges, Mikesell was responsible for the cost of feeding the cattle until the parties came to an agreement on the cattle's disposition. St. v. Mikesell, 2004 MT 146, 321 M 462, 91 P3d 1273 (2004).

No Restitution Owing for Loss of Cattle Unassociated With Criminal Illegal Branding Charge: Mikesell pleaded guilty to three counts of illegal branding of cattle pastured on his property. As part of restitution, the trial court also found that Mikesell owed $30,000 for 55 cattle that were missing after being pastured on Mikesell's land. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. The loss of the 55 cattle from possible drowning or other untimely demise was a civil matter and was not associated with the illegal branding for which Mikesell was guilty. Because the loss did not arise from Mikesell's criminal activity, he was not responsible for restitution for the lost cattle. St. v. Mikesell, 2004 MT 146, 321 M 462, 91 P3d 1273 (2004).

Costs Directly Related to Defendant's Criminal Conduct Properly Included in Restitution Calculation: Thompson was a maintenance worker at a commercial building and had keys to the entire building. Thompson was convicted of stealing and then pawning tools from the maintenance room in the building and was ordered to pay restitution, including the costs of rekeying the entire building. Thompson contended that requiring payment of the cost of rekeying the building went beyond recovery for any pecuniary losses and was an abuse of discretion. The Supreme Court disagreed. The reason the building was rekeyed was a direct result of Thompson's criminal conduct, and the expense was an out-of-pocket loss directly related to the thefts, so including those special damage expenses in the restitution calculation was proper. St. v. Thompson, 2004 MT 131, 321 M 332, 91 P3d 12 (2004).

Out-of-Pocket Cleanup Expenses Properly Included as Part of Restitution Owed: Following Dunkerson's conviction for theft and burglary, the District Court included $7,180 for the victim's cleanup costs as part of the restitution. Dunkerson contended that the amount was erroneous because he provided testimony that a professional cleaner would charge only $960. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that the cleanup faced by the victim could not be likened to the professional cleaning of a home that had not been burglarized. This section allows a victim to recover all special damages, including out-of-pocket expenses. The District Court's findings were not clearly erroneous, and the award was affirmed. St. v. Dunkerson, 2003 MT 234, 317 M 228, 76 P3d 1085 (2003).

Payment of Child Support Improper Condition of Sentence for Felony DUI — Victim and Correlation to Underlying Offense Necessary for Imposition of Restitution: Horton was arrested for DUI, and a search of his driving record revealed nine prior DUI convictions. A further search showed that Horton also owed more than $47,000 in back child support. Horton was charged with felony DUI, with driving with a suspended or revoked license, as a habitual traffic offender operating a motor vehicle, and with felony nonsupport. By plea agreement, Horton agreed to plead guilty to the traffic offenses in exchange for dismissal of the nonsupport charge. The plea agreement stated that the state would recommend a 13-month sentence to be served in prerelease, followed by 4 years of probation, and, as a condition of the probationary sentence, provided that Horton would also make regular child support payments plus an additional sum monthly toward the support arrearage. As set out in the agreement, Horton pleaded guilty to the traffic offenses, and the nonsupport charge was dismissed. At sentencing, the habitual traffic offender charge was subsequently dismissed for failure of the state to prove that a valid habitual offender designation was in place at the time of the offense, and in addition, Horton's counsel objected to the court ordering payment of any child support arrearage, arguing that because the nonsupport charge had been dismissed, Horton would be paying restitution on a count for which he had not been convicted. Nevertheless, the court ordered Horton to pay support and promised to revoke his probation and sentence him to 4 years in prison with no parole if support was not paid. On appeal, Horton argued that the District Court abused its discretion and exceeded statutory mandates when it required him to pay restitution for an offense that was dismissed, citing St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098 (1994), for the position that restitution is statutorily limited to the victim of the crime and that because there was no victim who sustained pecuniary or economic loss as a result of the felony DUI or driving with a suspended or revoked license, restitution was inappropriate. The state argued that Horton was attempting to receive the benefit of the plea agreement—having the felony nonsupport charge dismissed—without holding up his end of the bargain by paying child support. The Supreme Court noted that a plea agreement is subject to contract law and that the court will not assist a defendant in escaping the obligations of a plea agreement once its benefits are received. However, the court also pointed out that a District Court's authority to impose sentences in criminal cases is defined and constrained by statute. The statutory authority for payment of restitution is in 46-18-201, which limits payment of restitution to the victim of a crime for which a defendant is convicted, and because Horton was not convicted of nonsupport, there was no victim to whom Horton could be ordered to pay restitution. The state also contended that ordering Horton to pay child support was proper because under 46-18-202(1), a sentencing court may impose any condition reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of the victim and society. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), a sentencing condition must have some correlation or connection to the underlying offense, but there was no correlation or connection between Horton's conviction for DUI and ordering him to pay child support. Thus, the Supreme Court ordered that the portion of Horton's sentence requiring payment of child support be stricken. St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001), followed in St. v. Setters, 2001 MT 101, 305 M 253, 25 P3d 893 (2001).

Restitution Proper for Ambulance and Towing Charges Related to Hit and Run and High-Speed Chase: LaTray was convicted of DUI, operating a vehicle without proof of insurance, operating a vehicle while a habitual traffic offender, leaving the scene of an accident, and criminal endangerment. The charges stemmed from a hit-and-run accident and subsequent high-speed chase, which ended when LaTray lost control of his car, went into a ditch, and rolled the vehicle. Officials at the scene called an ambulance as a precautionary measure and called a tow truck to remove LaTray's vehicle from the ditch. As restitution, the sentencing court ordered LaTray to pay the costs of the ambulance and tow truck. LaTray appealed on grounds that restitution is limited to pecuniary losses suffered by direct victims, as defined in terms of the offenses for which he was convicted, asserting that the ambulance company and towing service were not victims of his offenses, so restitution could not be ordered for their reimbursement. The Supreme Court disagreed. The plain language of 46-18-241 does not limit restitution to a victim defined in terms of the offense or to a loss arising directly from the criminal conduct. Also, St. v. Morgan, 198 M 391, 646 P2d 1177 (1982), makes it clear that classification of a victim for restitution purposes does not depend on the individual's relationship to the elements of the crime for which a defendant is sentenced. Further, restitution is not confined to the amount by which a defendant is enriched at a victim's expense, but rather the restitution statute empowers courts to impose restitution for economic loss as a result of a crime. Here, the ambulance and towing companies suffered an economic loss in out-of-pocket expenses for services for which they were not reimbursed, and the losses were the direct result of LaTray's criminal conduct, which created a situation for which the services were reasonably necessary for the safety of the public or LaTray himself. The restitution order was affirmed. St. v. LaTray, 2000 MT 262, 302 M 11, 11 P3d 116, 57 St. Rep. 1098 (2000). See also St. v. Brewer, 1999 MT 269, 296 M 453, 989 P2d 407 (1999).

Use of Replacement Cost, Rather Than Market Value, of Converted Property Resulting in Erroneous Calculation of Restitution: Pritchett entered the garage of a former employer in an effort to return two hunting rifles that he had stolen and pawned to support his gambling habit. Pritchett dropped his flashlight and, unable to find it in the dark, lit a cigarette lighter, which ignited a leaking propane bottle and caused an explosion that destroyed the garage and its contents. Pritchett was convicted of burglary and ordered to pay restitution. In calculating the victim's pecuniary loss, the District Court used replacement cost, rather than actual market value, of the garage and its contents. Pritchett argued on appeal that this method of valuation resulted in a significant overstatement of his restitution obligation. The Supreme Court found that the appropriate civil action arising out of Pritchett's destruction of the garage would be an action for conversion of personal property, the loss of which is presumed to be the value of the property at the time of conversion under 27-1-320. Thus, when personal property is converted, the restitution must be based on the market value of the goods converted. The District Court's use of the replacement cost of the items was an incorrect measure of the restitution obligation, constituting reversible error. St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000).

Inclusion in Restitution of Costs Related to Pecuniary Loss — Wages Paid to Embezzler Not Recoverable as Pecuniary Loss: Under 46-18-241, a sentencing court may include in restitution costs paid by the victim as a result of defendant's criminal act as long as the costs are considered pecuniary loss, as defined by this section. This loss may include economic loss as a result of the crime, out-of-pocket losses, such as medical expenses, and reasonable out-of-pocket expenses incurred by the victim in filing charges or in cooperating in the investigation and prosecution of the offense. Here, Brewer embezzled over $96,000 and was ordered to pay restitution, but argued that the fact that 46-18-241 excludes general damages militated against the inclusion in the restitution obligation of amounts beyond the total stolen from the employer. Brewer improperly characterized the employer's out-of-pocket losses as general damages. The employer paid accounting firms, employees, labor contractors, a software company, and a locksmith more than $15,000 in an attempt to reconstruct books and repair damage resulting from Brewer's crime. Those expenses were all considered out-of-pocket losses within the context of 46-18-241 and were properly includable in the restitution calculation. However, wages paid to Brewer over the course of employment did not constitute pecuniary loss and were not recoverable as restitution. St. v. Brewer, 1999 MT 269, 296 M 453, 989 P2d 407, 56 St. Rep. 1090 (1999). See also St. v. Morgan, 198 M 391, 646 P2d 1177 (1982), and St. v. Korang, 237 M 390, 773 P2d 326, 46 St. Rep. 892 (1989).

Interest Properly Imposed on Restitution Obligation: Brewer embezzled over $96,000 and was ordered to pay restitution to the employer, including 10% interest on the restitution obligation. Brewer contended that interest in this case was per se an abuse of discretion insofar as it exceeded the employer's pecuniary loss. The issue of whether interest may be properly applied to restitution under 46-18-241 was a case of first impression in Montana. Interest is not expressly provided for by the restitution statute, which provides for restitution to a victim who suffers a pecuniary loss, defined in this section as special damages, but not general damages, that a person could recover in a civil action arising out of the facts constituting the criminal activity. Interest is a special damage available in a civil action under 27-1-210 and thus was properly applied to Brewer's restitution. However, interest is not allowed on damages such as pain and suffering, mental anguish or suffering, or punitive damages. St. v. Brewer, 1999 MT 269, 296 M 453, 989 P2d 407, 56 St. Rep. 1090 (1999).

Victims' Families Ineligible for Restitution: Brown was convicted of felony criminal endangerment and negligent homicide after killing one pedestrian and injuring another when he lost control of his vehicle. The District Court ordered Brown to make restitution to the one victim and to the families of both victims. The Supreme Court held that the families of the victims do not qualify for restitution under the definition of "victim". (See 1995 amendment.) St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098, 51 St. Rep. 24 (1994).

Restitution Allowed for Period Longer Than Charged Offense: Defendant was charged with theft and tampering with public records over a 2-year period. All but 6 months of her 20-year sentence were suspended on the condition that she repay the money she stole at work over a 5-year period. She argued the amount was not substantiated by evidence because she was not being tried for her activities during the first 3 years and that in essence, she was sentenced for criminal activity for which she was not convicted. There was evidence in the sentencing hearing that her crimes were spread out over a 5-year period. The restitution order was proper. St. v. Korang, 237 M 390, 773 P2d 326, 46 St. Rep. 892 (1989).

Title 20, chapter 12, ARM Restitution.

Case Notes

Award of Lost Wages as Restitution Only if Recoverable in Related Civil Action — Discovery Request Too Broad Without Demonstration of Substantial Need: The defendant was convicted of criminal mischief and cruelty to animals for fatally shooting a family’s dog. During sentencing, the District Court ordered the defendant to pay $9,357 in restitution. The amount included the family’s replacement of the dog, medical bills, lost wages for time spent cooperating with the prosecution, and traveling expenses. On appeal, the defendant argued that the lost wages were not included within the statutory scope of restitution, that the medical bills did not arise out of his activities, and that he should have been allowed to conduct discovery to analyze the bills claimed by the family. The Supreme Court reversed in part, holding that lost wages did not constitute out-of-pocket expenses in 46-18-243 and that unless a person could recover the wages in a civil action arising out of the same facts, they could not constitute restitution, and affirmed in part, holding that the defendant’s broad discovery motion was properly denied because he did not demonstrate a substantial need. St. v. Barrick, 2015 MT 94, 378 Mont. 441, 347 P.3d 241.

Restitution Award Not Supported by Substantial Evidence: While driving drunk, the defendant collided with the victim’s garage and subsequently pleaded guilty to DUI and reckless driving. Restitution was imposed in an amount that included costs associated with repainting the victim’s entire house, rather than just the damaged attached garage. The defendant appealed, arguing that his insurance had already compensated the victim for damages to the garage and that repainting the entire house was not appropriate because only the garage had been damaged. The Supreme Court reversed, concluding that substantial evidence did not support the restitution award because the only evidence offered concerning restitution was conflicting estimates from the defendant and the victim. St. v. Aragon, 2014 MT 89, 374 Mont. 391, 321 P.3d 841, followed in St. v. Simpson, 2014 MT 175, 375 Mont. 393, 328 P.3d 1144. However, see St. v. Ailer, 2018 MT 18, 390 Mont. 200, 410 P.3d 964, holding that substantial evidence did support the award and amount of restitution.

Order to Pay All Future Medical Expenses Victim Reasonably Expected to Incur — Not Sufficiently Specific: The Supreme Court struck down a sentencing condition that required the defendant to pay “all future medical expenses that his victim can reasonably be expected to incur as a result of the defendant’s criminal conduct”. The Supreme Court remanded to give the District Court the opportunity and the discretion to conduct additional proceedings to order restitution in a specified amount. St. v. Ring, 2014 MT 49, 374 Mont. 109, 321 P.3d 800.

Open-Ended Restitution Award Vacated for Lack of Specificity: A 17-year-old defendant was charged as an adult with one count of sexual intercourse without consent and one count of sexual assault. Subsequently, the defendant was sentenced and the District Court ordered restitution payments for victim counseling in an amount to be determined by a statement of costs that would be filed by the prosecution within 30 days of the final judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court vacated the restitution requirement on the grounds that the judgment failed to comply with 46-18-244, which requires a judgment to set a specific amount. St. v. Dietsch, 2013 MT 245, 371 Mont. 460, 308 P.3d 111.

Imposition of Restitution Without Comparative Negligence Analysis Improper: After the defendant pleaded guilty to eluding a peace officer, the Municipal Court ordered him to pay over $7,000 in restitution to the City of Whitefish for vehicle damage caused when two police cars collided upon approaching the defendant’s house after a police chase through the city. The District Court affirmed the award, but the Supreme Court reversed, concluding that the Municipal Court was obligated to consider any possible negligence on the part of the officers in assessing the amount of restitution and that the defendant’s assertion of negligence per se was sufficient to raise the defense of comparative negligence. Whitefish v. Gentile, 2012 MT 185, 366 Mont. 94, 285 P.3d 515.

Failure to Object to Payment of Restitution at Sentencing — No Consideration on Appeal: As a part of his sentencing for felony intimidation, the defendant was ordered to pay restitution for the cost of his victim's past and future counseling. Although the presentence investigation (PSI) did not contemplate restitution, the District Court ordered at the sentencing hearing that the defendant pay restitution for the victim's counseling costs. On appeal, the defendant claimed that the District Court erred in ordering the payment of restitution because the PSI did not address restitution, but because the defendant did not object to the award of restitution at the hearing, the Supreme Court declined to address the defendant's challenge to restitution. However, the Supreme Court nevertheless remanded the case to the District Court to comply with 46-18-244 (1999) and to specify the amount the defendant would have to pay for future counseling costs. St. v. Johnson, 2011 MT 286, 362 Mont. 473, 235 P.3d 638, followed in St. v. Simpson, 2014 MT 175, 375 Mont. 393, 328 P.3d 1144.

Failure to Specify Amount Warranting Reversal of Restitution Award: Section 46-18-244 requires that a court imposing restitution must specify the total amount of restitution that an offender must pay. Imposition of restitution without quantifying a loss and specifying an actual amount owing is reversible error. St. v. Williams, 2010 MT 58, 355 Mont. 354, 228 P.3d 1127. See also St. v. Peterson, 2013 MT 329, 372 Mont. 382, 314 P.3d 227.

Restitution Obligations Not Discharged Upon Fulfillment of Criminal Sentence: As a condition of sentences for theft, burglary, and deceptive practices, Brown was ordered to pay restitution. Upon completion of his prison sentences, Brown was released without having paid restitution in full. Brown was subsequently imprisoned following conviction for other criminal offenses, and the Department of Corrections began garnishing Brown's prison wages to satisfy the unpaid restitution obligations from the previous sentences. Brown requested that the District Court waive payment of the restitution on grounds that the Department lacked authority to garnish his prison wages to pay restitution obligations from sentences that were previously discharged. The court agreed and ordered the Department to cease garnishment and to reimburse any money collected to satisfy those obligations. The state appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. Unlike the other conditions of Brown's sentences, the restitution obligations were civil judgments required by 46-18-241 to be paid in full, and those obligations were not discharged or fulfilled by virtue of Brown's completion of the criminal sentences and discharge from prison. Pursuant to this section, the Department was authorized to garnish Brown's prison wages to satisfy the previously unpaid restitution. St. v. Brown, 2008 MT 115, 342 M 476, 182 P3d 75 (2008). See also St. v. Ferre, 2014 MT 96, 374 Mont. 428, 322 P.3d 1047.

Open-Ended Restitution Condition Reversed: As a condition of Meyers' sentence for assaulting his child, it was ordered that Meyers pay restitution to all the victims in an amount to remain open until the victims received any help that they needed. However, this section requires that the sentencing court specify the total amount of restitution that the offender shall pay. Thus, it was reversible error for the sentencing court to leave the amount of restitution open, and the Supreme Court remanded for reimposition of the restitution requirement in a specified amount. St. v. Meyers, 2007 MT 230, 339 M 160, 168 P3d 645 (2007).

Restitution Payment Schedule Not Required: Pursuant to the 2003 amendments to this section, a sentencing court is not required to set a restitution payment schedule. St. v. Kuykendall, 2006 MT 110, 332 M 180, 136 P3d 983 (2006).

Improper Order to Pay Child Support as Condition of Sentence for Possession of Dangerous Drugs: Erickson entered a plea agreement on drug charges, and although it was not part of the agreement, the sentencing court ordered that Erickson also forfeit one-third of his prison earnings as restitution to be paid toward Erickson's delinquent child support. Erickson never invited or acquiesced to the child support order. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that possession of dangerous drugs is a victimless crime for which restitution cannot be owed and also noted that the amount of restitution must be determined and fixed. The court agreed with Erickson that there was no connection between drug crimes and the failure to pay child support, so ordering payment of child support arrearages as restitution was not an appropriate condition of sentencing for a drug crime. However, in this case, the sentencing court made it clear that the order to pay child support was in lieu of requiring Erickson to pay cleanup costs associated with a clandestine drug lab, attorney costs, or jury costs. The sentencing court could have imposed both costs and restitution if not for the imposition of the illegal child support obligation, so the Supreme Court was unable to determine what sentence would have been imposed if the law had been correctly applied. The case was remanded for resentencing on whether Erickson must pay restitution and costs. St. v. Erickson, 2005 MT 276, 329 M 192, 124 P3d 119 (2005).

No Error in Allowing Parole Officer to Set Restitution Schedule — Refusal to Waive Administrative Fees Proper: Denham contended that it was error for the sentencing court to delegate the scheduling of monthly restitution payments to a parole officer because the version of this section in effect at the time of the crime did not provide for that delegation of authority. The Supreme Court held that the amendments to the statute were purely procedural and did not constitute retroactive legislation, impair Denham's rights, or impose additional duties on Denham, so allowing the parole officer to set the restitution schedule was not error. Denham also appealed the $60,099 restitution and the 10% administrative fee and minimal surcharges. However, Denham assured the court at sentencing of his ability to pay the restitution amount, so it was reasonable to assume that he also had the ability to pay the administrative fee and surcharges. The sentencing court was affirmed. St. v. Denham, 2005 MT 26, 326 M 24, 107 P3d 1263 (2005).

Joint and Several Liability for Restitution Properly Imposed: Following conviction for three counts of burglary, the District Court found Workman jointly and severally liable for the full amount of restitution to the burglary victims and ordered Workman to pay restitution in the amount of $26,840.33. Workman was accompanied in the burglaries by four accomplices, and Workman argued that he should be held responsible only for his proportionate share as divided among all the defendants. That argument was rejected, and Workman appealed on grounds that restitution was improperly imposed. Workman relied on the 2001 version of 46-18-242, contending that the required documentation of his financial resources was inaccurate, and on the 2001 version of this section, arguing that the sentencing court failed to establish a payment schedule or set the amount of installment payments. The Supreme Court noted that both the required documentation and payment schedule provisions were deleted by the 2003 Legislature and are no longer required. Workman's argument that restitution should be apportioned among his accomplices also failed because the fate of the accomplices was immaterial to the court's authority to impose restitution. Under the 2003 versions of the restitution laws and given that Workman stipulated that he owed the full amount, the District Court properly held Workman jointly and severally liable for the pecuniary loss suffered by his victims. St. v. Workman, 2005 MT 22, 326 M 1, 107 P3d 462 (2005).

No Prejudice in Property Valuation When Less Than Full Restitution Required: The total losses incurred by individuals and businesses in a fire started by Gilbert was $5,721,684.57. In calculating the value of a building destroyed in the fire for establishing restitution, the District Court used replacement value rather than actual value. Gilbert contended that failure to use actual value was reversible error under St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000). The Supreme Court agreed that actual value should have been used but that Gilbert failed to show that any prejudice resulted from the error. Gilbert's presentence investigation report adequately documented Gilbert's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, and Gilbert was ordered to pay only $24,000 in restitution, which was but a minuscule fraction of the losses. Any error by the District Court in using replacement value for the building did not prejudice Gilbert because he was not required to pay full restitution. St. v. Gilbert, 2004 MT 368, 324 M 530, 106 P3d 127 (2004), following St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Restitution Order Proper Given Defendant's Ability to Pay: The sentencing court ordered Thaut to pay $69,457 in restitution. Thaut appealed the award on grounds that the court failed to meet statutory requirements establishing Thaut's financial resources and future ability to pay and on grounds that due process rights were violated when the court failed to consider several factors in Thaut's ability to pay, including Thaut's age and short time to work following parole, minimum wage employment history, lack of assets and ability to acquire assets in the future, and mental health issues related to an alleged prior head injury. However, the presentence investigation and supplemental presentence investigation provided adequate documentation regarding Thaut's ability to pay restitution and to work hard to earn a living. Further, Thaut had no documented physical limitations and was unemployed only because he was incarcerated. The District Court's determination that Thaut had the ability to pay medical expenses, a grant from the Board of Crime Control, and property damages was amply supported by the record, and the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Thaut, 2004 MT 359, 324 M 460, 103 P3d 1012 (2004).

Failure of Sentencing Court to Establish Restitution Amount — Reversible Error: Following conviction for burglarizing casinos, Eixenberger was ordered by the District Court to pay restitution for losses and damages sustained by the casinos in a sum to be determined, plus interest. Eixenberger challenged the restitution award amount, and the Supreme Court reversed. It was error for the sentencing court to order payment of restitution in an amount to be determined rather than to specify the total amount, as required in this section. The presentence investigation report also failed to document the victims' pecuniary losses and Eixenberger's resources and ability to pay, as required by 46-18-242, so further sentencing proceedings were warranted on remand. St. v. Eixenberger, 2004 MT 127, 321 M 298, 90 P3d 453 (2004).

Failure of Sentencing Court to Establish Restitution Payment Schedule — Reversible Error: The District Court ordered that Heath pay restitution "on a schedule to be supervised and regulated by the Adult Probation and Parole Field Services". The Supreme Court held that this payment method did not comply with the statutory requirement that the District Court set the amount, method, and time of each payment to the victim and remanded for an amendment to the judgment that properly addressed the method and time of Heath's restitution payments. St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Order for Restitution Upon Imposition of Deferred or Suspended Sentence — 1999 Amendments to Sentencing Statute Clarified: Heath was convicted of theft and possession of burglary tools and sentenced to 10 years in prison with 2 years suspended upon conditions, including payment of restitution. Heath appealed on grounds that the 1999 amendments to 46-18-201 no longer allowed a sentencing court to impose restitution as a condition of a suspended or deferred sentence. Upon amendment in 1999, an internal reference in 46-18-201(5) was not changed to reflect the renumbering of the other subsections, which resulted in an ambiguity in the plain language of the 46-18-201, potentially rendered 46-18-237 and 46-18-251(2) meaningless, created uncertain directives for payment of restitution for all victims in 46-18-241(1) and subsection (2) of this section, and created a potentially absurd application of 46-18-201(1). Because of the potentially absurd consequences of the 1999 amendment, the Supreme Court looked beyond the words of the statute and inquired whether the Legislature intended to make any change in the substance and effect of 46-18-201. The court concluded that the 1999 amendment was a simple codification error that resulted in a cross-reference problem that was completely inconsistent with legislative intent to authorize sentencing courts to impose restitution when necessary for rehabilitation or for the protection of the victim or society if there is an appropriate correlation to the offense committed. Heath's argument failed, and the imposition of restitution as a condition of Heath's suspended sentence was affirmed. (Note: The erroneous internal reference in 46-18-201(5) was deleted in 2003.) St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004), followed in St. v. McDanold, 2004 MT 167, 322 M 31, 97 P3d 1076 (2004), and St. v. McIntire, 2004 MT 238, 322 M 496, 97 P3d 576 (2004).

Restitution Adequately Documented in PSI Report and Information Submitted by Victim: Heath contended that the presentence investigation report (PSI) contained insufficient information to document his ability to pay restitution and the victim's pecuniary loss, citing St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098 (1994), St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866 (1999), and St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000). The Supreme Court distinguished Brown, Hilgers, and Pritchett on grounds that the PSI report deficiencies in those cases were not present in Heath's case. Rather, the court followed St. v. Flanagan, 2003 MT 123, 316 M 1, 68 P3d 796 (2003), and St. v. Dunkerson, 2003 MT 234, 317 M 228, 76 P3d 1085 (2003), finding that the PSI report adequately addressed Heath's employability, assets and debts, and capability of paying restitution. The valuation of the victim's pecuniary loss was adequately provided in documentation submitted by the victim and, coupled with expert testimony on the value of recovered items, provided substantial credible evidence upon which to base the restitution amount. St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Reimbursement Costs for Court-Appointed Attorney Proper: Defendant contended that the District Court improperly required victim restitution in an incest case because the court did not specify an amount of total restitution, consider the victim's pecuniary loss, or consider defendant's financial resources or ability to pay, as required in this section. The Supreme Court held that defendant had mischaracterized the issue, noting that the District Court had not ordered any amount for victim restitution, but rather had ordered defendant to pay an amount in reimbursement costs for defendant's court-appointed attorney, and had correctly considered defendant's resources as set out in the presentence investigation report, as provided in 46-8-113. Payment of reimbursement costs was affirmed. St. v. J.C., 2004 MT 75, 320 M 411, 87 P3d 501 (2004).

Restitution Sentence Proper Despite Failure to List Pecuniary Loss in Presentence Investigation Report — Remand to Determine Restitution When Amount Undetermined: Following Dunkerson's conviction for theft and burglary, the District Court ordered restitution for the victim. The presentence investigation (PSI) report listed the loss as an undetermined amount. Failure of a PSI report to document a victim's pecuniary loss and the offender's ability to pay renders a restitution sentence illegal, although a full evidentiary hearing can vitiate the need for loss documentation in a PSI report. Here, the PSI report noted that the victim needed more time to accurately account for restitution owed, which satisfied the loss requirement of 46-18-242, so the District Court did not err in ordering restitution even though the amount of restitution was not in the PSI report. However, the court did err by not specifying the amount owed and the time and method of payment, so the case was remanded to determine the amount and method of payment pursuant to this section. St. v. Dunkerson, 2003 MT 234, 317 M 228, 76 P3d 1085 (2003).

Use of Market Value to Determine Value of Lost Property — Exception — Use of Hearsay Testimony Proper to Establish Market Value: Dunkerson contended that the District Court erred in accepting a burglary victim's hearsay testimony regarding valuation of some of the lost property when the valuation was not based on market value. The Supreme Court agreed that replacement value should be used only if market value cannot be determined, even though under St. v. Bingman, 229 M 101, 745 P2d 342 (1987), hearsay testimony is admissible during sentencing. The case was remanded so the District Court could receive appropriate testimony to establish the market value of property for which market value was not previously established. St. v. Dunkerson, 2003 MT 234, 317 M 228, 76 P3d 1085 (2003).

Failure of Presentence Report to Document Restitution Concerns — Payment of Restitution at Discretion of Probation Officer Improper: Following a sexual assault conviction, Flanagan was ordered to pay for all offense-related medical and counseling costs, after payment by the victim's insurance, and all future costs for the next 2 years. Flanagan asserted that the restitution plan was illegal based on St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000), because the presentence investigation report did not document Flanagan's monthly expenses or address his future ability to pay restitution and because the development of a restitution schedule was left to the discretion of the probation officer. The Supreme Court agreed and remanded for addition to the presentence report of documentation of Flanagan's monthly expenses and future ability to pay restitution and to allow the District Court to hold a hearing to enter a sentence and judgment addressing Flanagan's ability to pay and the time of restitution payments. St. v. Flanagan, 2003 MT 123, 316 M 1, 68 P3d 796 (2003).

Deferral of Sentence to Allow Payment of Restitution Not Violative of Due Process Rights: Benoit was charged with felony theft and entered a nonbinding plea agreement to plead guilty in exchange for a recommendation for a 2-year deferred sentence, based on the possible imposition of various conditions, including the payment of restitution. Benoit was then convicted and ordered to repay $15,933.90 in restitution. At the restitution hearing, Benoit admitted that with her current take-home salary and expenses, the restitution could not be repaid in 2 years, so the sentencing court sentenced Benoit to a 6-year deferred sentence to allow time to pay the restitution, but gave Benoit the opportunity to withdraw the guilty plea after 2 years if restitution was paid within that time. Benoit appealed on grounds that increasing the deferred sentence was a violation of due process, citing St. v. Farrell, 207 M 483, 676 P2d 168 (1984), and St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000), and asserted that the sentence should be remanded for determination of a length of sentence consistent with the charge and Benoit's history instead of the ability to pay restitution. The Supreme Court distinguished Farrell and Pritchett, noting that Benoit's sentence was not based on indigency, and coupled with the fact that Benoit was given the opportunity to withdraw the guilty plea prior to the termination of the 6-year deferred sentence, Benoit's due process rights were not violated through imposition of the conditional 6-year deferred sentence. St. v. Benoit, 2002 MT 166, 310 M 449, 51 P3d 495 (2002).

Failure to Document Victim's Pecuniary Loss and Offender's Financial Resources and Ability to Pay Restitution — Restitution Condition Vacated: Muhammad was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with a minor. One condition of sentencing was a requirement that Muhammad pay $5,000 in restitution. Under 46-18-201, a sentencing judge shall require a defendant to pay full restitution to a victim if the judge finds that the victim has sustained a pecuniary loss. Imposition of restitution is subject to detailed statutory procedures and qualifications, which include documented evidence of the victim's loss and the offender's ability to pay. The sentencing court is required to specify the amount, method, and time of each payment to the victim. Here, the presentence investigation did not document the victim's pecuniary loss or Muhammad's future ability to pay restitution, nor did the sentencing court consider Muhammad's future ability to pay because the relevant evidence was not presented to the court. Therefore, the Supreme Court held that the restitution condition of the sentence was illegal, and that condition was vacated. St. v. Muhammad, 2002 MT 47, 309 M 1, 43 P3d 318 (2002), following St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000), and followed in St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007).

Conditions Imposed in Written Judgment and Sentence Different From Those Imposed in Oral Sentence — Lane, Waters, and Simpson Reviewed — Test to Determine Which New Conditions Lawful or Unlawful — Payment of Restitution and Costs: Johnson was sentenced orally for writing bad checks and later contended that four of the conditions imposed in the written judgment and sentence by the District Court were unlawful under St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), because they were not announced orally when she was sentenced in open court. The Supreme Court reviewed its decisions in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142 (1999), and St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361 (1999), and reasoned that a written sentence would be held unlawful only if it substantively increased the defendant's loss of liberty or the defendant's sacrifice of property. Under this test, the Supreme Court held that two of the four penalties not mentioned by the District Court in its oral pronouncement of Johnson's sentence were unlawful, those being the restitution ordered to the Missoula County jail of money expended for Johnson's medical care and the requirement that Johnson pay for the costs of her prosecution in District Court. The Supreme Court held that the other two parts of the written sentence, the requirement that Johnson make restitution from money earned in prison and the imposition of certain "civil" restrictions as conditions of Johnson's suspended sentence, such as the requirement that Johnson stay out of gambling casinos, were lawfully imposed because they did not increase the amount of money that Johnson was ordered to pay or increase Johnson's deprivation of liberty in addition to those penalties imposed orally. The requirement for payment from prison earnings only specified where the money was to come from, and the "civil" restrictions were largely mentioned by the District Court at Johnson's sentencing hearing. St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000), followed in St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

Failure to Document Defendant's Financial Resources and Ability to Pay Restitution and Victim's Pecuniary Loss — Restitution Sentence Improper: The general mandate to sentencing courts is that a sentence must include full restitution whenever it is found that the victim of an offense has sustained a pecuniary loss, subject to mandatory detailed statutory procedures and qualifications. Here, although the District Court received some evidence of these amounts during the sentencing hearing, the failure of the presentence investigation report to document the victim's pecuniary loss, as well as the defendant's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, provided the court no authority to impose a sentence of restitution and rendered its judgment illegal. St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000), following St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098 (1994), and St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866 (1999), and distinguished in St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Failure to Specify Amount, Method, and Time of Payment — Restitution Order Invalid: The District Court ordered defendant to make restitution payments according to a schedule to be determined by defendant's probation officer. However, this section requires the court to specify the amount, method, and time of payments, after considering the defendant's financial resources and future ability to pay. Thus, the court failed to comply with the statutory requirements by leaving that determination to the discretion of the probation officer, invalidating the restitution order. St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000).

Use of Replacement Cost, Rather Than Market Value, of Converted Property Resulting in Erroneous Calculation of Restitution: Pritchett entered the garage of a former employer in an effort to return two hunting rifles that he had stolen and pawned to support his gambling habit. Pritchett dropped his flashlight and, unable to find it in the dark, lit a cigarette lighter, which ignited a leaking propane bottle and caused an explosion that destroyed the garage and its contents. Pritchett was convicted of burglary and ordered to pay restitution. In calculating the victim's pecuniary loss, the District Court used replacement cost, rather than actual market value, of the garage and its contents. Pritchett argued on appeal that this method of valuation resulted in a significant overstatement of his restitution obligation. The Supreme Court found that the appropriate civil action arising out of Pritchett's destruction of the garage would be an action for conversion of personal property, the loss of which is presumed to be the value of the property at the time of conversion under 27-1-320. Thus, when personal property is converted, the restitution must be based on the market value of the goods converted. The District Court's use of the replacement cost of the items was an incorrect measure of the restitution obligation, constituting reversible error. St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000).

When Restitution Owing: Under 46-18-201, the sentencing court is required to provide for full restitution by a defendant to the victim of a criminal offense who sustains a pecuniary loss. Here, Hilgers' issuance of more than 50 bad checks and stealing cash and diverting checks and money orders from his employer in an amount exceeding $33,500 clearly qualified as a pecuniary loss. The court found the state's witnesses more credible than Hilgers, providing adequate support in the record as to the amount owing. The restitution amount was not clearly erroneous and was affirmed on appeal. However, the Supreme Court remanded for lack of documentation, as required under 46-18-242, regarding Hilgers' financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, finding the information in the presentence report regarding Hilgers' age, education, assets and obligations, and marital and employment status inadequate in addressing Hilgers' resources and ability to pay the amount in question. St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866, 56 St. Rep. 1146 (1999), following St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996), distinguishing St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098, 51 St. Rep. 24 (1994), followed in St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000), and distinguished in St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Financial Resources and Future Ability to Pay Restitution Properly Considered: In imposing interest on Brewer's restitution obligation, Brewer contended that the court did not properly consider her financial resources and future ability to pay restitution or specify the amount, method, and time of each payment, as required by this section. At the sentencing hearing, Brewer testified that: (1) she had obtained two jobs; (2) because her husband's wages covered the household expenses, she intended to put all her wages toward restitution; and (3) she had already made nearly $6,000 in restitution payments and intended to continue the payments. Based on this testimony, the District Court properly considered Brewer's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution in ordering repayment according to a schedule of repayment arrived at with the probation officer. St. v. Brewer, 1999 MT 269, 296 M 453, 989 P2d 407, 56 St. Rep. 1090 (1999).

Inclusion in Restitution of Costs Related to Pecuniary Loss — Wages Paid to Embezzler Not Recoverable as Pecuniary Loss: Under 46-18-241, a sentencing court may include in restitution costs paid by the victim as a result of defendant's criminal act as long as the costs are considered pecuniary loss, as defined by 46-18-243. This loss may include economic loss as a result of the crime, out-of-pocket losses, such as medical expenses, and reasonable out-of-pocket expenses incurred by the victim in filing charges or in cooperating in the investigation and prosecution of the offense. Here, Brewer embezzled over $96,000 and was ordered to pay restitution, but argued that the fact that 46-18-241 excludes general damages militated against the inclusion in the restitution obligation of amounts beyond the total stolen from the employer. Brewer improperly characterized the employer's out-of-pocket losses as general damages. The employer paid accounting firms, employees, labor contractors, a software company, and a locksmith more than $15,000 in an attempt to reconstruct books and repair damage resulting from Brewer's crime. Those expenses were all considered out-of-pocket losses within the context of 46-18-241 and were properly includable in the restitution calculation. However, wages paid to Brewer over the course of employment did not constitute pecuniary loss and were not recoverable as restitution. St. v. Brewer, 1999 MT 269, 296 M 453, 989 P2d 407, 56 St. Rep. 1090 (1999). See also St. v. Morgan, 198 M 391, 646 P2d 1177 (1982), and St. v. Korang, 237 M 390, 773 P2d 326, 46 St. Rep. 892 (1989).

Presentence Investigation Inadequate to Support Restitution — Restitution Order Inadequate: Brown was convicted of felony criminal endangerment and negligent homicide after killing one pedestrian and injuring another when he lost control of his vehicle. The District Court ordered Brown to make restitution to the one victim and to the families of both victims. The presentence investigation report contained no documentation of the pecuniary loss of either victim and inadequate documentation of Brown's financial resources, especially his future earning capacity. The Supreme Court noted that as probable consequences of these errors, the District Court's order for restitution did not require Brown to pay a specific amount at a specific time. For these reasons, the Supreme Court held that the order could not lawfully be made and remanded the case to the District Court. St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098, 51 St. Rep. 24 (1994), distinguished in St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866, 56 St. Rep. 1146 (1999), in which the failure of the presentence investigation to set forth the amount of restitution was not considered fatal because defendant was given a hearing and because defendant had entered a plea bargain providing that the amount was to be agreed upon by the parties prior to sentencing and if the parties were unable to agree on an amount, it would be determined by the court, and St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004), and followed in St. v. Rinkenbach, 2003 MT 348, 318 M 499, 82 P3d 8 (2003).

Inability to Pay Restitution — Not Violative of Equal Protection in Light of State Correctional Policy and Previous Offenses: A defendant convicted of felony theft was sentenced to 5 years in the state prison with 2 years suspended and, in addition, was ordered to pay restitution. The defendant asserted on appeal that he was sentenced to a prison term because of his indigency, in violation of his right to equal protection. However, the District Judge specifically noted the prison term was necessary to protect the property of others and that the defendant's criminal record contained three previous misdemeanor thefts. The Supreme Court found these to be sufficient reasons to support incarceration and upheld the state's correctional policy outlined in 46-18-101. The court noted that the sentence was well within the parameters of punishment for felony theft in 45-6-301. Finding no abuse of discretion or violation of the defendant's constitutional rights, the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Carroll, 220 M 466, 716 P2d 212, 43 St. Rep. 531 (1986).

Case Notes

Protected Benefit Defendant's Sole Source of Income — Restitution Order Did Not Require Benefit as Source of Payment: The District Court ordered the defendant to pay restitution for the costs of his extradition from Georgia even though he had testified that his only source of income was protected disability benefits. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that imposing restitution on a defendant whose only income is a protected benefit is not illegal if the order does not mandate a protected benefit as the source of payment. The Supreme Court also noted that the defendant could still petition the District Court to waive or modify the amount of restitution based on his financial circumstances. St. v. Corriher, 2021 MT 275, 406 Mont. 120, 497 P.3d 579.

Workers' Compensation Insurer Entitled to Restitution for Pecuniary Loss — Defendant's Financial Situation Made Payment of Restitution Unjust: The defendant pleaded guilty to the offense of misdemeanor assault for striking a peace officer while waiting for an initial appearance in Justice Court in another matter. The plea agreement called for the defendant to pay restitution to the Montana State Fund (MSF) for its workers' compensation payments to the peace officer and medical providers. The defendant argued at the restitution hearing that MSF was not a victim under 46-18-243 because it had not suffered a pecuniary loss, that the statute did not authorize payment of general damages, and that she was unable to afford and would be unduly burdened by the full amount of restitution suggested. The District Court held that MSF qualified as a victim insurer and thus was entitled to the full amount of restitution within 5 months of the sentence. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that MSF was entitled to restitution for pecuniary loss. However, the Supreme Court reversed the District Court's failure to waive restitution pursuant to 46-18-246, reasoning that the uncontroverted evidence of the defendant's dire financial situation made it otherwise unjust to require the defendant to pay the restitution imposed. St. v. Lodahl, 2021 MT 156, 404 Mont. 362, 491 P.3d 661.

Availability of Relief: Citing the statute but failing to state or present a case, a felon moved to have his civil settlement satisfy restitution ordered by the District Court. The District Court denied the motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed in part and reversed in part, explaining that the statute provides four alternative conditions under which a court may grant relief, and remanded to permit a proper request for relief for the District Court's consideration. St. v. Erickson, 2018 MT 9, 390 Mont. 146, 408 P.3d 1288.

Release of Restitution Obligation Properly Denied: The defendant was convicted of felony sexual assault against two young sisters. The defendant was designated a level 1 sex offender and sentenced to 35 years' imprisonment, with 5 years suspended. The defendant was also ordered to pay restitution to compensate the victims for counseling. The District Court denied the defendant's subsequent petition for remission of restitution. On appeal, the Supreme Court concluded that the record provided credible evidence that both victims wanted and needed counseling and that the victims were unable to pay for counseling. The Supreme Court held that the District Court was well within the bounds of reason in determining that the defendant should not be released from his restitution obligation. State v. Passmore, 2014 MT 249, 376 Mont. 334, 334 P.3d 378.

No Evidence That Victim Will Be Unjustly Enriched — Credit Against Restitution Properly Denied: Kober stole money from the Montana State University-Bozeman student health service and was ordered to pay restitution. Because the stolen money was considered taxable income, Kober was also charged with failing to properly report income for state income tax purposes. From the proceeds of the subsequent sale of the family home, Kober paid $46,004.67 to the Department of Revenue to satisfy its lien for back income taxes. Because the money was placed in the general fund from which the University System receives part of its funding, Kober maintained that the University System would benefit from the payment of the back income taxes and that in order to avoid a windfall unjustly enriching the university, the restitution amount should be offset by $46,004.67. However, Kober did not establish that any of the $46,004.67 would actually be distributed to or benefit Montana State University-Bozeman or the student health service, so the District Court properly denied Kober's request for a credit against restitution. St. v. Kober, 1999 MT 264, 296 M 425, 989 P2d 399, 56 St. Rep. 1076 (1999).

Case Notes

Restitution Obligations Not Discharged Upon Fulfillment of Criminal Sentence: As a condition of sentences for theft, burglary, and deceptive practices, Brown was ordered to pay restitution. Upon completion of his prison sentences, Brown was released without having paid restitution in full. Brown was subsequently imprisoned following conviction for other criminal offenses, and the Department of Corrections began garnishing Brown's prison wages to satisfy the unpaid restitution obligations from the previous sentences. Brown requested that the District Court waive payment of the restitution on grounds that the Department lacked authority to garnish his prison wages to pay restitution obligations from sentences that were previously discharged. The court agreed and ordered the Department to cease garnishment and to reimburse any money collected to satisfy those obligations. The state appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. Unlike the other conditions of Brown's sentences, the restitution obligations were civil judgments required by 46-18-241 to be paid in full, and those obligations were not discharged or fulfilled by virtue of Brown's completion of the criminal sentences and discharge from prison. Pursuant to 46-18-244, the Department was authorized to garnish Brown's prison wages to satisfy the previously unpaid restitution. St. v. Brown, 2008 MT 115, 342 M 476, 182 P3d 75 (2008). See also St. v. Ferre, 2014 MT 96, 374 Mont. 428, 322 P.3d 1047.

Proof of Inability to Pay Restitution — Deferment of Sentence Extended to Allow Payment — Error: A probationer sufficiently proved that her failure to continue restitution payments was not caused by lack of a good faith effort to pay and that her income was insufficient to make even the $10 monthly payment that her probation officer was apparently willing to accept. The state's argument that she might soon receive a workers' compensation lump-sum settlement that she could use to pay the remaining restitution and would receive a "windfall" if her deferred sentence and probation were not extended for 2 years for failure to pay so that she could make further payments had no merit. Disability benefits are not a windfall; they are partial compensation for the loss of earning capacity. In addition, the duty to pay restitution remains until it is fully paid, and restitution may be collected in a civil proceeding at any time, including after the conclusion of state supervision under a sentence. Therefore, the District Court abused its discretion when it did not excuse the probationer's failure to pay, and the order extending the deferred sentence and probation for 2 years was reversed. St. v. Welling, 2002 MT 308, 313 M 67, 59 P3d 1146 (2002).

Imposition of Interest Discretionary: It was not an error for the District Court to convert an order regarding restitution payments to a civil judgment without imposing interest charges when the defendant had already made payments for several years. The choice to impose interest rests with the discretion of the District Court. Bucher v. Hughes, 2010 MT 147, 357 Mont. 19, 235 P.3d 1281.

State as Victim of Crime — Restitution Owing: Brownback's mother engaged in a 6-year scheme to embezzle money from the state and then pass the money on to Brownback to support his gambling addiction. An investigation into his mother's embezzlement led to charges against Brownback for theft by common scheme. Following conviction, Brownback was ordered to pay nearly $1 million in restitution, including $739,312 to the state for the money his mother embezzled and passed on to him. Brownback contested the restitution award on grounds that he did not know that the money he received from his mother was embezzled from the state. The Supreme Court affirmed the restitution award. But for Brownback's continuing course of conduct, the state would not have lost $739,312. The causation standard for restitution was therefore satisfied, and because the state was a victim that suffered pecuniary loss, the state was entitled to full restitution. Even though Brownback thought the money was coming from his stepfather rather than the state, Brownback knew all along that he was obtaining unauthorized control over the property of the owner, so Brownback's ignorance that the money was embezzled from the state did not negate the mental state for theft. A person may not steal property from a stranger with impunity, so Brownback's mistake as to the identity of the source of the money did not affect the causal relationship. St. v. Brownback, 2010 MT 96, 356 Mont. 190, 232 P.3d 385, distinguishing St. v. Breeding, 2008 MT 162, 343 Mont. 323, 184 P.3d 313.

Criminal Fines Distinct From Other Court-Imposed Compensatory Financial Obligations — Fisher Overruled: The plain meaning of "fine" in 46-18-403 does not encompass fees, costs, charges, or other court-imposed financial obligations. Criminal fines are punitive in nature and are distinct from other court-imposed financial obligations associated with a criminal proceeding that are compensatory in nature, such as an assessment of fees for probationary supervision or a charge to defray a local government's costs in administering the criminal justice system. Voerding v. St., 2006 MT 125, 332 M 262, 136 P3d 502 (2006), overruling St. v. Fisher, 2003 MT 33, 314

M 222, 65 P3d 223 (2003), to the extent that Fisher suggests that the term “fine” in 46-18-403(2) encompasses other types of court-imposed financial obligations, such as fees, charges, and costs. See also St. v. VanWinkle, 2008 MT 208, 344 M 175, 186 P3d 1258 (2008).

Order for Restitution Upon Imposition of Deferred or Suspended Sentence — 1999 Amendments to Sentencing Statute Clarified: Heath was convicted of theft and possession of burglary tools and sentenced to 10 years in prison with 2 years suspended upon conditions, including payment of restitution. Heath appealed on grounds that the 1999 amendments to 46-18-201 no longer allowed a sentencing court to impose restitution as a condition of a suspended or deferred sentence. Upon amendment in 1999, an internal reference in 46-18-201(5) was not changed to reflect the renumbering of the other subsections, which resulted in an ambiguity in the plain language of the 46-18-201, potentially rendered 46-18-237 and subsection (2) of this section meaningless, created uncertain directives for payment of restitution for all victims in 46-18-241(1) and 46-18-244(2), and created a potentially absurd application of 46-18-201(1). Because of the potentially absurd consequences of the 1999 amendment, the Supreme Court looked beyond the words of the statute and inquired whether the Legislature intended to make any change in the substance and effect of 46-18-201. The court concluded that the 1999 amendment was a simple codification error that resulted in a cross-reference problem that was completely inconsistent with legislative intent to authorize sentencing courts to impose restitution when necessary for rehabilitation or for the protection of the victim or society if there is an appropriate correlation to the offense committed. Heath’s argument failed, and the imposition of restitution as a condition of Heath’s suspended sentence was affirmed. (Note: The erroneous internal reference in 46-18-201(5) was deleted in 2003.) St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004), followed in *St. v. Case Notes

No General or Inherent Authority of Sentencing Court to Generally Impose Parole Conditions — Parole Condition Related to Sexual Offense Authorized: There is no general or inherent authority for a sentencing court to impose parole conditions. A sentencing court may impose conditions on parole that are authorized by statute only. In this case, all conditions on Burch’s suspended sentence for sexual offenses were proper, but only one parole condition, prohibiting Burch from possessing pornography or accessing the Internet, was authorized under this section. Burch’s admission that he used the Internet at work to access pornography while on parole established that Burch violated a condition of his suspended sentence by a preponderance of the evidence. Thus, the sentencing court did not err in revoking Burch’s suspended sentence. St. v. Burch, 2008 MT 118, 342 M 499, 182 P3d 66 (2008), followed in St. v. Dennison, 2008 MT 344, 346 M 295, 194 P3d 704, (2008), St. v. Makarchuk, 2009 MT 82, 349 M 507, 204 P3d 1213 (2009), and St. v. Heafner, 2010 MT 87, 356 Mont. 128, 231 P.3d 1087 regarding authority of sentencing court.

Youth Court Adjudication Not Considered Conviction — No Authority to Require Adjudicated Youth to Register as Sexual or Violent Offender Under Pre-2007 Law: In 1998, 16-year-old Hastings was adjudicated a delinquent youth in Youth Court, admitting one offense of sexual intercourse without consent, and was committed to the Department of Corrections (DOC). When Hastings turned 18 in 2000, his case was transferred to District Court until age 25 based on the parties' stipulation that Hastings had not completed sex offender treatment or paid restitution and was at high risk to reoffend. The District Court then determined that Hastings had violated the conditions of the Youth Court order and committed Hastings to the DOC and also required that Hastings register as a level 2 sex offender. Hastings initially registered as a sex offender, but failed to update registration after moving and was subsequently charged with failure to maintain registration. Hastings moved to dismiss the charge, asserting that he had not been convicted of a sexual offense and that neither the commitment order nor statutes required him to register after discharging his sentence. The motion was denied, and Hastings appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Although the Youth Court had the authority to require sex offender registration pursuant to 41-5-1513, no requirement was made in this case. Because the Youth Court adjudication did not constitute a conviction, the District Court could not impose registration requirements under 46-18-201. (Note that the 2007 Legislature amended 46-23-502 to include an adjudicated youth in the definition of a sexual or violent offender.) The District Court's opinion that 41-5-1513 suggests a wholesale incorporation of sexual offender registry into the Montana Youth Court Act was erroneous, and absent statutory authority, a court may not impose a registration requirement. Failure to grant Hastings' motion to dismiss was error, and the case was remanded for dismissal. St. v. Hastings, 2007 MT 294, 340 M 1, 171 P3d 726 (2007), distinguishing St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003), and St. v. Villanueva, 2005 MT 192, 328 M 135, 118 P3d 179 (2005).

Amendment effective February 23, 1993.

1993 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 71, L. 1993, provided: "It is the intent of the legislature to amend 46-18-256 and 50-18-101 in order to comply with federal requirements of the Crime Control Act of 1990 that requires states to enact laws related to human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) testing of certain convicted offenders or be subject to reduced federal funding."

Upon the request of the victim or the victim's representatives, testing and the test results must be made available for the victim's information. Testing information may or may not reveal exposure to the HIV virus. If exposed, the victim can seek medical treatment and take steps to protect others from the further spread of the epidemic.

This bill is intended to be a benefit to public health and safety by attempting to control and limit the potential spread and impact of disease. It is not intended to add additional sanctions or penalties for conviction of sexual abuse offenses or to make criminals of the victims of disease."

Case Notes

Burglary Conviction — Conditions Related to Sexual Offense Affirmed: The defendant appealed the District Court’s imposition of conditions on the defendant’s suspended sentence for burglary, which included designating the defendant a level 2 sexual offender and requiring that the defendant undergo sexual offender treatment, a psychosexual evaluation, and HIV testing and provided for employment and occupational restrictions, arguing that the conditions should be stricken because the conditions were permissible only when the conviction involved a sexual offense. The Supreme Court reversed the designation as a sexual offender but affirmed the other conditions, concluding that the statutes requiring certain conditions of probation for persons convicted of a sexual offense did restrict those conditions to sexual offenses alone but did not otherwise limit the broad discretion of a sentencing court. St. v. Leyva, 2012 MT 124, 365 Mont. 204, 280 P.3d 252.

Part 3 Death Penalty

Part Case Notes

Claims Raised on Direct Appeal Barred by Statute or Res Judicata on Petition for Postconviction Relief: Dawson was convicted of robbery, four counts of aggravated kidnapping, and three counts of deliberate homicide and sentenced to death for each of three counts of aggravated kidnapping that resulted in the death of the victim. His conviction was appealed and affirmed (St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352 (1988)). Dawson filed for postconviction relief, alleging 30 separate grounds for relief, but all except one claim, ineffective assistance of counsel, were summarily dismissed. Although res judicata prevents claims raised on appeal from being raised again in a petition for postconviction relief, Dawson argued that three of his claims for postconviction relief could not have been raised on direct appeal because they required evidence not found in the record and thus should not have been subject to summary judgment. The District Court concluded that the issues could have been raised on direct appeal and were not preserved through objection at trial and so were barred by res judicata and 46-21-105. The Supreme Court examined all three of Dawson’s claims before affirming that 46-21-105 was properly applied to two of the claims and that no prejudice resulted from the application of res judicata to the third. Lastly, Dawson raised Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182 (1996), as grounds for reconsideration of several other claims based on serving the “ends of justice”. The Supreme Court felt no compulsion to reconsider any of Dawson’s claims to serve those ends because the claims were barred by res judicata. Dawson v. St., 2000 MT 219, 301 M 135, 10 P3d 49, 57 St. Rep. 883 (2000).

Death Row Not Considered Cruel and Unusual Punishment — Delay Attributed to Defendant’s Appeals: Citing Lackey v. Tex., 514 US 1045, 131 L Ed 2d 304, 115 S Ct 1421 (1995), Gollehon claimed that his right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment was violated by the amount of time that he spent on death row and by the number of sentencing hearings in his capital murder case. The Supreme Court declined to apply Lackey because the majority of the delay in Gollehon’s case was caused by his own pursuit of constitutional and statutory rights in state and federal courts and was not caused by the state. Gollehon’s claim for relief was denied. Gollehon v. St., 1999 MT 210, 296 M 6, 986 P2d 395, 56 St. Rep. 811 (1999). See also St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996).

Unconstitutional Retroactive Application of New Death Penalty Statute: Defendant was sentenced to death under a statute (later found unconstitutional) that mandated the death penalty. A new death penalty statute was passed providing for consideration of aggravating and mitigating circumstances during sentencing. Defendant was then resentenced to death under the new statute. In effect, the new statute added a sentencing "trial" at which the judge could consider evidence at the trial on guilt. This violated due process because counsel for defendant at the trial on guilt would have handled the trial differently had he known the evidence would also be used at the sentencing stage. The District Court was instructed to grant habeas corpus unless the state vacated the death sentence. Coleman v. McCormick, 874 F2d 1280 (9th Cir. 1989).

Life Sentence Followed by Death Sentence on Retrial: Defendant who was given a life sentence at his first deliberate homicide trial could not be given a death sentence at retrial because it placed him in double jeopardy. The life sentence constituted acquittal as to aggravating circumstances that would have justified the death penalty. Fitzpatrick v. McCormick, 869 F2d 1247 (9th Cir. 1989).

Aggravating Circumstances Related to Sentencing — Jury Determination Not Required: Defendant argued that the aggravating circumstances with which the trial court justified the death penalty were equivalent to a finding of malice and that he was therefore entitled to have a jury determine facts constituting the aggravating circumstances. The Supreme Court held that defendant was not entitled to a jury determination because the aggravating circumstances were related to sentencing only and were not elements of the crime charged. Capital sentencing procedures do not require jury participation. St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352, 45 St. Rep. 1542 (1988).

Defendant's Right to Limit Appeal: Defendant clearly expressed his intent to pursue only those appellate issues which must be reviewed as a matter of law. The Supreme Court affirmed his right to do so after finding that defendant was adjudged competent to make such a choice, holding that his decision must be respected if it is made competently, voluntarily, intelligently, and with full knowledge of the consequences. St. v. Keith, 231 M 214, 754 P2d 474, 45 St. Rep. 556 (1988).

No Right to Second Psychiatric Examination: Defendant was convicted of aggravated kidnapping and deliberate homicide, pursuant to pleas of guilty, and was sentenced to death. Judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court. Subsequently, defendant filed a motion for an additional psychiatric evaluation based on the case of Ake v. Okla., 470 US 68, 84 L Ed 2d 53, 105 S Ct 1087 (1985), which was decided after arguments in defendant's case. The Supreme Court distinguished the facts of defendant's case from the facts in Ake and denied defendant's motion. The Supreme Court found that defendant had already been afforded his right to access to a competent psychiatrist for the preparation of a defense based on his mental condition and was not entitled to an additional psychiatric examination. The Ake decision lacks direct application to Montana's capital sentencing proceedings and defendant's case. St. v. Smith, 217 M 453, 705 P2d 1110, 42 St. Rep. 1348 (1985).

Capital Sentence Requested by Defendant — No Basis for Resentencing: Defendant pleaded guilty to two counts of aggravated kidnapping and two counts of deliberate homicide. Defendant requested the death penalty. After sentencing, defendant had second thoughts and on appeal sought a resentencing. The Supreme Court held there was no basis for resentencing because: (1) sentencing was not tainted by reliance on prior Canadian convictions obtained without counsel; (2) inclusion of juvenile offenses as adult offenses in presentence report was not error; (3) a court-ordered presentence interview was not violative of the fifth amendment; (4) recommendation for the death penalty in the presentence report was not improper; (5) no judicial error was committed in the extent of review of mitigating factors and no unconstitutional limit was placed on the court's consideration of mitigating circumstances; (6) no error was found in the court's denial of defendant's motion for additional psychiatric evaluation; (7) defendant was not required to be present at proceedings occurring after the verdict; (8) jury participation is not constitutionally required in capital sentencing procedures; (9) no indication was found that the trial court imposed the death penalty out of passion or prejudice; and (10) the sentence was not excessive or disproportionate. St. v. Smith, 217 M 461, 705 P2d 1087, 42 St. Rep. 463 (1985) (Smith I). A habeas corpus petition was conditionally granted in Smith v. McCormick, 917 F2d 1153 (9th Cir. 1990), a subsequent resentencing of death was reversed and remanded for preparation of a new presentence investigation, St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000 (1993) (Smith II), and following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

1983 Amendments Not Bill of Attainder: Chapter 411, L. 1983, amended 46-19-103 to allow the defendant to choose death by lethal injection as an alternative to hanging. Section 7 makes the act applicable to death sentences whether first pronounced before or after its effective date, making the act specifically retroactive. The act is not a bill of attainder as argued by the defendant who was convicted before the effective date of the act and sentenced to death after its effective date. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 211 M 341, 684 P2d 1112, 41 St. Rep. 1400 (1984).

Death Penalty Not Disproportionate to Deliberate Homicide: When a life has been taken by an offender, it cannot be said that the punishment of death is invariably disproportionate to the crime. McKenzie v. Osborne, 195 M 26, 640 P2d 368, 38 St. Rep. 1745 (1981), followed in St. v. Keith, 231 M 214, 754 P2d 474, 45 St. Rep. 556 (1988).

Death Penalty — Facially Neutral — Discrimination to Be Shown: Petitioner challenged Montana's death penalty statutes as arbitrary and discriminatory. Montana has instituted sentencing procedures that focus on the character of the defendant and the circumstances of the crime. In doing this, arbitrariness is conclusively removed from sentencing. As regards discrimination, the disproportionate impact of a facially neutral law will not make the law unconstitutional unless discriminatory intent or purpose is found. Montana's law is facially neutral, and no allegation of discriminatory intent was raised. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981).

Constitutionality of Former Death Sentence Statute: Section 94-5-105, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), which provided a procedure for the imposition of a sentence of death for a conviction of deliberate homicide, was constitutional on its face. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980).

Increase of Sentence After New Trial — Due Process: The defendant, who had been sentenced to 100 years' imprisonment for deliberate homicide, was not denied due process of law when, after a new trial on the same charge, he was sentenced to death. The due process clause is not offended by all possibilities of increased punishment upon retrial after appeal, but only those that pose a realistic likelihood of vindictiveness. When the District Court Judge was replaced for the new trial and sentencing and the new judge stated his reasons for imposing the death penalty with clarity, the threat of vindictiveness was not a realistic likelihood. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980).

Sentencing Under Statutes Amended After Date of Crime: The sentencing of the defendant to death for a conviction of aggravated kidnapping under statutes amended after section 94-5-304, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), was declared unconstitutional did not violate the constitutional prohibition against ex post facto laws. The amendments were ameliorative in nature and did not deprive defendant of a substantial right or immunity that he possessed at the time the crime was committed. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980).

Constitutionality:

Montana's statutory scheme for imposing the death penalty meets the standards established by the U.S. Supreme Court. The penalty is not cruel and unusual simply because Montana's criminal statutes allow its imposition in this case for the crime of aggravated kidnapping but not for the crime, as committed here, of deliberate homicide. St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000, 36 St. Rep. 1134 (1979).

In light of recent U.S. Supreme Court decisions (Woodson v. N. C., 428 US 280, 49 L Ed 2d 944, 96 S Ct 2978 (1976); Coker v. Ga., 433 US 584, 53 L Ed 2d 982, 97 S Ct 2861 (1977); Roberts v. La., 431 US 633, 52 L Ed 2d 637, 97 S Ct 1993 (1977)), section 94-5-304, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed), as it existed at the time of the defendant's trial, was unconstitutional on its face as a mandatory death penalty statute. St. v. Coleman, 177 M 1, 579 P2d 732 (1978).

While the statutes did not provide for the jury in the bifurcated sentencing procedure, they were within the constitutional boundaries of recent U.S. Supreme Court cases. The sentence of death in this case was rested on a narrowly defined type of murder or kidnapping. The former statute provided for the sentencing judge to consider mitigating circumstances. In addition, appellate judicial review and other sentence review was provided. St. v. McKenzie, 171 M 278, 557 P2d 1023 (1976).

By an earlier decision of the U.S. Supreme Court, statutes allowing the sentencer discretion as to whether to impose the death penalty were unconstitutional; although the conviction would be upheld, a sentence of death made at the discretion of the court under a former statute was unconstitutional and would be commuted to life imprisonment. St. v. Rhodes, 164 M 455, 524 P2d 1095 (1974).

Retroactive Application of Death Penalty Provisions — No Ex Post Facto Violation: Where after the commission of the crime of homicide, the U.S. Supreme Court found the death penalty statute unconstitutional and the state Legislature took only the procedural step of redefining the punishment, not the crime, there is no ex post facto violation in upholding the previous death penalty imposed, since the defendant had “fair warning” of the consequences of homicide. St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000, 36 St. Rep. 1134 (1979).

Review of Death Sentence — Disproportionate Application: The Supreme Court, in reviewing a death sentence to determine whether it is disproportionate, reviews the circumstances of the crime of which the defendant is accused and in light of those circumstances, the judgment and the sentence thereupon imposed. It examines cases involving similar crimes, for the single purpose, making certain that as far as the defendant in this particular case is concerned, there has been no discriminatory action on the part of the sentencing judge and no abuse of discretion by the sentencing judge and that the sentencing judge has considered and applied fairly and without discrimination the applicable law. The Supreme Court looks for the even-handed application of death sentences without regard to sex, color, creed, or race or any other discriminating consideration. When this has occurred, as here, the death sentence must be upheld. St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000, 36 St. Rep. 1134 (1979).

Requisites of a Valid Death Penalty: The U.S. Supreme Court seems to have established three general criteria that are requisite to a valid death penalty statutory scheme: (1) there must be at least one statutory aggravating circumstance before a death sentence may be considered; (2) the defense must be afforded the opportunity to bring before the sentencing body at a separate sentencing hearing any mitigating circumstances relating to the individual defendant; and (3) there must be available prompt judicial review of the sentencing decision by a court of statewide jurisdiction. The statutory scheme in existence at the time of commission of the crimes charged in the instant case met the above criteria. St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 581 P2d 1205 (1978).

Prospective Juror's View of Death Penalty: Two prospective jurors were properly excluded under the exception to the general rule of Witherspoon v. Ill., 391 US 510, 20 L Ed 2d 776, 88 S Ct 1770 (1968), because they were irrevocably committed to voting against conviction because of the possibility of a death penalty. St. v. Coleman, 177 M 1, 579 P2d 732 (1978).

Case Notes

Burden to Mitigate: Petitioner, under a sentence of death, alleged error in that the burden in sentencing rests on him to show mitigation. The mitigating factors regarding the death penalty sentence have no bearing on guilt or innocence. It is permissible to allow facts pertinent only to the question of punishment to be determined by a judge rather than by a jury, and the State need not prove such facts beyond a reasonable doubt. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981).

Jury Not Involved in Sentencing — Different Factors Required: Petitioner claimed he was denied constitutional rights because the jury was not involved in the sentencing determination; he was sentenced to hang. The factor of overriding importance in sentencing schemes is that the trial and sentencing must be bifurcated, with different factors considered at each. The factors considered by a judge in imposing the death penalty are not elements of the crime. There is no constitutional requirement that a jury make the determination to impose the death penalty. Petitioner's claim was properly dismissed. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981).

Case Notes

No Prejudice From Alleged Ineffective Assistance of Counsel During Sentencing Phase: Dawson was convicted of robbery, four counts of aggravated kidnapping, and three counts of deliberate homicide and sentenced to death for each of three counts of aggravated kidnapping that resulted in the death of the victim. His conviction was appealed and affirmed (St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352 (1988)). Dawson filed for postconviction relief, alleging 30 separate grounds for relief, but all except one claim, ineffective assistance of counsel, were dismissed. Dawson’s appellate counsel withdrew, and Dawson filed an amended petition adding a 31st ground for relief, which was ineffective assistance of appellate counsel, but that petition was also denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court considered Dawson’s claim of ineffective assistance of counsel during the sentencing phase. Dawson alleged that counsel was ineffective in failing to: (1) present crucial mitigating evidence to the sentencing court; (2) conduct an adequate sentencing investigation; and (3) move the sentencing court for reconsideration of its conclusion that Dawson posed a substantial and continuing threat and had no chance for rehabilitation. On the first point, Dawson contended that counsel should have offered the statement of the state’s key witness regarding another man whom she saw near the crime scene, which Dawson maintained would have bolstered his defense theory that he acted under duress or coercion. However, the statement was vague, and Dawson never offered information concerning the involvement of others. Neither the jury nor the sentencing court accepted the defense theory, and Dawson could not demonstrate prejudice because of counsel’s failure to offer the statement. Counsel’s decision not to present or argue evidence of Dawson’s drug use as a mitigating factor did not constitute ineffective assistance, given counsel’s determination that evidence of drug use would have been inflammatory and prejudicial and would have been an aggravating rather than mitigating factor. Failure of counsel to present evidence at sentencing of Dawson’s good behavior in jail also did not constitute ineffective assistance because that evidence was presented at the guilt phase and was thus considered at the sentencing phase as well. Second, Dawson’s assertion that counsel overlooked demonstrations of remorse found in the records of the staff that conducted his psychiatric examination, which would have served to rebut the findings by the sentencing court regarding his lack of remorse, did not constitute prejudice because the court’s finding was based on the court’s own observations of Dawson throughout the lengthy proceedings. It was also reasonable for counsel not to investigate Dawson’s medical and school records, absent any evidence that further investigation would have been beneficial. Dawson’s argument that counsel erred in failing to interview boyhood friends to develop or determine the existence of mitigating evidence also failed. Counsel did present letters from Dawson’s mother, sister, and former spouses, and the failure to further investigate boyhood friends did not constitute ineffective assistance. Third, counsel’s failure to move the sentencing court for reconsideration of its conclusion that Dawson posed a substantial and continuing threat and had no chance for rehabilitation was not ineffective assistance given the findings in St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352 (1988), that evidence supported the sentencing court’s finding of aggravating factors and that the death sentence was appropriate. The District Court did not err when it found that Dawson did not receive ineffective assistance at sentencing. Dawson v. St., 2000 MT 219, 301 M 135, 10 P3d 49, 57 St. Rep. 883 (2000).

Consideration of Victim Impact Statement Not Reversible Error: The District Court considered the oral statements of the victim’s father before sentencing the defendant to death. The Supreme Court held that the lower court’s consideration of the victim impact statement was not error because the statement was considered by a judge, not a jury, and the statement was not written and was short and unemotional. St. v. Kills On Top, 241 M 378, 787 P2d 336, 47 St. Rep. 366 (1990).

Defendant’s Silence Considered in Sentencing — No Error: Trial judge’s observation of defendant’s silence at trial as a factor in imposing the death sentence did not constitute improper consideration of defendant’s constitutional right to remain silent. The sentencing order contained a finding that defendant demonstrated no remorse or genuine concern for human life. The finding could be seen as an expression of the absence of a mitigating factor, and in light of several other factors warranting imposition of the death sentence, the presence of the finding in the sentencing order was not significant. St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352, 45 St. Rep. 1542 (1988).

Reference to Victim Impact Information by Sentencing Judge Not Cruel and Unusual Punishment: Defendant claimed the death sentence was improper because the sentencing judge referred to the victim impact information contained in the presentence investigation report. Defendant cited the holding in Booth v. Maryland, 482 US 496, 96 L Ed 2d 440, 107 S Ct 2529 (1987), that it was a violation of the eighth amendment of the U.S. Constitution (similar to Art. II, sec. 22, Mont. Const.) for a sentencing jury to refer to information in a victim impact statement during the sentencing stage of a capital murder trial. The Montana Supreme Court held that Booth was factually distinguishable from Montana sentencing procedures, noting that a judge rather than a jury performs sentencing under Montana law. Furthermore, the judge may be allowed to hear and rule on the admissibility of evidence that the jury is not allowed to hear, yet he is still responsible for sentencing. Absent evidence that the judge was adversely affected by victim impact information, there was no constitutional violation. St. v. Keith, 231 M 214, 754 P2d 474, 45 St. Rep. 556 (1988), followed in St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352, 45 St. Rep. 1542 (1988), and Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

Presentence Report Properly Used by Judge: Defendant's contention that hearsay tainted the presentence report was without merit. Section 46-18-112 authorizes a complete investigation into the background of the defendant and does not limit hearsay. The District Court's reliance upon the recommendation of the probation officer was not error. Section 46-18-302 authorizes the sentencing judge to consider the widest possible scope of inquiry when determining the sentence to be imposed. The court followed the position established in St. v. Smith, 217 M 461, 705 P2d 1087, 42 St. Rep. 463 (1985), regarding the sentencing judge's discretion to use the presentence report and sentencing recommendations. St. v. D.B.S., 216 M 234, 700 P2d 630, 42 St. Rep. 770 (1985).

Capital Sentence Requested by Defendant — No Basis for Resentencing: Defendant pleaded guilty to two counts of aggravated kidnapping and two counts of deliberate homicide. Defendant requested the death penalty. After sentencing, defendant had second thoughts and on appeal sought a resentencing. The Supreme Court held there was no basis for resentencing because: (1) sentencing was not tainted by reliance on prior Canadian convictions obtained without counsel; (2) inclusion of juvenile offenses as adult offenses in presentence report was not error; (3) a court-ordered presentence interview was not violative of the fifth amendment; (4) recommendation for the death penalty in the presentence report was not improper; (5) no judicial error was committed in the extent of review of mitigating factors and no unconstitutional limit was placed on the court's consideration of mitigating circumstances; (6) no error was found in the court's denial of defendant's motion for additional psychiatric evaluation; (7) defendant was not required to be present at proceedings occurring after the verdict; (8) jury participation is not constitutionally required in capital sentencing procedures; (9) no indication was found that the trial court imposed the death penalty out of passion or prejudice; and (10) the sentence was not excessive or disproportionate. St. v. Smith, 217 M 461, 705 P2d 1087, 42 St. Rep. 463 (1985) (Smith I). A habeas corpus petition was conditionally granted in Smith v. McCormick, 917 F2d 1153 (9th Cir. 1990), a subsequent resentencing of death was reversed and remanded for preparation of a new presentence investigation, St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000 (1993) (Smith II), and following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

1999 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 52 throughout section substituted references to offender for references to defendant and person; inserted (1)(a)(vi) regarding certain sexual crimes when the victim is less than 18 years old; deleted former (9) that read: "(9) The offense was deliberate homicide and was committed by a person during the course of committing sexual assault, sexual intercourse without consent, deviate sexual conduct, or incest, and the victim was less than 18 years of age"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Chapter 126 in (1)(a)(i) substituted "while in official detention, as defined in 45-2-101" for "serving a sentence of imprisonment in the state prison"; in (1)(a)(ii) after "by a" substituted "person" for "defendant"; inserted (1)(a)(vi) regarding a deliberate homicide committed by a person during the course of committing sexual assault, sexual intercourse without consent, deviate sexual conduct, or incest if the victim was under 18 years of age; in (3) after "committed while" substituted "in official detention, as defined in 45-2-101" for "incarcerated at the state prison"; deleted former (9) that read: "(9) The offense was deliberate homicide and was committed by a person during the course of committing sexual assault, sexual intercourse without consent, deviate sexual conduct, or incest, and the victim was less than 18 years of age"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Chapter 491 in (1)(a)(i) and (3) substituted "a state prison" for "the state prison". Amendment effective April 27, 1999.

Style changes were slightly different in the chapters. In each case, the codifier chose appropriate text.

The amendments to (1)(a)(i) and (3) by Ch. 491 were rendered void by the amendments made by Ch. 126 and were not codified.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 52, L. 1999, provided: "WHEREAS, the Correctional Standards and Oversight Committee was authorized by the Fifty-Fifth Legislature to conduct a study of correctional standards and to act as a correctional oversight committee; and

WHEREAS, the Committee contracted for a review of Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, sentencing statutes; and

WHEREAS, the Committee found that the statutes providing for sentencing and judgment regarding criminal procedures are confusing and rife with cross-references, internal references, and inconsistent terminology that make the statutes difficult to read and understand; and

WHEREAS, the Committee recommended that a bill be drafted to amend Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, to make nonsubstantive changes to clarify and streamline the statutes to eliminate contradictions, confusion, inconsistent terminology, and excessive internal references.

THEREFORE, the Legislature of the State of Montana finds it appropriate to so amend certain sentencing-related statutes."

1997 Amendment: Chapter 312 inserted (10) concerning the offense of sexual intercourse without consent when the convicted person has a prior conviction for that offense and during each offense inflicted serious bodily injury on a person; and made minor changes in style.

1989 Amendment: Inserted (9) concerning deliberate homicide during course of sexual crime involving a minor.

1987 Amendment: At end of (7), after "death of the victim", inserted remainder of subsection referring to death of a rescuer.

1985 Amendment: Inserted (8) including as aggravating circumstances an offense committed at the State Prison by a person convicted of deliberate homicide or found to be a persistent felon.

Case Notes

Constitutional Standard Applicable to Aggravating Circumstance Regarding Offense Committed as Part of Scheme or Operation and Regarding Aggravated Kidnapping: Each statutory aggravating circumstance under this section must satisfy a constitutional standard derived from Furman v. Ga., 408 US 238, 33 L Ed 2d 346, 92 S Ct 2726 (1972), requiring that the aggravating circumstance not be so vague that it fails to channel the discretion of the sentencing court, resulting in arbitrary and capricious sentencing. The circumstance set out in subsection (5) of this section satisfies the constitutional standard by narrowing the class of persons eligible for the death penalty in two respects: (1) the offense must be committed as part of a planned undertaking or systematic plan; and (2) the scheme or operation must contemplate the death of more than one person. The circumstance set out in subsection (7) of this section also satisfies the constitutional requirement by providing the death of the victim as the factor that narrows the class of persons who have committed the predicate felony of aggravated kidnapping. Defendant's argument that an aggravating factor is required to narrow the class of persons who have committed two predicate felonies was in error because the aggravating factors set out in this section are independent of each other and each one, by itself, is sufficient to justify imposition of the death penalty. St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000, 50 St. Rep. 1388 (1993). (Smith II). Following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

Prison Inmate — Aggravating Circumstances Applicable to Conviction for Deliberate Homicide by Accountability: A prison inmate who was convicted of killing another inmate contended that the aggravating circumstances of subsections (1) and (2) of this section did not apply because he was found not guilty of deliberate homicide, but guilty of deliberate homicide by accountability. However, the jury was clearly and correctly instructed that the offense of deliberate homicide by accountability requires a deliberate homicide and a finding that the defendant acted with common purpose before or during the homicide. The jury did not find defendant not guilty of deliberate homicide, but found only that he did not act alone during the crime, thus allowing the conviction of both men involved in the crime without having to determine which man struck the fatal blow. Because defendant was convicted of deliberate homicide by accountability, the sentencing consideration of whether to use the death penalty for the conviction was not double jeopardy, nor was consideration of aggravating circumstances an error. St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 1, 864 P2d 249, 50 St. Rep. 1250 (1993), distinguishing Enmund v. Fla., 458 US 782, 73 L Ed 2d 1140, 102 S Ct 3368 (1981).

Not Error to Consider Lack of Remorse as Aggravating Factor: The defendant in a multiple homicide case moved to have his death sentence set aside on the basis that the trial court relied on the defendant's lack of remorse as an aggravating factor justifying the death penalty. The Supreme Court held that there was no error because the lack of remorse relates to the propriety of the death sentence even though it is not statutorily enumerated as an aggravating circumstance. St. v. Langford, 248 M 420, 813 P2d 936, 48 St. Rep. 492 (1991). The petition for postconviction relief was denied in St. v. Langford, 249 M 385, 819 P2d 151, 48 St. Rep. 620 (1991).

Evidence of Torture and Lying in Wait or Ambush: A finding of aggravating circumstances was justified upon evidence of homicide by means of torture and lying in wait or ambush. St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352, 45 St. Rep. 1542 (1988).

Defendant on Parole — Questionable Aggravating Circumstance for Purpose of Death Penalty: This section fails to address whether deliberate homicide committed by a parolee from this or any other state constitutes an aggravating circumstance for purposes of the death penalty. St. v. Keith, 231 M 214, 754 P2d 474, 45 St. Rep. 556 (1988), distinguished in St. v. Sattler, 1998 MT 57, 288 M 79, 956 P2d 54, 55 St. Rep. 230 (1998).

Statutory Narrowing of Class of Death-Eligible Persons: The Supreme Court specifically held that subsection (7) (now subsection (2)) of this section genuinely narrowed the class of death-eligible persons and was an appropriate aggravating circumstance for the death penalty. St. v. Keith, 231 M 214, 754 P2d 474, 45 St. Rep. 556 (1988).

Evidence of "Lying in Wait" and That "The Offense Was Aggravated Kidnapping Which Resulted in the Death of the Victim": The evidence in the record clearly proved that sufficient aggravating circumstances existed to warrant imposition of the death penalty in that the crime of deliberate homicide had been "committed by a person lying in wait or ambush" and the crime of aggravated kidnapping "resulted in the death of the victim". St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980).

Lying in Wait: When the defendant had robbed a bank and in the course of his escape drove his automobile into a coulee, stopped his machine, and shortly thereafter shot and killed one of his pursuers, an instruction that homicide committed by lying in wait constituted murder in the first degree under a former section was proper. St. v. Jackson, 71 M 421, 230 P 370 (1924).

Applicability of Brady Rule — Evidence of Accomplice's Rape, Criminal History, and Violent Background Insufficient for New Trial: In a postconviction relief proceeding, petitioner claimed that the state's failure at the first trial to disclose the accomplice's criminal history or sexual assault allegation was prejudicial and warranted a new trial. The Supreme Court found this argument completely without merit. Although the evidence may have been helpful in impeaching the accomplice's testimony, in no way could the failure to disclose this information reasonably be taken to put the whole case in such a different light as to undermine confidence in the verdict. Even in the absence of the accomplice's testimony, there was an overwhelming abundance of other accomplice testimony and corroborative evidence to establish petitioner's guilt. The state did not violate Brady with regard to the guilt phase of petitioner's trial because any favorable information that the state failed to disclose was not material to petitioner's guilt or innocence. Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

Proper Finding of Nonexistence of Mitigating Factors in Prison Homicide — Death Penalty Affirmed: Johnson did not dispute the District Court's finding that two aggravating circumstances existed, but contended that the court's conclusion, that there were no mitigating circumstances sufficiently substantial to call for leniency, was in error. The trial court is not required to make findings on each piece of purportedly mitigating evidence produced; it is only required to consider all aggravating and mitigating evidence presented. Johnson's version of the circumstances surrounding the murder, which if believed may have indicated that some degree of leniency was appropriate, was not credible. Having considered Johnson's proposed mitigating circumstances and rejected them, the District Court's decision was affirmed. St. v. Johnson, 1998 MT 289, 291 M 501, 969 P2d 925, 55 St. Rep. 1186 (1998).

No Error in Analyzing Mitigating Circumstances: The District Court did not err in analyzing mitigating circumstances by: (1) considering every enumerated mitigating factor rather than only those that were raised by defendant; (2) failing to consider, as mitigating evidence, defendant's testimony that the homicide victim was the aggressor; (3) failing to make independent findings on defendant's justifiable use of force defense; (4) failing to find that sentences in other cases did not constitute a mitigating circumstance; (5) failing to consider whether the death sentence in this case was disproportionate or excessive, which is the province of the Supreme Court; and (6) not making findings on each piece of purportedly mitigating evidence produced by defendant. St. v. Sattler, 1998 MT 57, 288 M 79, 956 P2d 54, 55 St. Rep. 230 (1998), following St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272 (1996), and distinguishing St. v. Korell, 213 M 316, 690 P2d 992 (1984).

Duty of Prosecution to Give Defendant All Requested Exculpatory Information — Applicability of Brady Rule — Remand for Resentencing: Under Brady v. Md., 373 US 83, 10 L Ed 2d 215, 83 S Ct 1194 (1963), the prosecution is required to give a criminal defendant all requested exculpatory information material either to the defendant's guilt or to punishment. Under U.S. v. Bagley, 473 US 667, 87 L Ed 2d 481, 105 S Ct 3375 (1985), the prosecution must also deliver to the defendant all evidence significant for impeachment purposes. In order to require reversal of a defendant's conviction or sentence, a Brady violation must relate to material information. The standard for materiality was set out in Kyles v. Whitley, 514 US 419, 131 L Ed 2d 490, 115 S Ct 1555, 63 USLW 4303 (1995), holding that the defendant must show that there is a reasonable probability that had the information been provided, the result would have been different. The effect of suppressed Brady material must be considered collectively rather than on an item-by-item basis. In the present case, defendant raised numerous issues in an attempt to show that the state had failed to disclose certain materials. After examining each issue, the Supreme Court found that all but two were immaterial and that those two would not have affected the outcome of the trial even if they had been disclosed. However, there was a reasonable probability that had that information been provided to the defendant, the result of the sentencing hearing could have been different if the undisclosed information could have been used to support defendant's contention of mitigating circumstances. Therefore, the court vacated the sentences and remanded for resentencing. Kills On Top v. St., 273 M 32, 901 P2d 1368, 52 St. Rep. 608 (1995), followed in Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182, 53 St. Rep. 1197 (1996), and St. v. Buckles, 1999 MT 79, 294 M 95, 979 P2d 177, 56 St. Rep. 331 (1999). See also Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000), holding that it was harmless error for the District Court to fail to address new claims in its Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law and Order dismissing petitioner's amended petition for postconviction relief.

Applicability of "Catchall" Mitigating Circumstance to Postoffense Conduct: The enormously broad "catchall" mitigating circumstance in subsection (8) of this section reflects the Legislature's intent to permit a defendant to raise any and all facts and evidence that might mitigate against the death penalty, including evidence of conduct during incarceration subsequent to the offense. Evidence may include any evidence required in a presentence investigation under 46-18-112 relative to a defendant's characteristics, circumstances, needs, and potentialities. In this case, the sentencing court erred by failing to order a presentence investigation and report that included consideration of defendant's admission of guilt, contrition, commitment to rehabilitation, and conduct while incarcerated, which were all relevant as mitigating evidence. St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000, 50 St. Rep. 1388 (1993) (Smith II), following Lockett v. Ohio, 438 US 586, 57 L Ed 2d 973, 98 S Ct 2954 (1978), Skipper v. S.C., 476 US 1, 90 L Ed 2d 1, 106 S Ct 1669 (1986), and Smith v. McCormick, 914 F2d 1153 (9th Cir. 1990). Following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

District Court Not Precluded From Considering Any Mitigating Factor: A District Court in a capital case may not be precluded from considering, as a mitigating factor, any aspect of a defendant's character or record and any of the circumstances of the offense that a defendant proffers as a basis for a sentence less than death. In this case, the District Court did not err in its consideration of mitigating evidence of defendant's family background and the testimony of a codefendant concerning the circumstances of the offense. St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000, 50 St. Rep. 1388 (1993), following Lockett v. Ohio, 438 US 586, 57 L Ed 2d 973, 98 S Ct 2954 (1978), and Skipper v. S.C., 476 US 1, 90 L Ed 2d 1, 106 S Ct 1669 (1986). Following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

Consideration of "Catchall" of Mitigating Circumstances: The trial court reviewed in detail the first seven elements comprising mitigating circumstances under this section and found no evidence of any of the elements. Gollehon presented evidence of childhood abuse under the catchall element of subsection (8) of this section, and the court properly considered the evidence without passion or prejudice and with consideration of whether the sentence was proportional to the crime, as required by 46-18-310. It was not error for the court to then conclude that the evidence was insufficient to preclude the death penalty. St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 1, 864 P2d 249, 50 St. Rep. 1250 (1993).

Absence of Prior Criminal History — Death Sentence Affirmed: The absence of a prior criminal history was insufficient to warrant leniency when the nature of the capital crimes for which defendant was convicted was weighed against the lack of a significant criminal history. St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352, 45 St. Rep. 1542 (1988), followed in St. v. Langford, 248 M 420, 813 P2d 936, 48 St. Rep. 492 (1991).

Mitigating Circumstances Not Sufficiently Substantial to Warrant Leniency: The Supreme Court affirmed the death penalty after finding the trial court properly considered and rejected 21 items defendant alleged as mitigating circumstances, including defendant's physical and mental disabilities, expression of remorse and desire to reform, lack of violent crimes in his past criminal record, the effect of an injury sustained during commission of the crimes, and miscellaneous personal problems. St. v. Keith, 231 M 214, 754 P2d 474, 45 St. Rep. 556 (1988).

Significant History of Prior Criminal Activity: The District Court's finding that no mitigating circumstances existed in favor of the defendant was upheld when the defendant had a long history of prior criminal activity and no other facts existed in mitigation of the penalty. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980).

2003 Amendment: Chapter 154 near middle of first sentence after "death if" substituted "the trier of fact found beyond a reasonable doubt, or the defendant pleaded guilty to the offense and admitted to, one or more aggravating circumstances" for "it finds one or more of the aggravating circumstances"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

Case Notes

Finding of Aggravating Circumstance and No Mitigating Circumstance — Mandatory Death Sentence: Upon finding a single aggravating circumstance, that defendant had previously been convicted of homicide, and finding no mitigating circumstances sufficient to call for leniency, the District Court was statutorily required to sentence defendant to death. Further, under a death penalty scheme like Montana's, it is not required that a death penalty be reversed or that a new sentencing hearing be conducted if one of several aggravating circumstances found to exist is subsequently held to be inapplicable, as long as the inapplicability of one aggravating circumstance does not render the death penalty arbitrary or capricious. St. v. Sattler, 1998 MT 57, 288 M 79, 956 P2d 54, 55 St. Rep. 230 (1998).

Failure to Establish Standard Governing Weighing of Aggravating and Mitigating Factors Not Unconstitutional Allocation of Burden of Proof: As set out in Zant v. Stephens, 462 US 862, 77 L Ed 2d 235, 103 S Ct 2733 (1983), the fact that this section fails to establish a standard governing the District Court's weighing of aggravating and mitigating factors does not mean it is constitutionally flawed. Imposition of the death sentence is required if the court finds one or more aggravating circumstances and finds no mitigating circumstances sufficiently substantial to call for leniency. St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000, 50 St. Rep. 1388 (1993) (Smith II), distinguishing People v. Young, 814 P2d 834 (Colo. 1991). Following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

Verbatim Adoption of Proposed Findings in Death Penalty Sentencing — Reversal Not Required: The Supreme Court does not condone a District Court's verbatim adoption of proposed findings, especially when weighing aggravating and mitigating circumstances in a matter as grave as imposition of the death penalty. However, findings and conclusions that are sufficiently comprehensive and pertinent to the issues to provide a basis for decision and that are supported by evidence will not be overturned simply because the District Court relied on proposed findings and conclusions submitted by counsel, nor are findings adopted in that manner so inherently flawed that the prevailing party must be reversed. St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000, 50 St. Rep. 1388 (1993), distinguishing Patterson v. St., 513 S2d 1257 (Fla. 1987).

Substantial Evidence of Aggravating Circumstances: There was substantial evidence to support the following factual findings in the sentencing order: (1) the victim died as a result of beatings; (2) defendant knew the victim was married and had a family; (3) the victim pleaded for his life with defendant and accomplices, to no avail; (4) defendant's demeanor at trial and at the sentencing hearing exhibited no remorse; (5) defendant could have removed himself from the entire episode and saved the victim's life on more than one occasion, but failed to do so; (6) two aggravating circumstances applied, namely that the offense of deliberate homicide was committed by means of torture and the offense of aggravated kidnapping resulted in the death of the victim; (7) the mitigating circumstance that defendant acted under the domination of another person did not apply; (8) evidence did not show that defendant was substantially impaired by his drinking; (9) defendant was an accomplice in a deliberate homicide committed by another person; and (10) the only possible mitigating circumstance was insubstantial to call for leniency. St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990).

Death Penalty Upon Finding of Aggravating Circumstances — Not Cruel and Unusual Punishment: Defendant maintained that 46-18-305 allowed the imposition of cruel and unusual punishment because it did not sufficiently narrow the class of death-eligible defendants. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that this argument was previously rejected in St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428 (1980). St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352, 45 St. Rep. 1542 (1988).

Burden to Mitigate: Petitioner, under a sentence of death, alleged error in that the burden in sentencing rests on him to show mitigation. The mitigating factors regarding the death penalty sentence have no bearing on guilt or innocence. It is permissible to allow facts pertinent only to the question of punishment to be determined by a judge rather than by a jury, and the State need not prove such facts beyond a reasonable doubt. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981), followed in St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000, 50 St. Rep. 1388 (1993). See also Walton v. Ariz., 497 US 639, 111 L Ed 2d 511, 110 S Ct 3047 (1990) (Smith II). Following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

Jury Not Involved in Sentencing — Different Factors Required: Petitioner claimed he was denied constitutional rights because the jury was not involved in the sentencing determination; he was sentenced to hang. The factor of overriding importance in sentencing schemes is that the trial and sentencing must be bifurcated, with different factors considered at each. The factors considered by a judge in imposing the death penalty are not elements of the crime. There is no constitutional requirement that a jury make the determination to impose the death penalty. Petitioner's claim was properly dismissed. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981).

Mitigation Insufficient to Offset Aggravation: Aggravating and mitigating factors to be considered by the sentencing court in death penalty cases do not mandate the death penalty upon the finding of an aggravating circumstance, but rather require consideration of whatever mitigating circumstances are found to be present. The District Court found that the aggravating factor (death of the victim of aggravated kidnapping) was not offset by the mitigating factor (lack of a prior criminal record), and the Supreme Court affirmed that decision. St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000, 36 St. Rep. 1134 (1979).

Requirement of "Sufficiently Substantial" Mitigating Factors: The statutory language allowing consideration of only "sufficiently substantial" mitigating factors is not an encroachment upon the discretion of the judge when he passes sentence on capital cases in violation of Lockett v. Ohio, 438 US 586, 57 L Ed 2d 973, 98 S Ct 2954 (1978), since it only requires the factor to have some substance or weight. St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000, 36 St. Rep. 1134 (1979).

46-18-306. Specific written findings of fact.

Case Notes

No Requirement That Written Findings Be Filed Concurrently With Oral Imposition of Death Sentence: Nothing in this section requires the District Court to file its written findings concurrently with its oral imposition of the death sentence. A 1-week delay in filing of written findings did not constitute reversible error. St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000, 50 St. Rep. 1388 (1993) (Smith II), distinguishing Christopher v. Fla., 583 S2d 642 (Fla. 1991). Following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

46-18-307. Automatic review of sentence.Case Notes

Prison Murder — Death Sentence Not Imposed Under Influence of Passion, Prejudice, or Arbitrary Factors: Johnson was convicted of killing another prison inmate and contended on appeal that the death sentence was imposed under the influence of passion, prejudice, or other arbitrary factors because the District Court predicated its sentence on Montana's correctional policy, as set forth in 46-18-101, but that the policy does not expressly provide for death as punishment for any crime. The Supreme Court agreed that the statute does not expressly discuss death as a punishment for criminal conduct, but noted that, being a general declaration of state correctional policy, the statute also does not discuss most of the sentencing options allowed by law. Notwithstanding the fact that the death sentence has been affirmed as constitutional, the District Court's findings reflected its consideration of the general statutory principles that a sentence be based primarily on the crime committed, the prospects of rehabilitation, the circumstances under which the crime was committed, and the offender's criminal history. The circumstances of this crime, coupled with Johnson's long history of assaultive and predatory behavior both in and out of prison, were reflected in the court's analysis and showed that the court carefully and dispassionately considered all the evidence before it concluded that the death penalty was appropriate. St. v. Johnson, 1998 MT 289, 291 M 501, 969 P2d 925, 55 St. Rep. 1186 (1998).

Sentence Imposed Same Day as Sentencing Hearing — No Influence of Passion, Prejudice, or Other Arbitrary Factor: Despite defendant's contention that the death sentence was based on his lack of rehabilitation, when the District Court took evidence before it into account in determining to impose the death sentence and examined aggravating and mitigating circumstances in a thorough and detailed manner, the fact that the sentence was imposed on the same day as the sentencing hearing did not constitute the influence of passion, prejudice, or any other arbitrary factor. St. v. Sattler, 1998 MT 57, 288 M 79, 956 P2d 54, 55 St. Rep. 230 (1998).

Postconviction Relief — On New Ground After Automatic Review — Not Barred: Petitioner was convicted of deliberate homicide, aggravated kidnapping, and robbery and was sentenced to death. His sentence was automatically reviewed by the Supreme Court. Petitioner then filed for postconviction relief under Title 46, ch. 21, part 1, and the State moved to dismiss the issues raised as res judicata. The court held that res judicata cannot be invoked by the State so as to deprive a litigant of the right to file a petition for postconviction relief, if the petitioner has a new basis or ground for coming before the court. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981). See also Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999).

Right to Postconviction Relief Petition After Automatic Review: A defendant sentenced to death is entitled to an automatic sentence review under 46-18-307, et seq. This automatic review does not stand in the place of postconviction relief, and after the automatic review, a defendant may petition for postconviction relief under Title 46, ch. 21. Coleman v. St., 194 M 428, 633 P2d 624, 38 St. Rep. 1352 (1981).

Expeditious Review of Death Sentence: When the death penalty has been imposed in a case, the Legislature has directed the Supreme Court, because of the nature of the penalty involved, to undertake expeditiously the functions of reviewing the record to determine if any errors have been committed resulting in imposition of an illegal sentence and to determine if the sentence is appropriate under the circumstances. St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000, 36 St. Rep. 1134 (1979).

46-18-308. Time for review — consolidation with appeal.Compiler's Comments

Montana Rules For Automatic Review of a Death Sentence: These rules were adopted by Montana Supreme Court order dated September 13, 1984, effective October 1, 1984. The order and rules appear at 41 St. Rep. 1960. They are reprinted below. An incorrect Rule 8 reference to "174 Mont." has been changed to "147 Mont."

"Rule 1. Purpose and scope of rules. (1) These rules govern procedures for the conduct of the automatic review of death sentences and associated appeals by the Montana Supreme Court under sections 46-18-310, MCA.

(2) Unless otherwise provided in these rules violation of these procedural rules will not entitle a party to relief absent a showing that the violation has caused significant prejudice to the party's right to a fair hearing.

(3) If no procedure is specifically prescribed by these rules, the Court shall proceed in conformance with the applicable statute or rule governing appellate practice in criminal cases.

Rule 2. Initiation of automatic review. (1) When a district court imposes a sentence of death, the county attorney shall within five days file in the district court a notice of automatic review. The notice shall state that the Supreme Court will conduct an automatic review of the death sentence in accordance with sections 46-18-307 through 46-18-310, MCA, and these rules, and that a defendant wishing to present issues other than those specified in section 46-18-310, MCA, must file a notice of appeal under Rule 5 of these rules.

(2) The filing of a notice of automatic review serves the same purpose and has the same effect as the filing of a notice of appeal under section 46-20-201, MCA, and [former] Rule 4, M.R.App.Civ.P. (now M.R.App.P., now superseded).

(3) The county attorney shall serve copies of the notice of automatic review on both the defendant and his counsel, if any, and also upon the attorney general. The county attorney shall file an additional copy with the clerk of the Supreme Court.

(4) In cases where co-defendants were tried jointly in the district court and both received death sentences, the automatic review of the death sentences shall proceed separately before the Supreme Court. The county attorney shall file and serve separate notices of automatic review for each co-defendant in compliance with subsection (3) of this rule.

Rule 3. Docketing. The clerk of the Supreme Court shall docket the automatic review without fee and shall assign a docket number to the automatic review upon filing of the notice of automatic review by the county attorney under Rule 2. If a notice of appeal is filed, the clerk shall assign a separate docket number to the appeal, but shall note on the docket that the appeal and automatic review are consolidated for purposes of proceedings in the Supreme Court.

Rule 4. Record for automatic review. (1) The record for automatic review must include both the district court clerk's record and the transcript of proceedings from the district court.

(2) On the day the notice of automatic review is filed, the county attorney shall order a transcript of all recorded proceedings in the district court. The county shall pay the cost of the transcript.

(3) The clerk of the district court shall forward the entire record to the clerk of the Supreme Court within ten days after receipt of the transcript.

Rule 5. Appeals. (1) A defendant who wishes to seek review of issues of law pertaining to his trial or sentence other than those specified in section 46-18-310, MCA, shall file a notice of appeal within twenty days after imposition of sentence.

(2) If no notice of appeal is timely filed, the Supreme Court will consider no issues other than those presented on automatic review pursuant to section 46-18-310, MCA.

(3) Upon a showing of good and sufficient reason for the failure to file within twenty days, the Supreme Court may grant a motion to allow a defendant to file a notice of appeal out of time. No such motion will be considered by the Court if filed more than sixty days after the date of imposition of sentence.

Rule 6. Briefs. (1) Automatic review without appeal. If no notice of appeal has been filed, the defendant may file an opening brief within twenty days of the filing of the record on automatic review with the clerk of the Supreme Court which shall address the issues set forth in section 46-18-310, MCA. The state shall file a brief expressing its views on the issues set forth in section 46-18-310, MCA, within twenty days of service of the defendant's brief, if any, or within forty days of the filing of the record on appeal if the defendant chooses to file no brief. The defendant may file a reply brief, which shall be limited to the rebuttal of the state's argument, within ten days of service of the state's brief.

(2) Automatic review combined with appeal. If the defendant files a timely notice of appeal, he shall file his opening brief within thirty days after the filing of the record with the clerk of the Supreme Court. The defendant's opening brief shall address the issues specified in section 46-18-310, MCA, and all other issues arising from the trial and sentencing for which review is sought. The state shall file a responding brief within thirty days after service of the defendant's opening brief. The defendant may file a reply brief within fourteen days after service of the state's brief.

(3) Untimely notice of appeal. If the Supreme Court grants a defendant's motion for leave to file a notice of appeal out of time, the order granting the motion shall provide a briefing schedule for the parties.

Rule 7. Action by the Court. (1) The Court shall hear oral argument en banc in any case governed by these rules on the next calendar commencing more than thirty days after the filing of the state's brief.

(2) If no notice of appeal has been filed, the Court may review only the issues specified by section 46-18-310, MCA. If the defendant has filed a notice of appeal, the Court shall also consider all issues presented by the defendant in his brief, subject to the rules of law governing the preservation in the district court of questions for review on appeal.

Rule 8. Service. Defendants in automatic review cases shall comply with Supreme Court Rule II, 147 Mont. at xxiv.

Rule 9. Stays. The trial court shall enter a stay of execution of a death sentence upon the filing of a notice of automatic review. The stay expires upon issuance of remittitur on the Supreme Court's order affirming, vacating, or modifying the sentence. If the stay expires upon affirmance of a death sentence after the date set for execution of sentence has passed or within five days prior to the execution date, the execution date will be vacated, and the Supreme Court will remand the case to the district court for the setting of a new execution date in compliance with section 46-19-103, MCA.

Rule 10. Suspension of Rules. In the interest of expediting proceedings for automatic review, or for other good cause, the Supreme Court may suspend the operation of these rules and order proceedings in accordance with its direction.

Rule 11. Title and effective date. (1) These rules may be cited as "Montana Rules for Automatic Review of a Death Sentence."

(2) These rules take effect on October 1, 1984, and they govern the automatic review of death sentence imposed after their effective date."

2003 Amendment: Chapter 154 in (1)(b) near beginning after "supports the" inserted "trier of fact's finding of the existence or nonexistence of the aggravating circumstances enumerated in 46-18-303 and the sentencing", after "nonexistence of the" deleted "aggravating or", and after "enumerated in" deleted "46-18-303 and"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 302 in (1)(c), in two places, substituted "other cases" for "similar cases" and inserted "in which a sentencing hearing was held pursuant to 46-18-301, whether the sentence imposed was death or a sentence other than death"; and inserted (2) requiring the sentencing court's factfindings to be upheld unless they are clearly erroneous and prohibiting the Supreme Court from substituting its judgment for that of the sentencing court with respect to witness credibility, drawing evidentiary inferences, and resolving conflicts in evidence. Amendment effective April 17, 1997.

Case Notes

Capacity of Defendant to Withdraw Appeals — Rees Standard: Dawson was convicted of a capital crime and sentenced to death, and after years of appeals, Dawson decided to fire his attorneys, discontinue all appeals, and proceed with imposition of the death penalty. Dawson filed a pro se motion in state and federal courts to dismiss all pending appeals, and the Supreme Court considered whether to grant the motion. To decide whether a person under a death sentence has the mental competence to waive the right to further judicial review, the court applied the federal standard in Rees v. Payton, 384 US 312 (1966). The standard is whether the defendant has the capacity to appreciate the defendant's position and make a rational choice with respect to continuing or abandoning further litigation or whether the defendant is suffering from a mental disease, disorder, or defect that may substantially affect the defendant's capacity in the premises. After examining the record, the Supreme Court determined that Dawson did not suffer from a mental disease, disorder, or defect, that he had the capacity to appreciate his position, that he had made a rational choice to abandon further litigation, and that his motion to dismiss the appeal was voluntarily made. Once Dawson's competency was determined and the voluntariness of his action was established, Dawson was protected by his right to privacy from further medical examination and evaluation and from testimony from his doctor, and was entitled to the individual autonomy to make his private decision. Absent any showing that Dawson was denied any right while incarcerated or evidence of prison conditions that would cause him to abandon his desire to live, the Supreme Court dismissed Dawson's appeal and remanded to the District Court for execution of the original death sentence. St. v. Dawson, 2006 MT 69, 331 M 444, 133 P3d 236 (2006). See also Rumbaugh v. Procunier, 753 F2d 395 (5th Cir. 1985), and Dennis v. Budge, 378 F3d 880 (9th Cir. 2004).

Right of Defendant to Waive Counsel: Dawson was convicted of a capital crime and sentenced to death, and after years of appeals, Dawson decided to fire his attorneys, discontinue all appeals, and proceed with imposition of the death penalty. Dawson filed a pro se motion in state and federal courts to dismiss all pending appeals, and the Supreme Court considered whether to grant the motion. A defendant has a constitutionally guaranteed right to the assistance of counsel, but that right does not prohibit a defendant from rejecting the assistance of counsel. A defendant may be granted a request for self-representation if the waiver of the right to counsel is unequivocal, voluntary, knowing, and intelligent. The court examined the record and determined that Dawson's request to waive counsel met the criteria. Dawson was allowed to discharge his counsel, and an attorney was appointed to act as standby counsel. St. v. Dawson, 2006 MT 69, 331 M 444, 133 P3d 236 (2006).

Newly Discovered Evidence — Accomplice's Affidavit as to Ambiguity of Petitioner's Grunt — Insufficient for Postconviction Relief: In a postconviction relief proceeding, petitioner claimed that newly discovered evidence in the form of an accomplice's affidavit warranted a new trial. The Supreme Court held that the ambiguous interpretation of petitioner's grunt in response to whether he agreed that the victim should be killed was not probative of innocence and was only relevant to the imposition of the death penalty. Therefore, the evidence was rendered moot when petitioner's death penalty sentence was vacated on appeal. Kills on Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

Criteria Necessary to Establish Brady Violation: The suppression by the prosecution of material evidence favorable to the accused violates the due process rights of the accused, pursuant to Brady v. Md., 373 US 83, 10 L Ed 2d 215, 83 S Ct 1194 (1963), including failing to disclose an agreement with a prosecution witness in exchange for testimony if the agreement provides tangible benefits. When there is no agreement, there is no duty to disclose. To establish a Brady violation, the petitioner must establish that: (1) the state possessed evidence, including impeachment evidence, favorable to the defense; (2) the petitioner did not possess the evidence and could not have obtained it with reasonable diligence; (3) the prosecution suppressed the favorable evidence; and (4) had the evidence been disclosed, a reasonable probability exists that the outcome of the proceedings would have been different. Here, Gollehon asserted that pretrial and posttrial agreements by the state with a prosecution witness prejudiced Gollehon's due process rights because if the jury had known of the agreements, the credibility of the witness would have been in doubt. However, aside from a guarantee of the witness's safety, which was disclosed to the jury at trial, Gollehon could not establish a Brady violation through the existence of an undisclosed pretrial agreement. Further, in order for posttrial assistance to be relevant, there must have been an agreement for parole before trial in order to support a Brady violation. In the absence of evidence of a pretrial agreement, there can be no Brady violation because no evidence was suppressed from the jury. Gollehon's claim for relief was denied. Gollehon v. St., 1999 MT 210, 296 M 6, 986 P2d 395, 56 St. Rep. 811 (1999), followed in St. v. Johnson, 2005 MT 318, 329 M 497, 125 P3d 1096 (2005). See also Giglio v. U.S., 405 US 150, 766 L Ed 2d 104, 92 S Ct 763 (1972), Alderson v. Zant, 22 F3d 1541 (11th Cir. 1994), and Mills v. Singletary, 63 F3d 999 (11th Cir. 1995).

Death Row Not Considered Cruel and Unusual Punishment — Delay Attributed to Defendant's Appeals: Citing Lackey v. Tex., 514 US 1045, 131 L Ed 2d 304, 115 S Ct 1421 (1995), Gollehon claimed that his right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment was violated by the amount of time that he spent on death row and by the number of sentencing hearings in his capital murder case. The Supreme Court declined to apply Lackey because the majority of the delay in Gollehon's case was caused by his own pursuit of constitutional and statutory rights in state and federal courts and was not caused by the state. Gollehon's claim for relief was denied. Gollehon v. St., 1999 MT 210, 296 M 6, 986 P2d 395, 56 St. Rep. 811 (1999). See also St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996).

Deliberate Homicide by Accountability Proportional to Other Capital Crimes — Death Sentence Affirmed: The senseless, calculated, brutal, and deliberate homicide of a prison inmate by two other inmates wielding baseball bats, when compared to other cases decided in Montana, the 9th Circuit, and the U.S. Supreme Court, led the Montana Supreme Court to conclude that the death penalty was appropriate. When considering proportionality, the court examined the gravity of the offenses, the brutality with which they were committed, and the existence of any factors meriting leniency, with the purpose of making certain that there was no discriminatory action on the part of the sentencing judge. Because imposition of the death sentence was not random or arbitrary, the constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment was not violated. St. v. Johnson, 1998 MT 289, 291 M 501, 969 P2d 925, 55 St. Rep. 1186 (1998); St. v. Turner, 262 M 39, 864 P2d 235, 50 St. Rep. 1267 (1993); St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 1, 864 P2d 249, 50 St. Rep. 1250 (1993).

Proper Finding of Nonexistence of Mitigating Factors in Prison Homicide — Death Penalty Affirmed: Johnson did not dispute the District Court's finding that two aggravating circumstances existed, but contended that the court's conclusion, that there were no mitigating circumstances sufficiently substantial to call for leniency, was in error. The trial court is not required to make findings on each piece of purportedly mitigating evidence produced; it is only required to consider all aggravating and mitigating evidence presented. Johnson's version of the circumstances surrounding the murder, which if believed may have indicated that some degree of leniency was appropriate, was not credible. Having considered Johnson's proposed mitigating circumstances and rejected them, the District Court's decision was affirmed. St. v. Johnson, 1998 MT 289, 291 M 501, 969 P2d 925, 55 St. Rep. 1186 (1998).

Proportionality of Death Penalties in Prison Homicide: Sattler was sentenced to death after killing another inmate while incarcerated. Consistent with its role in reviewing whether the sentence was disproportionate to the penalty in similar cases, the Supreme Court reviewed the only two similar existing cases, St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 1, 864 P2d 249 (1993), and St. v. Turner, 262 M 39, 864 P2d 235 (1993). Despite a variance in the number of aggravating circumstances between the cases, given that the brutality and gravity of the homicides in each case were substantially similar, coupled with defendant's lack of acceptance of responsibility by continually asserting that the homicide was justified because he was defending himself, Sattler's death penalty was not disproportionate or excessive to the penalty imposed in the similar cases. St. v. Sattler, 1998 MT 57, 288 M 79, 956 P2d 54, 55 St. Rep. 230 (1998).

Accomplice to Felony Murder — Review for Compliance With Proportionality and Individualized Treatment Standards: Vernon Kills On Top contended upon review of his death penalty for felony murder that the sentence violated both the constitutional requirement for individualized punishment and the proportionality requirement. In analyzing the imposition of a death sentence, the Supreme Court will apply both federal and state constitutional standards derived from the eighth amendment to the U.S. Constitution and Art. II, sec. 22, Mont. Const. Although these constitutional provisions contain no explicit prohibition against disproportionate sentences and no express mandate for individualized punishment, the cruel and unusual punishment clauses ban sentences that are grossly disproportionate to the crime for which the defendant was convicted. As set out in Enmund v. Fla., 458 US 782 (1981), the death penalty is unique in its severity and irrevocability, so the state is required to focus on the defendant's personal intent, character, and culpability, not merely on the defendant's role as an accomplice. Because Vernon was not present when the killing occurred, did not inflict the death-causing injuries, and actually sought to avoid the killing, the sentence of death imposed on Vernon was disproportionate and thus was vacated. This reasoning does not preclude imposition of a death sentence upon an accomplice to felony murder; however, each case will be reviewed on the basis of its unique facts to ensure that the death sentence is not disproportionate to the degree of the defendant's culpability. Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182, 53 St. Rep. 1197 (1996), reversing St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273 (1990), and distinguishing Tison v. Ariz., 481 US 137 (1987).

Findings Relied Upon for Death Sentence Unsupported by Evidence — Felony Murder: Upon review of a death sentence, several statements from a previous opinion on Vernon Kills On Top's culpability for a homicide in which he did not directly participate were found to be unsupported by the record. The standard of review used by the Supreme Court pursuant to this section in such cases is broader than the clearly erroneous standard and includes whether the findings are supported by the evidence (see 1997 amendment). Applying that standard, the court found, on independent constitutional grounds, that because Vernon was not present when the killing occurred, did not inflict the death-causing injuries, and actually sought to avoid the killing, the sentence of death imposed on Vernon should be vacated. Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182, 53 St. Rep. 1197 (1996).

Consideration of "Catchall" of Mitigating Circumstances: The trial court reviewed in detail the first seven elements comprising mitigating circumstances under 46-18-304 and found no evidence of any of the elements. Gollehon presented evidence of childhood abuse under the catchall element of 46-18-304(8), and the court properly considered the evidence without passion or prejudice and with consideration of whether the sentence was proportional to the crime, as required by this section. It was not error for the court to then conclude that the evidence was insufficient to preclude the death penalty. St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 1, 864 P2d 249, 50 St. Rep. 1250 (1993).

Constitutionality of Death Sentence: Imposition of the death sentence is constitutional under the review criteria of this section. St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990).

Federal Court Decision Regarding Statute Similar to Montana's Not Binding on Montana Courts: The defendant challenged the constitutionality of Montana's death penalty on the basis of a federal court decision that held that a similar statute of another state was unconstitutional. The Supreme Court held that the decision was not binding on Montana and also noted that the federal decision had been appealed to the federal Supreme Court. St. v. Kills On Top, 241 M 378, 787 P2d 336, 47 St. Rep. 366 (1990).

Factors Properly Considered and Sentence Affirmed:

District Court imposition of the death sentence was affirmed after finding: (1) defendant's race was not a factor in the verdict or sentencing; (2) there was no error in consideration of statements made by the victim's father (distinguishing Booth v. Md., 482 US 496, 96 L Ed 2d 440, 107 S Ct 2529 (1987)); (3) the sentence was not imposed under passion, prejudice, or any arbitrary factor; (4) the sentencing court properly considered aggravating and mitigating circumstances; (5) under the standard set out in Tison v. Ariz., 481 US 137, 95 L Ed 2d 127, 107 S Ct 1676 (1987), and in Enmund v. Fla., 458 US 782, 73 L Ed 2d 1140, 102 S Ct. 3368 (1982), the death sentence did not constitute excessive or cruel and unusual punishment and was warranted for defendant who was a major participant in the deliberate homicide and who exhibited a reckless indifference for human life; and (6) considering the gravity of the offenses, the brutality with which they were carried out, and the existence of any factors meriting leniency, the death sentence was not disproportionate or excessive to others imposed in similar cases. St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990).

The death penalty was affirmed after review showed: (1) there was no influence of passion, prejudice, or any other arbitrary factor in sentencing; (2) the trial court properly considered aggravating and mitigating circumstances; and (3) the sentence was not excessive or disproportionate to the penalty imposed in similar cases, considering both the crime and the defendant. St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352, 45 St. Rep. 1542 (1988).

Abduction Resulting in Death of Victim — Capital Punishment Not Disproportionate: The death penalty was not disproportionate or excessive in a case where defendant abducted a young boy at gunpoint, later replacing the boy with another hostage who was eventually killed. The circumstances were comparable to the four capital punishment cases previously considered in Montana, and although the circumstances were not identical, the crime was properly classified as both heinous and perverse and of sufficient magnitude to qualify for capital punishment. St. v. Keith, 231 M 214, 754 P2d 474, 45 St. Rep. 556 (1988).

Defendant's Right to Limit Appeal: Defendant clearly expressed his intent to pursue only those appellate issues which must be reviewed as a matter of law. The Supreme Court affirmed his right to do so after finding that defendant was adjudged competent to make such a choice, holding that his decision must be respected if it is made competently, voluntarily, intelligently, and with full knowledge of the consequences. St. v. Keith, 231 M 214, 754 P2d 474, 45 St. Rep. 556 (1988).

Capital Sentence Requested by Defendant — No Basis for Resentencing: Defendant pleaded guilty to two counts of aggravated kidnapping and two counts of deliberate homicide. Defendant requested the death penalty. After sentencing, defendant had second thoughts and on appeal sought a resentencing. The Supreme Court held there was no basis for resentencing because: (1) sentencing was not tainted by reliance on prior Canadian convictions obtained without counsel; (2) inclusion of juvenile offenses as adult offenses in presentence report was not error; (3) a court-ordered presentence interview was not violative of the fifth amendment; (4) recommendation for the death penalty in the presentence report was not improper; (5) no judicial error was committed in the extent of review of mitigating factors and no unconstitutional limit was placed on the court's consideration of mitigating circumstances; (6) no error was found in the court's denial of defendant's motion for additional psychiatric evaluation; (7) defendant was not required to be present at proceedings occurring after the verdict; (8) jury participation is not constitutionally required in capital sentencing procedures; (9) no indication was found that the trial court imposed the death penalty out of passion or prejudice; and (10) the sentence was not excessive or disproportionate. St. v. Smith, 217 M 461, 705 P2d 1087, 42 St. Rep. 463 (1985) (Smith I). A habeas corpus petition was conditionally granted in Smith v. McCormick, 917 F2d 1153 (9th Cir. 1990), a subsequent resentencing of death was reversed and remanded for preparation of a new presentence investigation, St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000 (1993) (Smith II), and following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

Cases to Be Set Forth in Final Opinion: Defendant pleaded guilty to two counts of deliberate homicide and two counts of aggravated kidnapping. The District Court imposed the death sentence, and notice of appeal was filed. Prior to submission of briefs and prior to review, defendant petitioned the Supreme Court, asking what cases it would consider in its decision on his appeal. The Supreme Court held that this section requires only that the cases considered in deciding whether the death penalty is disproportionate be set forth in the final opinion. Beyond this statutory mandate, the court refused to create an affirmative duty to predisclose the cases that would be considered on appeal. St. v. Smith, 211 M 379, 41 St. Rep. 1434 (1984).

Knowledge of Sentencing Judge: Coleman petitioned for a Writ of Habeas Corpus as an original proceeding, asking the Supreme Court to vacate his death sentence and remand his cause for resentencing as to the aggravated kidnapping conviction by a District Court Judge other than the judge who had twice sentenced him to death. Coleman contends that during a plea bargaining session, at which the judge was present, his original counsel stated that he believed Coleman was guilty of deliberate homicide and sexual intercourse without consent, based on a sodium amytal examination Coleman underwent. At the same time, counsel stated he thought the State would have difficulty proving Coleman committed aggravated kidnapping. The Supreme Court found this was not equivalent to an admission of the aggravated kidnapping. The court said that guilt was determined by the jury. The death sentence was based on the finding of guilt on the aggravated kidnapping charge. There was no indication counsel's remarks influenced the judge. Coleman v. Risley, 203 M 237, 663 P2d 1154, 40 St. Rep. 418 (1983), followed in St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000, 50 St. Rep. 1388 (1993) (Smith II). Following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

Death Penalty — Facially Neutral — Discrimination to Be Shown: Petitioner challenged Montana's death penalty statutes as arbitrary and discriminatory. Montana has instituted sentencing procedures that focus on the character of the defendant and the circumstances of the crime. In doing this, arbitrariness is conclusively removed from sentencing. As regards discrimination, the disproportionate impact of a facially neutral law will not make the law unconstitutional unless discriminatory intent or purpose is found. Montana's law is facially neutral, and no allegation of discriminatory intent was raised. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981).

Review Requirements — Consideration of Hearing Transcript and Other Sentences: Petitioner contended that he was denied meaningful appellate sentence review in that the court did not consider the transcript of the sentencing hearing or a compilation, which he submitted, of sentences imposed for crimes committed throughout the state. The transcript was before the court and considered. The court compared petitioner's sentence with those of other capital defendants, and that is all that was required. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981).

Evidence of "Lying in Wait" and That "The Offense Was Aggravated Kidnapping Which Resulted in the Death of the Victim": The evidence in the record clearly proved that sufficient aggravating circumstances existed to warrant imposition of the death penalty in that the crime of deliberate homicide had been "committed by a person lying in wait or ambush" and the crime of aggravated kidnapping "resulted in the death of the victim". St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980).

Sentence Not Excessive or Disproportionate — Aggravated Kidnapping: A sentence of death for aggravated kidnapping which resulted in the death of the victim when the defendant abducted the victim while making a night deposit and shot him twice in the head after driving him outside of town was not excessive or disproportionate to the penalty imposed in similar cases. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980).

Sentence Not Excessive or Disproportionate — Deliberate Homicide: A sentence of death for deliberate homicide when the defendant abducted the victim and shot him twice in the head was not excessive or disproportionate to the penalty imposed in similar cases, especially in light of the existence of aggravating circumstances under 46-18-303. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980).

Significant History of Prior Criminal Activity: The District Court's finding that no mitigating circumstances existed in favor of the defendant was upheld when the defendant had a long history of prior criminal activity and no other facts existed in mitigation of the penalty. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980).

Arbitrary Factors Not Found: The defendant argued that the sentence imposed was a result of passion, prejudice, or other arbitrary factors. He argued that the sentence given to his accomplice in this crime, when compared to his own, reflects the prejudice inherent in the sentencing. However, the defendant was also found guilty of aggravated kidnapping, a charge finally dropped against his accomplice. It was for this crime that the death penalty was imposed. The defendant, a black man, also argued that his race was a factor operating to his prejudice with respect to the imposition of the death penalty. The defendant speculated as to various possible factors evidencing such prejudice, but speculation was not sufficient to establish this claim. The court examined the sentence and determined it was not imposed as a result of passion, prejudice, or other arbitrary factors or because of race. St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000, 36 St. Rep. 1134 (1979).

Similar Cases — Vacated Sentences Considered: The Supreme Court, in fulfilling its duty to compare “similar cases” to assure that sentencing is not excessive or disproportionate to those other sentences, may include for comparison similar cases in which the sentence has been imposed by the District Court, even though the sentence has been vacated on appeal. St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000, 36 St. Rep. 1134 (1979).

Part 4

Factors That Reduce Sentence

Part Case Notes

Modification of Original Sentence as Dangerous Offender Not Allowed: At the time of Moorman’s original sentencing in 1982, 46-18-404 (now repealed) did not allow a District Court in a revocation proceeding to add new terms or conditions to a defendant’s original sentence. The court could not impose a dangerous offender designation upon revocation of a suspended sentence when the original sentence was silent on the issue or designated the defendant as nondangerous. However, Moorman was designated a dangerous offender when originally sentenced. Under the version of 46-18-203 in effect at the time of sentencing, the court could revoke the suspension or impose sentence and order Moorman committed but could not modify the sentence. Therefore, Moorman’s original dangerous offender designation remained a part of his sentence upon the subsequent revocation of his suspended sentence. St. v. Moorman, 279 M 330, 928 P2d 145, 53 St. Rep. 1173 (1996).

46-18-401. Consecutive sentences.

Commission Comments

Source: Model Sentencing Act, sections 19, 21 and 22, General Laws of Massachusetts Chapter 279, Section 27.

The merger is not mandatory, but is in the discretion of the judge, although the language suggests that in most instances the merger should occur. The result of this approach is a unified sentence rather than a multiplicity of sentences.

Subsection [(4)] is included in an attempt to avoid consecutive sentences where only a single criminal episode was involved.

Compiler’s Comments

1995 Amendment: Chapter 372 deleted (5) that read: “(5) Except as provided in this subsection, whenever a prisoner is sentenced for an offense committed while he was imprisoned in the state prison or while he was released on parole or under the supervised release program, the new sentence runs consecutively with the remainder of the original sentence. The prisoner starts serving the new sentence when the original sentence has expired or when he is released on parole under chapter 23, part 2, of this title in regard to the original sentence, whichever is sooner. In the latter case, the sentences run concurrently from the time of his release on parole”; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 12, 1995.

1989 Amendment: In (1)(a), after “remaining term”, substituted “may not” for “shall” and after “other term” deleted “except as provided in subsection (5)”; in (1)(b) substituted “may not” for “shall”; in (2), near beginning, substituted “whether or not it merges” for “merging” and near end substituted “any sentence that is merged” for “the sentences being merged”; in (4) substituted “must run consecutively” for “shall run concurrently”; and made minor change in punctuation.

1981 Amendment: Substituted “supervised release program” for “prisoner furlough program” in the middle of (5).

Case Notes

Oral Pronouncement of Sentence Inconsistent With Written Sentence — Remand Necessary for Correction of Written Judgment: At a sentencing hearing, the District Court orally pronounced that the defendant's sentences would run concurrently. The written judgment that followed was silent on the matter, which under 46-18-401 resulted in a presumption of consecutive sentences. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed in part, holding that this amounted to an increased sentence imposed in violation of the defendant's right to be present, and remanded the case with instructions to amend the written judgment to be consistent with the initial oral pronouncement. St. v. Hamilton, 2018 MT 253, 393 Mont. 102, 428 P.3d 849.

Credit Properly Given for Time Served While Incarcerated Prior to Revocation: In 2001, Damon was sentenced on a felony conviction to the Department of Corrections (DOC) for 10 years with 5 years suspended with conditions and on a misdemeanor conviction to the county detention center for 6 months, with the sentences to run concurrently. Damon began serving the suspended portion of the sentence on June 8, 2005, and several weeks later, he was arrested and charged under a separate cause number with several offenses. Damon pleaded guilty to one count of felony obstruction of justice and received a 10-year suspended sentence with credit for the time served in the detention center following the arrest. In November 2005, Damon was arrested for violating probation conditions in the original case, and the state petitioned to revoke the 5-year suspended sentence in the original case. The District Court revoked the 5-year suspended sentence based on the probation violations and sentenced Damon to 5 years with the DOC with credit for 98 days served in the detention center following arrest for the probation violations, but the court refused to credit Damon for street time served during the probation period following June 8, 2005, or for the time served following the second arrest. Damon challenged the time credited, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Had the District Court credited the 5-year revoked sentence with the time following the second arrest, Damon would have received double credit for those days. Nothing in 46-18-203(7)(b) entitles a defendant to additional credit against a revoked sentence for time served relating solely to a separate offense for which the defendant received a consecutive sentence credited with the same period of time served. Thus, the District Court did not err in crediting Damon's sentence with only a portion of the time served while incarcerated prior to the sentence revocation. St. v. Damon, 2007 MT 276, 339 M 413, 170 P3d 490 (2007), distinguishing St. v. Tracy, 2005 MT 128, 327 M 220, 113 P3d 297 (2005).

Illegal Sentence Challenged During Revocation Proceeding — Court Limited to Lawful Elements of Original Sentence: Seals was convicted of three felony and two misdemeanor drug possessions and was committed to the Department of Corrections for 15 years, with 10 years suspended, to run concurrently. At the time of his arrest, the law in effect limited Seals' imprisonment to 5 years for each count. Upon recognition that the 15-year sentences were outside the parameters of the sentencing statute, the District Court amended Seals' sentence for one count to impose a legal sentence of 5 years, but again imposed sentences of 10 years each, all suspended, to run concurrently with each other and consecutive to the first count. After Seals served the 5 years for count one and was discharged to his suspended sentences, the state moved for revocation for probation violations and recommended that the court revoke Seals' suspended sentences and commit him to prison for 10 years, 5 suspended, for each count. Seals objected, arguing that the commitment and the consecutive nature of the sentences constituted an illegal increase of his original commitment to the Department of Corrections and was beyond the court's statutory sentencing authority. The state argued that this section gave the court discretion to run the sentences imposed upon revocation consecutively or concurrently. In response, the District Court revised the sentences from 10 years to 5 years but retained the consecutive nature of the sentences. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, ruling that 46-18-203 and not this section governed sentencing upon revocation. Under 46-18-203, the District Court could have required that Seals serve either the originally imposed sentence or a lesser sentence. However, because the originally imposed sentence was illegal, the court ruled that ordering Seals to serve sentences consecutively rather than concurrently resulted in sentences that did not qualify as lesser sentences. St. v. Seals, 2007 MT 71, 336 M 416, 156 P3d 15 (2007). See also St. v. Adams, 2013 MT 189, 371 Mont. 28, 305 P.3d 808.

Public Policy for Consecutive Sentencing Unless Otherwise Ordered by Court: Auld was on parole for a felony violation in Hawaii when he was convicted of criminal endangerment and witness tampering in Montana. The Montana court sentenced Auld to 6 months imprisonment for criminal endangerment and 10 years imprisonment for witness tampering, to run concurrently with each other but consecutively with any sentence imposed by the State of Hawaii. Auld appealed on grounds that the language of subsection (1) of this section does not allow a consecutive sentence to be imposed when the previous conviction originates from a court in another state. The Supreme Court disagreed that subsection (1) contains the decisive language relevant to this issue and instead cited subsection (4) of this section as a clear indication that Montana public policy is to have sentences, wherever imposed, run consecutively unless otherwise ordered by a court. St. v. Auld, 2006 MT 189, 333 M 125, 142 P3d 753 (2006).

Rejection of Credit for Elapsed Time Served While on Probation: While serving a suspended sentence for a crime in Montana, Miller was convicted of a crime in Indiana and served a 2-year sentence there. Upon release on parole in Indiana, Miller returned to Montana and subsequently violated the terms of the Montana suspension. The suspension was revoked, and Miller was ordered to serve the remainder of the sentence at the state prison. Miller argued that he was entitled to credit for the time served in Indiana against the Montana commitment, but the District Court declined to allow credit for the Indiana time served, and Miller appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Montana law does not provide that a defendant is to receive credit on a suspended commitment in Montana for time spent in prison in another state on a separate conviction. The District Court did not order that the Montana and Indiana convictions be merged, so the Montana commitment continued to run while Miller was in prison in Indiana. It was only when Miller violated the terms of the suspended sentence after returning to Montana that the suspension was revoked, and upon revocation, the District Court had the discretion to allow or reject part or all of the time that had elapsed as a credit against the commitment. St. v. Miller, 2006 MT 159, 332 M 472, 139 P3d 839 (2006).

Credit Allowed for Time Served Concurrently With Other Sentences: Tracy's original sentence in Cascade County was for 10 years suspended with the Department of Corrections, to run concurrently with two other sentences that Tracy received in Yellowstone County. When Tracy violated his release conditions, the District Court in Cascade County revoked the original 10-year sentence but declined to give Tracy credit for the time served in detention pursuant to the Yellowstone County sentences. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that, when read together, 46-18-203 and this section require that Tracy be given credit for time spent in a detention center or on home arrest on all the sentences that were being served concurrently. The case was remanded to calculate and grant appropriate credit. St. v. Tracy, 2005 MT 128, 327 M 220, 113 P3d 297 (2005).

Presumption of Punishment for Going to Trial Based on Difference Between Pretrial Offer and Actual Sentence — Remand: As set out in St. v. Baldwin, 192 M 521, 629 P2d 222 (1981), when a District Court becomes involved in plea negotiations and an offer is made, any difference in the sentencing after trial must point out the factors justifying an increased sentence, and failure to enumerate the factors leads to the presumption that a greater sentence has been imposed for a vindictive purpose. Here, when the District Court failed to justify having an 11-year sentence run consecutively rather than concurrently with another sentence, the Baldwin standard requiring an explanation for imposing a harsher sentence than that offered in plea negotiations was not met, constituting reversible error. The case was remanded for resentencing. St. v. Hall, 2003 MT 253, 317 M 356, 77 P3d 239 (2003).

Maximum Allowable Sentence Imposed for Each Conviction to Run Consecutively — Sentence Lawful: On rehearing, petitioner was sentenced to 40 years for robbery, life imprisonment for aggravated kidnapping, and life imprisonment for deliberate homicide, with the sentences to run consecutively. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the sentences fall within the applicable statutory parameters and that the court lawfully sentenced the petitioner. To the extent that the complaints relate to the equity of the sentence, those complaints are properly addressed to the Sentence Review Division of the court. Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

Multiple Negligent Homicides Arising Out of Same Act — Consecutive Sentences Allowed: Defendant was sentenced to two consecutive 10-year sentences for the deaths of two men in a drunken driving accident. Defendant appealed on double jeopardy grounds, claiming that the convictions arose out of a single act and that the District Court could only impose concurrent sentences. The Supreme Court held that because two people were killed in the accident, two distinct offenses of negligent homicide were committed. Montana law not only authorizes consecutive sentences for multiple offenses but presumptively requires them. St. v. Weigle, 285 M 341, 947 P2d 1053, 54 St. Rep. 1182 (1997).

Lack of Knowledge of Consecutive Sentence Not Proved — No Basis for Withdrawal of Guilty Plea: Allen pleaded guilty to one count of homicide during a prison riot. After being sentenced to a 25-year consecutive term, he moved to withdraw his plea on the basis that he did not know that the law required a consecutive term in his case. The Supreme Court held that the evidence indicated that he was aware of consequences of his plea. The Supreme Court advises District Courts to avoid this issue in the future by specifically referring to the consecutive sentence requirement in this section when interrogating a defendant with respect to entering a guilty plea. St. v. Allen, 265 M 293, 876 P2d 639, 51 St. Rep. 519 (1994).

Operation of Statute Clarified by Previous Supreme Court Opinion: McGuire was convicted on felony theft and burglary counts in Gallatin County and was sentenced in Gallatin County after being sentenced on other charges in Flathead County. The Gallatin County sentence contained no reference to the Flathead County sentence and did not expressly provide that it would run concurrently with the Flathead County sentence. The Supreme Court held that the Gallatin County District Court did not err in sentencing McGuire because any ambiguity in whether the two sentences were to run concurrently was clarified by the holding of the Supreme Court in St. v. McGuire, 260 M 386, 860 P2d 148, 50 St. Rep. 1122 (1993). In that case, the Supreme Court held that the Flathead County District Court had exceeded its authority by providing that McGuire's sentence was to run consecutively to one not yet imposed. The Supreme Court modified the sentence and judgment in that case by striking the portion providing for consecutive sentences. Therefore, when read together with the opinion in McGuire I, the effect of the Gallatin County District Court order in this case is that the sentence will run consecutively with the sentence imposed by the Flathead County District Court. St. v. McGuire, 260 M 389, 860 P2d 150, 50 St. Rep. 1132 (1993).

Order to Serve Probation After Sentence Discharged Unwarranted: Petitioner was sentenced to serve 15 years, with 10 years suspended, for selling drugs in Sheridan County. While on parole for the Sheridan County conviction, petitioner pleaded guilty to selling drugs in Gallatin County and received two concurrent 12-year sentences. When discharged from prison on the Gallatin County charges, petitioner was placed on 10 years probation for the 10-year suspended sentence in Sheridan County. The Supreme Court ordered that the petitioner be discharged from probation on the Sheridan County sentence, holding that the plain meaning of subsections (1)(b) and (5) of this section require that the "original" Sheridan County sentence be served before the "new" Gallatin County sentence begins to run. Since the Gallatin County sentence has been discharged and the suspended portion of the Sheridan County sentence was merged in the Gallatin County sentence, the state has no authority to require petitioner to serve the suspended portion of the Sheridan County sentence consecutively with the end of the Gallatin County sentence. Robbins v. McCormick, 258 M 429, 853 P2d 1205, 50 St. Rep. 599 (1993).

Parolee's Shooting of Plaintiff Not Foreseeable: The Department of Institutions miscalculated the prisoner's parole eligibility date and paroled him before he was eligible to be released. The plaintiff was shot by the parolee and sued the Department for negligence. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's ruling that the Department was not liable because it could not have reasonably foreseen that the parolee would shoot someone. Kiger v. St., 245 M 457, 802 P2d 1248, 47 St. Rep. 2206 (1990).

Former Statute — Suspended Sentence Merged With New Sentence: The defendant, while serving two suspended sentences, was convicted of a new offense. At the close of the trial for the new offense, the judge sentenced the defendant without mentioning the prior sentences. In a subsequent hearing, the judge stated that the sentences were to run consecutively. The Supreme Court held that under the former version of the statute, the sentences merged unless the court specified otherwise and that the lower court had to make that determination at the close of the trial, not at the subsequent hearing. St. v. Thiel, 242 M 77, 788 P2d 337, 47 St. Rep. 565 (1990).

Merger of Sentences Imposed by Different Courts: Defendant was sentenced once by the Eleventh District Court and twice by the Fourth District Court for felony convictions and, upon incarceration, was informed that sentences from all three causes would run consecutively. Absent any court order to the contrary, the sentences were merged in accordance with this section to run concurrently. In re Petition of Arledge, 232 M 450, 756 P2d 1169, 45 St. Rep. 1188 (1988).

Instruction on Flight Proper When Based on Evidence: A jury instruction allowing consideration of testimony showing flight or concealment by the defendant as a circumstance tending to prove consciousness of guilt was proper in light of defendant's admission that he left the scene of the crime. St. v. Hurlbert, 232 M 115, 756 P2d 1110, 45 St. Rep. 923 (1988), citing St. v. Walker, 148 M 216, 419 P2d 300 (1966). Walker was followed in St. v. Patton, 280 M 278, 930 P2d 635, 53 St. Rep. 1402 (1996). Patton was followed in St. v. Johnson, 1998 MT 289, 291 M 501, 969 P2d 925, 55 St. Rep. 1186 (1998), in which it was held that even in the limited environment of prison, a defendant may fly to wherever the defendant thinks is safe to dispose of evidence, but that only some departure from a crime scene is necessary to support giving an instruction on flight. Patton was also followed in St. v. Maier, 1999 MT 51, 293 M 403, 977 P2d 298, 56 St. Rep. 208

(1999). See also St. v. Hall, 1999 MT 297, 297 M 111, 991 P2d 929, 56 St. Rep. 1190 (1999), in which the Supreme Court reconsidered the probative value of the flight instruction and directed that the better policy in future cases when evidence of flight has been properly admitted is to reserve comment on the significance of flight to counsel, rather than to the court through jury instructions. However, in Hall's case, no prejudice attached because the instruction included the qualification that evidence of flight was not, by itself, sufficient evidence of guilt, but rather only one circumstance to be considered by the jury. Hall was followed in St. v. Hatten, 1999 MT 298, 297 M 127, 991 P2d 939, 56 St. Rep. 1198 (1999).

Imposition of Consecutive Terms Within Court's Discretion: Defendant claimed that imposition of consecutive sentences in connection with a single episode of criminal behavior violated the intent of this section; however, on its face this statute clearly vests the District Court with discretion to impose consecutive terms regardless of whether the criminal acts arose out of a single occurrence of misconduct. St. v. Miller, 231 M 497, 757 P2d 1275, 45 St. Rep. 790 (1988).

Modification of Sentence Not Authorized: This section limits the discretion of the sentencing judge to merger of sentence. In the absence of merger, there is no statutory authorization for modification of sentence. St. v. George, 224 M 495, 730 P2d 412, 43 St. Rep. 2363 (1986).

Good Time Earned While Serving One Sentence Not Applicable to Later Sentence: In 1970, petitioner was convicted of burglary and sentenced to 10 years in the Montana State Prison. He was released on parole in 1971. In 1976, he was returned to the Montana State Prison after being convicted on another burglary charge. Subsequently his parole was revoked. During the time petitioner was on parole, good time could be earned under 53-30-105 (now repealed) by a parolee. Under a 1981 amendment to that section, this is no longer possible. In 1982, petitioner filed a petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus, claiming that the good time he earned while on parole should be applied to reduce the discharge date of his second sentence, as the second sentence had been merged (under 46-23-217, prior to amendment) with the first sentence. The Supreme Court ruled that the sentences ran concurrently but were not merged and that therefore any good time petitioner earned while on parole on his first sentence may be applied only to the first sentence. Bagley v. Risley, 207 M 121, 672 P2d 1126, 40 St. Rep. 1937 (1983). See also St. v. Pendergrass, 281 M 129, 932 P2d 1056, 54 St. Rep. 94 (1997), holding that an escape sentence did not merge with other sentences. Pendergrass was reversed in Chandler v. Mahoney, 2000 MT 294, 302 M 309, 18 P3d 312, 57 St. Rep. 1247 (2000).

Concurrent Sentence Unless Specified: Under the former version of this section, if the District Court did not specify whether a sentence was to run concurrently or consecutively, it ran concurrently with any prior commitment. Petition of Parrett, 154 M 257, 459 P2d 268 (1969).

Sequence of Consecutive Sentences: When the petitioner was sentenced to serve consecutive sentences for escape and using an automobile without the consent of the owner and the warden executed the sentences in a sequence reverse to that indicated by the court, there was no infringement on his rights and his petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus was denied. Petition of Cheadle, 143 M 327, 389 P2d 579 (1964).

Concurrent Felony and Misdemeanor Sentences: When the defendant is convicted of a felony under the first portion of a consolidated information and of a misdemeanor under the second portion, and the trial court decrees that the sentences can be served concurrently, the sentence for the felony should be served in the state prison, credit for the misdemeanor fine should be given at the same time, and any remaining time under the misdemeanor at the end of the state prison term should be served in the county jail. St. v. Bogue, 142 M 459, 384 P2d 749 (1963).

Attorney General's Opinions

Consecutive Suspended or Deferred Sentences — Probationary Period: When a sentencing court imposes a suspended or deferred sentence on more than one count and orders the periods of suspension or deferral to run consecutively, for purposes of probation revocation, the probationary period for the first count is considered to run before the period on the second and successive counts. 42 A.G. Op. 116 (1988).

Petition to Revoke Suspension or Deferral — May Apply to More Than One Sentence: Conditions of release are a part of the judgment in a case, and there is no prohibition against revoking the uncompleted sentences in a single proceeding where the terms of the judgment have been violated. Thus, if suspended or deferred sentences are to be served consecutively and time remains on more than one period of suspension or deferral, then more than one suspension or deferral may be revoked in the same proceeding. 42 A.G. Op. 116 (1988).

Consecutive Sentences: A prisoner sentenced pursuant to 46-18-401(5) must serve that term consecutively with the remainder of his original term. If the prisoner has not been designated a nondangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404), he is ineligible for parole until he has served at least one-half of his new sentence in addition to any minimum time he must serve with respect to his original sentence. 38 A.G. Op. 13 (1979).

Inconsistent Statutes: When two statutes are wholly inconsistent, incompatible, and incapable of being reconciled, the later statute impliedly repeals the earlier one if it does not expressly do so. 38 A.G. Op. 13 (1979).

Prisoner Receives New Sentence: If a prisoner who has received a new consecutive sentence under 46-18-401(5) is paroled, the remaining time of his new and original sentences thereafter run concurrently. 38 A.G. Op. 13 (1979).

Section 46-23-217 Impliedly Repealed: Section 46-23-217 was impliedly repealed by the enactment of 46-18-401(5). A sentence imposed regarding a crime committed after July 1, 1977, by a prisoner at the state prison or on parole or supervised release runs consecutively with the remainder of the prisoner's original sentence. Any crime committed on or before July 1, 1977, by a prisoner while on parole or conditional release runs concurrently with the prisoner's original sentence unless otherwise specified by the sentencing court. 38 A.G. Op. 13 (1979).

In a recent Montana decision, State ex rel.[.] Nelson v. Ellsworth, 141 Mont. 78, 375 P.2d 316 (1962) in interpreting R.C.M. 1947 Section 94-4717, a statute dealing with the time when a sentence commences, the Montana Supreme Court held it could give no credit for the time served on a prior reversed conviction because the sentence must commence when the person is delivered to the penitentiary and could not have begun prior to that time. The court suggested that any possible injustice was a legislative problem. The intent of this section is to rectify this injustice. In absence of a statute, such as the above section, the position the Montana Court has taken will preclude it from giving credit.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 372 in version effective January 31, 1997, deleted second sentence that read: "In calculating the time imprisoned, the person so convicted shall have the credit for all the time earned in diminution of sentence as provided under 53-30-105, unless the sentencing authority, in its discretion, may choose to deny such credit"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective January 31, 1997.

Case Notes

Credit for Time Served — Due Process Violated by State's Delay in Extraditing Defendant: On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed the District Court's decision to deny credit for the defendant's time served while incarcerated in another state. The Supreme Court reasoned that due process requires the state to execute an arrest warrant without unreasonable delay and that nothing in the record explained why the state waited 17 months after the arrest warrant was issued to extradite the defendant. St. v. Graves, 2015 MT 262, 381 Mont. 37, 355 P.3d 769.

Rejection of Credit for Elapsed Time Served While on Probation: While serving a suspended sentence for a crime in Montana, Miller was convicted of a crime in Indiana and served a 2-year sentence there. Upon release on parole in Indiana, Miller returned to Montana and subsequently violated the terms of the Montana suspension. The suspension was revoked, and Miller was ordered to serve the remainder of the sentence at the state prison. Miller argued that he was entitled to credit for the time served in Indiana against the Montana commitment, but the District Court declined to allow credit for the Indiana time served, and Miller appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Montana law does not provide that a defendant is to receive credit on a suspended commitment in Montana for time spent in prison in another state on a separate conviction. The District Court did not order that the Montana and Indiana convictions be merged, so the Montana commitment continued to run while Miller was in prison in Indiana. It was only when Miller violated the terms of the suspended sentence after returning to Montana that the suspension was revoked, and upon revocation, the District Court had the discretion to allow or reject part or all of the time that had elapsed as a credit against the commitment. St. v. Miller, 2006 MT 159, 332 M 472, 139 P3d 839 (2006).

Probationer Not Entitled to Good Time Credit for Time Served on Original Sentence: Williams' suspended sentence for felony assault was revoked after Williams violated the terms of the suspension. Williams requested that he be credited for good time that he served on the suspended sentence. The District Court concluded that Williams was a probationer, not a parolee, and declined to grant good time credit. Williams appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Williams' original sentence did not provide that Williams be treated as a parolee, so as a probationer, Williams was not entitled to credit for good time under McDermott v. Dept. of Corrections, 2001 MT 134, 305 M 462, 29 P3d 992 (2001). St. v. Williams, 2003 MT 136, 316 M 140, 69 P3d 222 (2003).

No Credit Allowed for Time Served While on Probation: Gundrum was placed on probation but was later arrested on a probation violation. Gundrum contended that he should receive credit for the time that he was on probation under this section, even though he was not incarcerated. The Supreme Court disagreed. This section applies to credit for time served while incarcerated and thus does not apply to Gundrum. Further, under 46-18-203 and McDermott v. Dept. of Corrections, 2001 MT 134, 305 M 462, 29 P3d 992 (2001), a judge has complete discretion to consider elapsed time that an offender is on probation and may expressly allow or reject the time as credit on the offender's sentence. Here, the District Court considered the nature of Gundrum's violations and the magnitude of his financial obligations before denying credit for time served on probation. Gundrum did not assert that the District Court failed to follow the mandates of 46-18-203, and the Supreme Court affirmed the denial of credit for time that Gundrum served on probation. Gundrum v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 246, 307 M 96, 36 P3d 890 (2001).

Effect on Eligibility for Parole: Section 46-18-402 allows the sentencing authority to deny credit for good time earned while serving a prior modified or invalid sentence but does not authorize the sentencing authority to provide that credit for time previously served should not be considered in determining eligibility for parole. St. v. Zachmeier, 153 M 64, 453 P2d 783 (1969).

Applicability: When habeas corpus was granted to a petitioner who had served a considerable portion of his sentence and whose commitment was set aside and the petitioner was permitted to withdraw his guilty plea, the court held that 46-18-402 should be observed upon any subsequent imposition of a new sentence. Morsette v. Ellsworth, 151 M 319, 443 P2d 28 (1968).

Case Notes

Defendant's Deferred Sentence Expired Prior to State's Filing of Revocation Petition — Sentence for Revocation Illegal — Remanded to District Court to Dismiss. St. v. Ellsworth, 2023 MT 8, 411 Mont. 213, 523 P.3d 527.

Entitlement to Credit for Incarceration When Charged in Multiple Counties: A man charged with crimes in multiple counties argued that his sentence on one charge should have included credit for time served prior to sentencing. The District Court noted that "someone was also holding him" during that time and entered a sentence that did not credit the man for each relevant day he was incarcerated. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that the Legislature's enactment of 46-18-201(9) eliminated sentencing courts' need to determine whether a defendant is incarcerated on a "bailable offense". The Supreme Court stated that its holding in Killam v. Salmonsens, 2021 MT 196, 405 Mont. 143, 492 P.3d 512, was controlling, and that the man is entitled to credit pursuant to 46-18-201(9) for each day he was incarcerated from the date he was served with an arrest warrant for the offense he was convicted of to the date of sentencing, regardless of whether he was also being held in connection with another matter in a different county. St. v. Mendoza, 2021 MT 197, 405 Mont. 154, 492 P.3d 509. See also St. v. Spagnolo, 2022 MT 228, 410 Mont. 457, 520 P.3d 330.

Mandate to Give Credit for Time Served Before Sentencing: A man on parole was arrested for felony criminal endangerment. Upon conviction for the new crime, the man did not receive credit for his pretrial incarceration. He filed a writ of habeas corpus. The state argued he was not held on a bailable offense because he would have been in the custody of the Department of Corrections related to his prior conviction. On appeal, the Supreme Court remanded the case to the District Court, explaining that 46-18-201(9) mandates sentencing courts to give credit for time served by the offender before sentencing, and therefore credit must be given. Killam v. Salmonsens, 2021 MT 196, 405 Mont. 143, 492 P.3d 512. See also St. v. Pitkanen, 2022 MT 231, 410 Mont. 503, 520 P.3d 305.

Credit When Defendant Held on Multiple Offenses: A District Court in one county had to consider how to credit time served when a defendant was held in another county on two separate warrants for bailable offenses. The District Court did not grant credit for time served in the other county, reasoning that the time served in the other county was directly related to an offense in that county. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. The Supreme Court explained that a defendant may be entitled to receive credit for a single period of presentence incarceration on separate bailable offenses and that the sentencing court must determine for what charge the defendant was being detained and if the charge is bailable. In this instance, the defendant was being held on two charges for bailable offenses. St. v. Parks, 2019 MT 252, 397 Mont. 408, 450 P.3d 889.

Jail Time Served Incorrectly Credited — Remand Appropriate: A defendant in Municipal Court was credited with 2 days of credit for time served, which the District Court affirmed. During appeal to the Supreme Court, the city conceded that the defendant was entitled to 4 days of credit for jail time served. The Supreme Court remanded with instructions to credit the defendant's sentence with 2 additional days. Kalispell v. Salsgiver, 2019 MT 126, 396 Mont. 57, 443 P.3d 504.

Proper Denial of Credit for Time Served at Residential Treatment Center Prior to Sentencing: Prior to being sentenced, the defendant spent a year in a treatment facility. During sentencing, she requested that the District Court credit her under 46-18-403 for each day she spent at the facility, arguing that she should receive credit because the District Court had ordered her to complete the 12-month program at the facility. The state, however, argued that the time at the treatment facility was not incarceration and therefore she could not receive credit for her time there. The District Court denied the request for credit. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that although other states have passed laws allowing defendants to receive credit for time spent at a treatment facility, Montana has not and therefore the District Court did not have the authority to grant credit for the defendant's time at the treatment facility. St. v. Byrd, 2015 MT 20, 378 Mont. 94, 342 P.3d 9.

Credit for Pretrial Incarceration Time Served Applied to Fully Suspended Sentence: The District Court erroneously applied pretrial incarceration time the defendant served to any future revocation of the defendant's suspended sentence, rather than to his current fully suspended sentence. The Supreme Court concluded that since a suspended sentence constitutes a "judgment of imprisonment" under 46-18-403, the District Court was required to credit the defendant's fully suspended sentence immediately, rather than in the future if the defendant's suspended sentence was revoked. St. v. McCaslin, 2011 MT 221, 362 Mont. 47, 260 P.3d 403.

District Court Not Required to Impose Mandatory Requirement When Statute Is Now Discretionary: The District Court did not err in failing to give credit for pretrial detention time against a fine when, before the defendant's arrest, the statute had been amended to read that the credit "may" be allowed as opposed to "must" be allowed. St. v. Hafner, 2010 MT 233, 358 Mont. 137, 243 P.3d 435.

No Credit for Time Served for Prior Offenses Prior to Sentencing for New Offenses: In 2006, Pavey was sentenced to 5 years for an offense in Jefferson County. In 2007, Pavey was sentenced to 5 years for an offense in Silver Bow County and was later granted conditional release, but Pavey then absconded from supervision. Pavey was taken back into custody in April 2008 and placed in prison. In May 2008, the state charged Pavey with failing to register as a violent offender, drug possession, and felony common scheme for issuing a bad check, all committed while on conditional release. By plea agreement Pavey pleaded guilty, and following conviction, Pavey sought credit for time served during pendency of the charges. Credit was denied and Pavey appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Pavey's continued incarceration was due, at least in part if not entirely, to the prior convictions, and Pavey would have remained incarcerated based on the prior convictions regardless of the filing of the new charges or Pavey's ability to post bail on the new charges. Therefore, the District Court did not err in denying Pavey's request that sentences on the 2008 charges be credited with time served on the 2006 and 2007 charges. St. v. Pavey, 2010 MT 104, 356 Mont. 248, 231 P.3d 1104. See also St. v. Kime, 2002 MT 38, 308 Mont. 341, 43 P.3d 290.

Defendant Entitled to Credit for Jail Time: When incarceration was directly related to the offense for which the defendant is being sentenced, credit for time served must be given. St. v. Milligan, 2008 MT 375, 346 M 491, 197 P.3d 956 (2008).

Credit Properly Given for Time Served While Incarcerated Prior to Revocation: In 2001, Damon was sentenced on a felony conviction to the Department of Corrections (DOC) for 10 years with 5 years suspended with conditions and on a misdemeanor conviction to the county detention center for 6 months, with the sentences to run concurrently. Damon began serving the suspended portion of the sentence on June 8, 2005, and several weeks later, he was arrested and charged under a separate cause number with several offenses. Damon pleaded guilty to one count of felony obstruction of justice and received a 10-year suspended sentence with credit for the time served in the detention center following the arrest. In November 2005, Damon was arrested for violating probation conditions in the original case, and the state petitioned to revoke the 5-year suspended sentence in the original case. The District Court revoked the 5-year suspended sentence based on the probation violations and sentenced Damon to 5 years with the DOC with credit for 98 days served in the detention center following arrest for the probation violations, but the court refused to credit Damon for street time served during the probation period following June 8, 2005, or for the time served following the second arrest. Damon challenged the time credited, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Had the District Court credited the 5-year revoked sentence with the time following the second arrest, Damon would have received double credit for those days. Nothing in 46-18-203(7)(b) entitles a defendant to additional credit against a revoked sentence for time served relating solely to a separate offense for which the defendant received a consecutive sentence credited with the same period of time served. Thus, the District Court did not err in crediting Damon's sentence with only a portion of the time served while incarcerated prior to the sentence revocation. St. v. Damon, 2007 MT 276, 339 M 413, 170 P.3d 490 (2007), distinguishing St. v. Tracy, 2005 MT 128, 327 M 220, 113 P.3d 297 (2005), and followed in St. v. McDowell, 2011 MT 75, 360 Mont. 83, 253 P.3d 812.

Suspension of Sentence Following Probation Violation Not Violative of Double Jeopardy — Credit for Time Served Properly Allowed: DeWitt was convicted of two counts of aggravated burglary, found to be a persistent felony offender, and sentenced to three consecutive 10-year sentences. DeWitt appealed, and the Supreme Court remanded with instructions to dismiss one count. While awaiting resentencing, DeWitt was incarcerated for 1,275 days. The District Court then resentenced DeWitt to one 10-year sentence for aggravated burglary and a consecutive 10-year sentence as a persistent felony offender, suspended all but 1,275 days of the 20-year sentence, and gave DeWitt credit for 1,275 days served. Without prison time to serve, DeWitt was immediately released on probation. DeWitt subsequently violated probation, the suspended sentence was revoked, and DeWitt was sentenced to 10 years with 5 years suspended, with credit for 160 days served while awaiting revocation proceedings. DeWitt appealed on grounds that the sentencing court failed to allow credit for the 1,275 days served when the suspended sentence was revoked and the new 10-year sentence was imposed and asserted that his double jeopardy rights were violated by reinstatement of the original sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed with both arguments. When the sentencing court sentenced DeWitt following the probation violation, the court had a 16.5-year suspended sentence to work with, which was more than sufficient to account for the 10-year sentence with 5 years suspended that was imposed. Although a sentencing court must give credit for time served, revocation of a suspended sentence based on a probation violation and reinstatement of the original sentence does not constitute double jeopardy as long as the sentence is within the parameters of the sentence imposed in the initial suspended sentence and credit is allowed for time served. Further, a persistent felony offender designation is not a separate crime carrying a separate sentence, but rather is a statutorily required sentence enhancement that is part of the initial sentence, so the sentencing court could not have "dropped" the persistent felony offender count and sentenced DeWitt only under the aggravated burglary count, thereby limiting the available time on resentencing to 6.5 years. The sentence was not violative of double jeopardy, was within statutory parameters, and was affirmed. St. v. DeWitt, 2006 MT 302, 334 M 474, 149 P.3d 549 (2006).

Criminal Fines Distinct From Other Court-Imposed Compensatory Financial Obligations — Fisher Overruled: The plain meaning of "fine" in this section does not encompass fees, costs, charges, or other court-imposed financial obligations. Criminal fines are punitive in nature and are distinct from other court-imposed financial obligations associated with a criminal proceeding that are compensatory in nature, such as an assessment of fees for probationary supervision or a charge to defray a local government's costs in administering the criminal justice system. Voerding v. St., 2006 MT 125, 332 M 262, 136 P3d 502 (2006), overruling St. v. Fisher, 2003 MT 33, 314 M 222, 65 P3d 223 (2003), to the extent that Fisher suggests that the term "fine" in subsection (2) of this section encompasses other types of court-imposed financial obligations, such as fees, charges, and costs. See also St. v. VanWinkle, 2008 MT 208, 344 M 175, 186 P3d 1258 (2008).

Failure to Give Defendant Credit for Pretrial Incarceration Time Served — Remand: In the sentencing court's oral sentence, Hoots was assessed fines on three separate counts, but in the written judgment, the sums were not set out as to each count, nor was Hoots given monetary credit against the fines for pretrial time served in incarceration. The Supreme Court remanded for resentencing to conform the written judgment to the oral sentence and to give Hoots credit for pretrial time served. St. v. Hoots, 2005 MT 346, 330 M 144, 127 P3d 369 (2005).

Remand to Determine Credit for Prejudgment Time Served — Failure to Object Not Fatal to Appeal: The District Court gave Erickson credit for time served on charges for two separate crimes. Erickson did not object to the credit at sentencing, but instead contested the credit on appeal. Following St. v. Eaton, 2004 MT 283, 323 M 287, 99 P3d 661 (2004), the Supreme Court applied the exception to the rule that failure to timely object to a sentence risks waiver of a sentencing issue on appeal because giving Erickson less credit than he was entitled to would violate statutory mandates. A defendant's sentence may be credited with incarceration time only if the incarceration was directly related to the offense for which the sentence was imposed. The record on appeal was unclear regarding whether Erickson's bond was revoked on one of the charges and whether Erickson received proper presentence credit, so the case was remanded to determine whether Erickson was given proper credit for time served for each offense. St. v. Erickson, 2005 MT 276, 329 M 192, 124 P3d 119 (2005), following St. v. Kime, 2002 MT 38, 308 M 341, 43 P3d 290 (2002), and followed in St. v. Henderson, 2008 MT 230, 344 M 371, 188 P3d 1011 (2008). Henderson was followed in St. v. Allison, 2008 MT 305, 346 M 6, 192 P3d 1135 (2008). On remand, the District Court determined that Erickson's bond was not formally revoked on the first charge and properly credited Erickson with 267 days served on the first charge and for 457 days served from arrest to the sentencing hearing on the second charge. St. v. Erickson, 2008 MT 50, 341 M 426, 177 P3d 1043 (2008). See also St. v. Evans, 2012 MT 115, 365 Mont. 163, 280 P.3d 871.

Failure to Credit Defendant Against Fine for Time Incarcerated Prior to Conviction — Fine Vacated: Following Wiedrich's conviction for DUI, the District Court assessed a $1,000 fine but failed to give Wiedrich credit for the time that he was incarcerated prior to conviction. Because the credit far exceeded the amount of the fine, the Supreme Court vacated the fine. St. v. Wiedrich, 2005 MT 127, 327 M 214, 112 P3d 1054 (2005), distinguished in St. v. Hafner, 2010 MT 233, 358 Mont. 137, 243 P.3d 435.

No Credit for Time Served on Informal House Arrest: The District Court conditioned Gulbranson's release on bond with informal house arrest. Gulbranson contended that the house arrest restricted his liberty in a manner sufficiently similar to incarceration, as provided in this section, to require that he be given credit for time served. However, Gulbranson did not cite any legal authority to support the contention, and the Supreme Court declined to consider the unsupported argument. Instead, the Supreme Court held that the informal house arrest in this case was not house arrest as provided for in Title 46, ch. 18, part 10, so 46-18-203 did not require that Gulbranson's sentences be credited with time served for that period. Gulbranson failed to show that the District Court was statutorily required to credit him for time served while released on bond, so it was within the District Court's discretion whether to allow credit. Absent an abuse of discretion, the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Gulbranson, 2003 MT 139, 316 M 163, 69 P3d 1187 (2003), followed in St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 112, 342 M 461, 182 P3d 62 (2008), and St. v. Makarchuk, 2009 MT 82, 349 M 507, 204 P3d 1213 (2009).

No Discretion in Giving Defendant Credit for Time Served and Fine Paid: Fisher was sentenced to 13 months plus 5 years of probation and fined $1,000 and $570 in costs for felony DUI. Fisher moved to amend, requesting $47 a day credit for 31 days of pretrial commitment, with the remaining 6 days applied to the sentence. The motion was denied, and Fisher appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. A sentencing court has no discretion in applying this section. The court must employ both subsections and give a defendant credit for each day of incarceration against both the sentence and any fine imposed. (In 2005, an amendment made the credit against a fine discretionary.) Once a valid sentence is pronounced, the court has no discretion to modify the sentence except to correct factual errors. Rather, an illegal sentence must be addressed in the manner provided by law for appeal and postconviction relief. St. v. Fisher, 2003 MT 33, 314 M 222, 65 P3d 223 (2003), following Billings v. Layzell, 242 M 145, 789 P2d 221 (1990), followed in St. v. Mingus, 2004 MT 24, 319 M 349, 84 P3d 658 (2004), and overruled in Voerding v. St., 2006 MT 125, 332 M 262, 136 P3d 502 (2006), to the extent that Fisher suggests that the term “fine” in subsection (2) of this section encompasses other types of court-imposed financial obligations, such as fees, charges, and costs.

Multiple Sentences Imposed Consecutively — Defendant Entitled to Credit for Presentence Incarceration Only Once Against Aggregate of All Terms Imposed: Price was convicted of fourth offense DUI and four misdemeanors in connection with a motor vehicle accident. The District Court sentenced Price to jail time for three charges. For the misdemeanors, Price was sentenced to 2 days in jail for driving with a revoked license and to 10 days for failure to provide proof of insurance. For the DUI conviction, Price was sentenced to 12 months with the Department of Corrections. The sentences were to run consecutively. To account for the time spent in jail awaiting trial, the court credited Price with 18 days served, first applying 12 days’ credit to the misdemeanors and then applying the remaining 6 days’ credit to the DUI sentence. Price appealed on grounds that the court was required to grant full credit for time served on each sentence imposed. The Supreme Court concluded that Price’s interpretation was not warranted by the plain language of this section and would result in a fundamental unfairness in the administration of criminal sentencing among similarly situated defendants and would defeat the Legislature’s purpose for permitting consecutive sentences. This section entitles defendants to credit for presentence incarceration only once against the aggregate of all terms imposed when multiple sentences are imposed consecutively. Price was entitled to receive credit for each day of incarceration, and the District Court properly awarded Price credit for each day served. St. v. Price, 2002 MT 150, 310 M 320, 50 P3d 530 (2002). See also St. v. Boettcher, 423 NW 2d 533 (Wis. 1988).

Concurrent Incarceration for Separate Offense — Defendant’s Sentence Credited With Time Served in Incarceration Only if Incarceration Directly Related to Offense for Which Sentence Imposed: When arrested for felony theft, DUI, and driving with a suspended license, Kime was already in supervised release for a prior felony assault conviction. Bail was set at $25,000, but Kime did not post bail, remaining incarcerated. Shortly thereafter, Kime was removed from the supervised release program and transferred to the state prison to serve the remainder of the felony assault sentence. Kime ultimately pleaded guilty to the felony theft, DUI, and driving with a suspended license charges. At sentencing, Kime asked the District Court to credit his sentence with the time that he was incarcerated between the date of the arrest and the date of sentencing. However, the court credited the sentence only with the 20 days served between Kime’s arrest and transfer to prison. Kime appealed, arguing that because the three new offenses were bailable offenses and the District Court imposed a sentence of imprisonment, the sentence should have been credited with the entire time of incarceration pursuant to this section. The Supreme Court disagreed. The general purpose of this section is to eliminate the disparity of treatment between indigent and nonindigent defendants, and that purpose is not served by crediting a defendant’s sentence for time served when the defendant would not have been released on bail in any event as a result of being held on a sentence related to an earlier offense. Therefore, a defendant’s sentence may be credited with time served in incarceration only if that incarceration was directly related to the offense for which the sentence was imposed. St. v. Kime, 2002 MT 38, 308 M 341, 43 P3d 290 (2002), distinguishing St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001), and followed in St. v. Henderson, 2008 MT 230, 344 M 371, 188 P3d 1011 (2008), and in St. v. Hornstein, 2010 MT 75, 356 Mont. 14, 229 P.3d 1206. Henderson was followed in St. v. Allison, 2008 MT 305, 346 M 6, 192 P3d 1135 (2008).

Failure to Credit Inmate With Time Served Before Sentencing in Written Judgment After Allowing Credit in Oral Pronouncement of Sentence: At the sentencing hearing, Horton inquired as to whether he would get credit for time served between arrest and sentencing. The judge responded that credit would be granted automatically. However, in the written judgment entered 2 days later, the judge denied credit for time served because Horton was being held on a probation violation. Under this section, Horton was entitled to credit for each day of incarceration prior to or after sentencing, and pursuant to St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), the court’s oral pronouncement controlled over the written judgment. Thus, the Supreme Court directed that the provision in the written judgment denying Horton credit for time served be stricken. St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001).

Credit Not Due for Nonbailable Offense for Which Life Without Parole Is Sentence: In view of appellant’s four consecutive life terms, plus 40 years for use of a weapon, without eligibility for parole, credit for time served before trial is immaterial. Because death was a possible punishment for appellant and a person is not entitled to bail when death is a possible punishment and because a person is entitled to credit for time served before trial only on a bailable offense, appellant was not entitled to credit. St. v. Race, 285 M 177, 946 P2d 641, 54 St. Rep. 1099 (1997).

Credit for Pretrial Detention: The defendant was held in jail for 30 days prior to his trial for two traffic violations. The lower court refused to give him credit for the time served toward payment of the fine. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the language of the statute in effect at the time was mandatory in requiring credit for time served. Billings v. Layzell, 242 M 145, 789 P2d 221, 47 St. Rep. 558 (1990).

Prior Incarceration in Other States: This statute has application only to Montana offenses and sentences and has no application to time served in prisons or jails of other states. Petition of Woods, 166 M 537, 535 P2d 173 (1975).

Credit on Deferred Imposition of Sentence: When the defendant was held in the county jail for 31 days in lieu of bail prior to trial and was sentenced to a term of probation, and less than 31 days before the expiration of his 3-year term of probation a petition for revocation of probation was filed and the defendant was sentenced to a long term of imprisonment, the defendant's contention that he was entitled to a credit of 31 days preconviction jail time on the probationary order and that the Montana state court had lost jurisdiction was without merit since probation is not "a judgment of imprisonment" and preconviction jail time credit is of legislative grace and not a constitutional guarantee. Gray v. Warden of Mont. St. Prison, 523 F2d 989 (9th Cir. 1975).

A period of confinement in the county jail was not credited to the period of deferred imposition of sentence since a deferred imposition of sentence is not a judgment of imprisonment. Petition of Gray, 163 M 321, 517 P2d 351 (1973), distinguished in St. v. McCaslin, 2011 MT 221, 362 Mont. 47, 260 P.3d 403.

Revocation of Deferral — Credit for Time Served: Prison time previously served as a condition of deferment of sentence must be credited against the prison term imposed upon revocation of the petitioner's deferred imposition of sentence. State ex rel. Bovee v. District Court, 162 M 98, 508 P2d 1056 (1973).

Retroactive Application: This section did not apply to a prisoner who was sentenced after the effective date of this section for a crime committed prior to such effective date. Petition of Wilson, 154 M 508, 463 P2d 469 (1970).

Part 5

Persistent Felony Offenders

Part Case Notes

Persistent Felony Offender Statute Requires Actual Previous Felony Conviction: When the state seeks to apply a persistent felony offender designation to a defendant, the defendant must have an actual previous felony conviction. If the defendant merely has a pending felony case for which they have not yet been convicted or another felony conviction that came out of the same event or transaction that resulted in the felony they are currently being sentenced for, the persistent felony offender statutes do not apply. All cases to the contrary, namely St. v. Williamson, 218 Mont. 242, 707 P.2d 530 (1985), St. v. Hamm, 250 Mont. 123, 818 P.2d 830 (1991), and St. v. Anderson, 2009 MT 39, 349 Mont. 245, 203 P.3d 764, are overruled. St. v. Wolf, 2020 MT 24, 398 Mont. 403, 457 P.3d 218.

Felony DUI — Designation as Persistent Felony Offender Valid: The defendant was convicted in May 2009 of felony DUI and was charged with another felony DUI in August 2011. Prosecutors subsequently sought a persistent felony offender designation for the defendant, which was imposed by the District Court and upheld by the Supreme Court. According to the Supreme Court, the defendant was lawfully sentenced to 10 years in prison with no time suspended as a persistent felony offender. St. v. Kime, 2013 MT 14, 368 Mont. 261, 295 P.3d 580, distinguishing St. v. Damon, 2005 MT 218, 328 Mont. 276, 119 P.3d 1194.

Alternative Sentence for Drug Offense Not Precluded by Persistent Felony Offender Statutes, but Incarceration Not Error: Brendal pleaded guilty to fraudulently obtaining dangerous drugs and was sentenced to 25 years in prison with 15 years suspended. Based on prior convictions for the same offense, the sentencing court designated Brendal as a persistent felony offender and imposed a mandatory 10-year prison sentence. Brendal appealed the sentence on grounds that the sentencing court should have considered a sentence to a drug treatment program pursuant to the alternative sentencing authority in 45-9-202. However, the Supreme Court affirmed. The persistent felony offender statutes do not preclude a District Court from providing an alternative sentence under 45-9-202 for a person convicted of a drug-related offense, as long as the required criteria for imposing an alternative sentence are satisfied. Therefore, although the District Court could have provided an alternative sentence, it was not error to sentence Brendal to incarceration. St. v. Brendal, 2009 MT 236, 351 M 395, 213 P3d 448 (2009).

Assignment of Persistent Felony Offender Status for Commission of Second Felony Before Conviction of First Felony Consistent With Definition: The language in 46-18-501 (now repealed) clearly defines a persistent felony offender as a person who has previously been convicted of a felony and who is presently being sentenced for a second felony committed on a different occasion than the first. Under this language, the persistent felony offender statute can be used to enhance a sentence when the second felony was committed before conviction of the first felony. St. v. Anderson, 2009 MT 39, 349 M 245, 203 P3d 764 (2009), affirming St. v. Williamson, 218 M 242, 707 P2d 530 (1985), and St. v. Hamm, 250 M 123, 818 P2d 830 (1991), and overruled in St. v. Wolf, 2020 MT 24, 398 Mont. 403, 457 P.3d 218.

Consideration of Sentencing Factors in Sentencing Persistent Felony Offender Not Violative of Right to Trial by Jury: Following conviction for an eighth DUI, Vaughn was sentenced as a persistent felony offender to a 50-year term in the state prison. Relying on the proposition in Blakely v. Wash., 542 US 296 (2004), that factual findings that serve to enhance a sentence beyond the statutory maximum must be determined by a jury beyond a reasonable doubt, Vaughn appealed the felony sentence, asserting that the 50-year sentence imposed under 46-18-502 served to enhance the sentence beyond the maximum 13-month commitment to the Department of Corrections followed by a suspended sentence of up to 5 years authorized for felony DUI in 61-8-731 (now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10) and that therefore the persistent felony offender sentence should have been determined by a jury on the facts. The Supreme Court first noted that the Blakely proposition applies to a fact other than the fact of a prior conviction and that it is the fact of a defendant's prior felony conviction that authorizes an enhanced sentence under 46-18-501 (now repealed) and 46-18-502. Here, Vaughn's enhanced felony DUI sentence was based on the sentencing court's finding that Vaughn had a prior felony DUI conviction. That factual determination may properly be made by the sentencing court rather than by a jury. The prior DUI was a sentencing factor that was an aggravating or mitigating circumstance supporting the imposition of a sentence within the range authorized for a persistent felony offender. Thus, Vaughn's right to a trial by jury was not violated by the sentencing court's findings of fact in support of a sentence as a persistent felony offender. The sentence was affirmed. St. v. Vaughn, 2007 MT 164, 338 M 97, 164 P3d 873 (2007). See also Apprendi v. N.J., 530 US 466 (2000).

Youth Tried, Convicted, and Sentenced Under Transfer Statute Correctly Sentenced as Persistent Felony Offender: In 1999, when Mainwaring was a juvenile, he pleaded guilty to mitigated deliberate homicide and was convicted pursuant to 41-5-206 and sentenced pursuant to 41-5-2503(1)(a). A part of that sentence was later suspended under 41-5-2510. Later, shortly after turning 21, Mainwaring assaulted a child. The state brought assault charges against Mainwaring and then sought to have the court designate Mainwaring as a persistent felony offender (PFO). The District Court approved the designation as a PFO, based on Mainwaring's 1999 felony conviction, and Mainwaring was convicted and sentenced to 20 years in prison. The Supreme Court held that a conviction under 41-5-206(6) was equivalent to any adult felony conviction and that there is nothing in the Montana Youth Court Act or the Criminally Convicted Youth Act that precludes the application of the PFO statutes and designation to an individual previously convicted of a felony when the individual was a youth. Citing St. v. Damon, 2005 MT 218, 328 M 276, 119 P3d 1194 (2005), the Supreme Court held that the District Court therefore had the authority to apply the PFO statutes and designation to Mainwaring. The Supreme Court also overruled Mainwaring's due process objections and affirmed his conviction. St. v. Mainwaring, 2007 MT 14, 335 M 322, 151 P3d 53 (2007).

Constitutionality of Persistent Felony Offender Statutes: Shults contended that the persistent felony offender (PFO) statutes were unconstitutional on their face in violation of double jeopardy, equal protection, and cruel and unusual punishment or as they applied to Shults's case. The Supreme Court disagreed. First, the PFO statutes do not constitute double jeopardy because a sentence as a habitual criminal is not viewed as a new jeopardy (see Gryger v. Burke, 334 US 728 (1948)). Second, Shults was not able to show that the PFO statutes classify two or more similarly situated groups in an unequal manner and thus failed to meet the first threshold of a meritorious equal protection claim. Last, a sentence that is within maximum statutory guidelines and that is not so disproportionate as to shock the conscience or outrage the moral sense of the community is not considered cruel and unusual punishment. Shults's sentence was within statutory parameters, and in light of Shults's 18-year criminal history and repeated failure to conform his behavior to societal norms despite having numerous opportunities to do so, the sentence could not be seen as so disproportionate as to shock the conscience or outrage the moral sense of the community and thus was not considered cruel and unusual punishment. St. v. Shults, 2006 MT 100, 332 M 130, 136 P3d 507 (2006).

Failure to Raise Legality of Sentence on Direct Appeal — Postconviction Consideration Barred: Osborne was convicted of a fourth DUI in 1999, and when charged with felony DUI in 2003, the state sought to have Osborne declared a persistent felony offender. The District Court obliged, and Osborne was declared a persistent felony offender and sentenced to 10 years in prison with 5 years suspended. Osborne did not appeal the sentence directly, but filed a petition for postconviction relief, asserting that the sentence was not legal. The petition was denied, and Osborne appealed. The state argued that the Supreme Court was procedurally barred under 46-21-105 from considering the petition because the legal challenge to the sentence could have been raised on direct appeal. Osborne asserted that because the state did not raise the procedural bar issue in District Court, that argument was waived. Although the Supreme Court as a rule does not consider issues raised for the first time on appeal, this general rule does not preclude consideration of jurisdictional questions raised for the first time on appeal. The procedural bar is jurisdictional, so the court considered the state's argument, concluding that lack of subject matter jurisdiction may not be waived and that 46-21-105 represents a jurisdictional limit on courts' ability to entertain and decide petitions for postconviction relief and effectively prohibits courts from exercising jurisdiction over grounds for relief that could have been raised on direct appeal. Thus, Osborne's failure to challenge the legality of the sentence on direct appeal precluded consideration in a postconviction petition. St. v. Osborne, 2005 MT 264, 329 M 95, 124 P3d 1085 (2005).

Persistent Felony Offender Statute Not Violative of Double Jeopardy Protections: Wardell was convicted of felony sexual contact with a child in South Dakota and later was charged with numerous sexual crimes in Montana, including failure to register as a sex offender. The District Court sentenced Wardell to 5 years on the failure to register count and designated Wardell as a persistent felony offender, ultimately adding an additional 20-year consecutive sentence. Wardell appealed on grounds that the conviction for failure to register and the sentence for persistent felony offender constituted double jeopardy because each relied on the same underlying conviction. The Supreme Court disagreed. A sentence as a habitual criminal is not to be viewed as a new jeopardy. The sentence enhancement was related to the second crime—failure to register—and thus did not constitute double jeopardy. Under 46-18-501 (now repealed), the dual use of the prior South Dakota conviction for designating Wardell as a persistent felon was authorized. Further, it is not a crime to be a persistent felony offender, and being designated a persistent felony offender cannot constitute double jeopardy. St. v. Wardell, 2005 MT 252, 329 M 9, 122 P3d 443 (2005).

Use of Persistent Felony Offender Statute to Increase Sentence Not Considered Cruel and Unusual Punishment: Wardell was originally sentenced as a persistent felony offender to 45 years in prison with 30 years suspended. Wardell filed a petition for postconviction relief, and that sentence was vacated. Upon resentencing, Wardell's sentence was increased to 20 years suspended plus 5 years for failure to register as a sex offender. Wardell argued on appeal that the sentence constituted cruel and unusual punishment because it was excessive when compared to other sentences for failure to register. The Supreme Court noted that Wardell's sentence was within statutory maximum guidelines and was not so disproportionate to the crime as to shock the conscience or outrage the moral sense of the community or of justice. The sentence was affirmed. St. v. Wardell, 2005 MT 252, 329 M 9, 122 P3d 443 (2005), distinguishing St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003).

District Court Jurisdiction to Apply Persistent Felony Offender Designation to Felony DUI: Yorek pleaded guilty to and was sentenced on a felony DUI charge. The District Court determined that it had jurisdiction and imposed a persistent felony offender designation. Yorek sought postconviction relief on grounds that the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to impose a persistent felony offender designation for felony DUI. The District Court denied the petition for postconviction relief, concluding that sentencing for felony DUI is not solely governed by 61-8-731 and 61-8-734 (both sections now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10), that nothing in the persistent felony offender statute excludes felony DUI offenders from its application, and that Yorek waived any jurisdiction claim by pleading guilty. The Supreme Court affirmed. Nothing in 46-18-502 distinguishes between or among the types of felonies to which it applies, or excludes DUI offenders. Rather, if the underlying charge meets the definition of a felony and if the state has provided proper notice of its intent to seek persistent felony offender status under 46-13-108, a District Court has the statutory authority to designate and sentence an offender as a persistent felony offender. Yorek's crime met the definition of a felony, and Yorek fell squarely within the persistent felony offender statute. The state met the notice provisions, and the District Court possessed subject matter jurisdiction to designate Yorek as a persistent felony offender. Because the jurisdiction question was dispositive, the Supreme Court did not reach the question of whether Yorek's guilty plea was a procedural bar against bringing the claim. St. v. Yorek, 2002 MT 74, 309 M 238, 45 P3d 872 (2002), followed in St. v. Pettijohn, 2002 MT 75, 309 M 244, 45 P3d 870 (2002), and St. v. Damon, 2005 MT 218, 328 M 276, 119 P3d 1194 (2005).

Release From Commitment Triggering Commencement of Statutory Persistent Felony Offender Period: Montoya's initial suspended sentence for a 1984 felony burglary conviction was revoked, and he was resentenced to prison for 5 years in 1994, with 2 years of the sentence suspended with conditions. Montoya was then released from commitment in 1996. Under 46-18-501 (now repealed), the 5-year period began to run in 1996, and a subsequent 1998 felony conviction was well within the time limit of the statute, so the sentencing court did not err in designating Montoya a persistent felony offender. St. v. Montoya, 1999 MT 180, 295 M 288, 983 P2d 937, 56 St. Rep. 706 (1999), following St. v. Graves, 241 M 533, 788 P2d 311, 47 St. Rep. 483 (1990), clarifying St. v. Smith, 232 M 156, 755 P2d 569, 45 St. Rep. 955 (1988), and followed in St. v. Bales, 1999 MT 334, 297 M 402, 994 P2d 17, 56 St. Rep. 1334 (1999), and St. v. Charlie, 2010 MT 195, 357 Mont. 355, 239 P.3d 934.

Unconstitutionality of Prior Conviction Not Proved: LaPier's attorney asked LaPier's parole officer, Riley, if anything in Riley's investigative report indicated that in a police court trial, LaPier had waived his right to a jury trial. Riley indicated that nothing in his report showed a waiver. LaPier argued on appeal that he could not be found a persistent felony offender because the police court conviction was constitutionally infirm. The Supreme Court upheld LaPier's conviction, stating that there is a presumption of the regularity of court proceedings and LaPier had offered no direct evidence that he had been denied his right to a jury trial. St. v. LaPier, 1998 MT 174, 289 M 392, 961 P2d 1274, 55 St. Rep. 707 (1998). See also St. v. Perry, 283 M 34, 938 P2d 1325 (1997).

Notice of Intent to Seek Increased Punishment Not Filed With Court Until After Trial — No Error in Persistent Felony Offender Designation: The state timely served defense counsel with notice of its intent to seek increased punishment for McQuiston as a persistent felony offender but did not file the notice with the court until after trial was concluded, 5 months before sentencing. McQuiston contended that timely filing of the notice was a jurisdictional prerequisite and that failure to do so constituted reversible error. However, the state's notice to defense counsel 5 months before trial and to the court 5 months before sentencing did not prejudice McQuiston, and the persistent felony offender designation was not made in error. St. v. McQuiston, 277 M 397, 922 P2d 519, 53 St. Rep. 729 (1996).

Definitional Requirements of Persistent Felony Offender Met — Enhanced Sentence Proper: Sentence enhancement was proper upon a showing that defendant was: (1) previously convicted of mitigated deliberate homicide on February 19, 1980; (2) paroled on that offense on October 9, 1985; and (3) convicted of two counts of burglary, one count of theft, and one count of attempt on March 29, 1989. The definitional requirements of 46-18-501 (now repealed) having been met, an additional 10-year consecutive sentence was proper. St. v. Graves, 241 M 533, 788 P2d 311, 47 St. Rep. 483 (1990), followed in St. v. Montoya, 1999 MT 180, 295 M 288, 983 P2d 937, 56 St. Rep. 706 (1999), and St. v. Charlie, 2010 MT 195, 357 Mont. 355, 239 P.3d 934.

Persistent Felony Offender Statute Not Violative of Double Jeopardy Protection: As set out in St. v. Maldonado, 176 M 322, 578 P2d 296 (1978), the persistent felony offender statute authorizing enhanced sentences for recidivists does not constitute double jeopardy. St. v. Farnsworth, 240 M 328, 783 P2d 1365, 46 St. Rep. 2165 (1989).

Proof of Constitutionality of Prior Conviction Not Required: While a constitutionally infirm conviction cannot be used to support a determination of persistent felony offender (see St. v. Lewis, supra), the state is not required to prove that a prior conviction offered for purposes of the persistent felony offender determination is constitutionally valid. St. v. Farnsworth, 240 M 328, 783 P2d 1365, 46 St. Rep. 2165 (1989). See also St. v. Okland, 283 M 10, 941 P2d 431, 54 St. Rep. 467 (1997), and St. v. Ailport, 1998 MT 315, 292 M 172, 970 P2d 1044, 55 St. Rep. 1292 (1998).

Probation Not "Commitment" — Enhanced Sentence Reversed: The trial court relied on 46-18-501(2)(b) (now repealed) in enhancing defendant's sentence because the present offense occurred less than 5 years after defendant's probation from a prior suspended sentence. The state contended that probation constituted commitment for purposes of designating defendant a persistent felony offender. The Supreme Court disagreed and voided the enhanced sentence, finding that the plain meaning of “commitment” reveals that the period of commitment begins when a defendant is handed over to law enforcement personnel for confinement and ends when the defendant is released from custody. The statutory 5-year period starts when an offender is once again free to victimize society, not at the end of a period of probation. St. v. Smith, 232 M 156, 755 P2d 569, 45 St. Rep. 955 (1988), clarified in St. v. Montoya, 1999 MT 180, 295 M 288, 983 P2d 937, 56 St. Rep. 706 (1999).

Defendant Persistent Felony Offender: Defendant claimed that his prior felony conviction was invalid because the offense was committed on the Flathead Reservation, and that he was convicted in the District Court of the Fourth Judicial District, which lacked jurisdiction. The court observed that this is not the forum for determining whether the court that issued his prior conviction had jurisdiction. Defendant had a prior felony conviction for the offense of armed robbery that qualified him as a persistent felony offender. St. v. Campbell, 219 M 194, 711 P2d 1357, 42 St. Rep. 1948 (1985).

No Collateral Estoppel and Due Process Bars to Sentencing: Defendant argued that collateral estoppel and due process barred his status as both a persistent felony offender and dangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) because the designations served to sentence him twice for the same offense. The court found no merit to the argument. St. v. Campbell, 219 M 194, 711 P2d 1357, 42 St. Rep. 1948 (1985).

Time of Multiple Offenses — No Window of Opportunity: Defendant was charged with two felonies occurring at about the same time and had previously been convicted of a felony 5 years prior to the later charges. Defendant’s attorney erroneously advised him that the state could notice him as a persistent felony offender based on the former conviction. Defendant pleaded guilty to avoid increased punishment as a persistent felony offender and later sought to withdraw the plea on grounds of coercion and ineffective assistance of counsel. The District Court denied the motion, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The courts rejected defendant’s contention that the statute should be construed to ban the use of the statute since the second offense was committed prior to the conviction on the first one. “On a different occasion” does not mean “in a different time frame”. Separate crimes committed at about the same time can be used to increase punishment under this statute. A defendant may not commit any number of felonies between the time he commits his first felony and his conviction therefor and be immune from designation as a persistent felony offender. There is no “window of opportunity” under 46-18-501 (now repealed). St. v. Williamson, 218 M 242, 707 P2d 530, 42 St. Rep. 1551 (1985), followed in St. v. Hamm, 250 M 123, 818 P2d 830, 48 St. Rep. 830 (1991).

Deferred Imposition of Sentence Not Dismissed — “Conviction” for Purposes of Persistent Felony Offender Status: On appeal following conviction for criminal mischief and attempted burglary for which the defendant was sentenced as a persistent felony offender, the defendant argued that a prior conviction and deferred imposition of sentence should not have been considered a “conviction” under the persistent felony offender statutes because he successfully completed probation, even if the record of his prior conviction was not expunged or the sentence dismissed. The Supreme Court held, consistent with the rationale of St. v. Drew, 158 M 214, 490 P2d 230 (1971), that the case should be remanded to District Court to determine whether the prior unrevoked deferred sentence should be dismissed, and directed that if the sentence is dismissed then it should not be considered in determining whether the defendant is a persistent felony offender. St. v. Gladue, 209 M 235, 679 P2d 1256, 41 St. Rep. 669 (1984).

Timing of Sentencing Required to Bring Defendant Within Operation of Statute: Where the defendant was convicted of two counts of negligent homicide following a previous conviction for burglary within 5 years prior to the negligent homicide convictions, the District Court did not err in sentencing the defendant under the persistent felony offender statute. The defendant’s contention that he is not “presently being sentenced for a second felony” until after the court has determined to sentence him to a term of imprisonment for more than 1 year is a hypertechnical construction of the statute intended to avoid the clear intention of the Legislature. The defendant’s case is covered by the legislative mandate [deleted by a 1983 amendment] that the chapter be liberally construed to the end that dangerous offenders be correctively treated in custody for long terms as needed. St. v. Ballard, 202 M 81, 655 P2d 986, 39 St. Rep. 2342 (1982).

Due Process and Equal Protection: Section 46-18-502 does not violate the equal protection and due process guarantees although only a minority of repeat felony offenders are prosecuted under it. St. v. Maldonado, 176 M 322, 578 P2d 296 (1978).

Ex Post Facto Laws: The persistent felony offender statute, as applied to the defendant, did not violate constitutional safeguards dealing with ex post facto laws because the law did not punish him for conduct prior to enactment of 46-18-502 but merely notified the defendant he was subject to increased punishment if he in the future committed an additional felony crime. St. v. Maldonado, 176 M 322, 578 P2d 296 (1978).

Restoration of Rights: Rather than involving any civil or political “right”, increasing the sentence of a persistent felony offender is entirely consistent with the constitutional mandate that “Laws for the punishment of crime shall be founded on the principles of prevention and reformation.” St. v. Maldonado, 176 M 322, 578 P2d 296 (1978).

Void Conviction: Since the prior felony conviction was void because of a denial of due process during arraignment, it was improper to sentence the defendant under the former second offense statute. Lewis v. St., 153 M 460, 457 P2d 765 (1969), followed in St. v. Okland, 283 M 10, 941 P2d 431, 54 St. Rep. 467 (1997). Okland was followed, with a different result, in St. v. Ailport, 1998 MT 315, 292 M 172, 970 P2d 1044, 55 St. Rep. 1292 (1998).

Harmless Admission: When a defendant’s prior conviction of a felony was not charged during the trial but was admitted by the defendant in his testimony, such admission was not prejudicial since the sentence he finally received was less than he would have received under the former second offense statute. Petition of Gallagher, 153 M 440, 456 P2d 306 (1969).

Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 52, L. 1999, provided: “WHEREAS, the Correctional Standards and Oversight Committee was authorized by the Fifty-Fifth Legislature to conduct a study of correctional standards and to act as a correctional oversight committee; and

WHEREAS, the Committee contracted for a review of Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, sentencing statutes; and

WHEREAS, the Committee found that the statutes providing for sentencing and judgment regarding criminal procedures are confusing and rife with cross-references, internal references, and inconsistent terminology that make the statutes difficult to read and understand; and

WHEREAS, the Committee recommended that a bill be drafted to amend Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, to make nonsubstantive changes to clarify and streamline the statutes to eliminate contradictions, confusion, inconsistent terminology, and excessive internal references.

THEREFORE, the Legislature of the State of Montana finds it appropriate to so amend certain sentencing-related statutes.”

1995 Amendment: Chapter 482 in version effective July 1, 1997, in (1), near beginning, and in (2), near end, inserted reference to exception in 46-18-219; and made minor changes in style.

(3) If House Bill No. 357 is not passed and approved, then this section is void.” House Bill No. 357 was approved March 31, 1995, as Ch. 306, L. 1995. Therefore, the amendments to 46-18-502, enacted as sec. 16 of Senate Bill No. 66, are effective July 1, 1997.

1981 Amendments: Chapter 198, L. 1981, inserted language allowing the court to fine the offender a maximum of $50,000 in lieu of imprisonment or to punish the offender by both a fine and imprisonment.

Chapter 327 inserted “Except as provided in subsection (2)” at the beginning of (1); inserted (2) relating to an offender who was a persistent felony offender at the time of his previous felony conviction, except the language relating to the $50,000 fine, which was added pursuant to Ch.

198 (see above); inserted “or the first 10 years of a sentence imposed under subsection (2)” in (3); and inserted (4) requiring that a sentence under subsection (2) runs consecutive to any other sentence.

Case Notes

Designation of Persistent Felony Offender Proper. St. v. Rossbach, 2022 MT 2, 407 Mont. 55, 501 P.3d 914.

Defendant Properly Sentenced as Repeat Persistent Felony Offender — Notice Proper — All Statutory Requirements Satisfied. The District Court did not err when it sentenced the defendant as a repeat persistent felony offender (PFO) under 46-18-502(2). The prior conviction specified in the PFO notice was a conviction for which the defendant was designated a PFO. That was sufficient notice that the defendant was a PFO at the time of his previous felony conviction, which placed him under 46-18-502(2) for sentencing purposes. Additionally, the defendant satisfied all of the requirements to be sentenced under 46-18-502: (1) robbery by accountability and assault with a weapon are both felonies within the meaning of 45-2-101; (2) the defendant was previously designated a PFO; (3) less than 5 years had elapsed between his 2012 felony conviction for which he was designated a PFO and the present felony offenses; (4) the defendant was over 21 years of age when he committed the present offense; and (5) the defendant was not pardoned, and his sentence was not commuted. Thus, the District Court correctly concluded that it had no choice but to sentence the defendant pursuant to 46-18-502(2) and (4). St. v. Martin, 2019 MT 44, 394 Mont. 351, 435 P.3d 73.

Defense Counsel’s Incorrect Advice to Court Regarding Sentencing — Sentence Reversed and Remanded for New Sentencing Hearing: The District Court sentenced the defendant to 10 years in prison for possession of methamphetamine as a persistent felony offender after his attorney incorrectly advised the court that it could not defer or suspend the defendant’s sentence. The defendant appealed his sentence and claimed that he had received ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court agreed, ruling that his counsel’s performance was deficient and had prejudiced the defendant. The Supreme Court reversed his sentence and remanded the matter for a new sentencing hearing. St. v. Larsen, 2018 MT 211, 392 Mont. 401, 425 P.3d 694.

Felony DUI — Designation as Persistent Felony Offender Valid: The defendant was convicted in May 2009 of felony DUI and was charged with another felony DUI in August 2011. Prosecutors subsequently sought a persistent felony offender designation for the defendant, which was imposed by the District Court and upheld by the Supreme Court. According to the Supreme Court, the defendant was lawfully sentenced to 10 years in prison with no time suspended as a persistent felony offender. St. v. Kime, 2013 MT 14, 368 Mont. 261, 295 P.3d 580, distinguishing St. v. Damon, 2005 MT 218, 328 Mont. 276, 119 P.3d 1194.

Sentencing — District Court Departure From Persistent Felony Offender Statute — Sentence to Department of Corrections Instead of State Prison Considered Proper Departure: The defendant was convicted of felony partner or family member assault, designated as a persistent felony offender (PFO), and committed to the Department of Corrections (DOC) for the statutory minimum period of 5 years under 46-18-502. On appeal, the defendant argued that the District Court misinterpreted 46-18-222, which allows the court to forego restrictions when there is “no serious bodily injury” to the victim. The Supreme Court affirmed the sentence and determined that regardless of whether the prosecution proved “serious bodily injury”, the District Court correctly departed from the PFO statute by sentencing the defendant to the DOC rather than the state prison. Moreover, the District Court based its sentence on the defendant’s likelihood of reoffending and the court’s desire to rehabilitate him. St. v. Thompson, 2012 MT 208, 366 Mont. 260, 286 P.3d 581.

Sentence Under Persistent Felony Offender Statute Replaces Underlying Felony Sentence: It was within the District Court’s discretion to sentence the defendant to 40 years at the Montana State Prison for violation of 45-6-204 because he was designated and sentenced as a persistent felony offender and his sentence replaced the penalty for the underlying felony. Sartain v. St., 2012 MT 164, 365 Mont. 483, 285 P.3d 407.

Imposition of Two Separate Sentences Illegal — Gunderson Opinion Followed: The District Court imposed two separate sentences on Johnson, one for the underlying felony and another sentence because Johnson was a persistent felony offender (PFO). Citing St. v. Gunderson, 2010 MT 166, 357 Mont. 142, 237 P.3d 74, the Supreme Court reiterated that there should be only one sentence under the PFO statute and that the PFO sentence actually replaces the other sentence for the underlying felony. Because there were two sentences from the District Court, the sentences were illegal. St. v. Johnson, 2010 MT 288, 359 Mont. 15, 245 P.3d 1113.

Sentencing Defendant as Persistent Felony Offender — No Double Jeopardy: Sentence enhancements based on recidivism, and not based on the same prior conviction, do not violate double jeopardy. St. v. Brooks, 2010 MT 226, 358 Mont. 51, 243 P.3d 405.

Plea Agreement Contained No Sentencing Recommendation Promises — No Breach of Contractual Obligation: A sentencing court may consider relevant evidence pertaining to the defendant's character and history and to incidents making up the defendant's background. St. v. Manywhitehorses, 2010 MT 225, 358 Mont. 46, 243 P.3d 412.
